In his Journal he tells us that he felt restrained from expanding too much in business, and that he built a house for his wife and daughter before starting on a religious visit to England. This house was erected on a hill, probably one-fourth of a mile south of the house he was living in. Like the other house, it was built of brick, two stories high, but had a much finer outlook, the situation being a choice one, even in this day. A hall and one room occupied the front; back of these was another room, and back of this the kitchen.

John Woolman never lived in this house, having died in England seventh of Tenth Mo., 1772, while on his religious visit to that country. One of the succeeding owners of the property enlarged and remodeled this dwelling, and the old well-sweep, with a large stone tied to one end to balance the bucket, became a thing of the past. It is now a commodious, rough-cast farm-house, painted buff, with dark green shutters, and presents a pleasing appearance with the well-kept grounds. It is occupied by its present owner, who is one of the prosperous farmers of Burlington County.

"The Christian preacher may have a message to the civic life, the commercial life, the intellectual life of mankind, because these all are a portion of the social structural relation, the spiritualizing of which constitutes the Kingdom of God."

Science and Industry.

THE coast line of the United States, including bays, is 12,101 miles in extent. Alaska's coast line is estimated at 7,860 miles, so that the total is 19,961 miles.

A SECOND edition of Helena V. Sachse's "How to Cook for the Sick" proves the popularity of that excellent work, to which new recipes and formulas are now added. "It aims," says the author, "to place the preparation of food on an accurate basis, just as medicine prescribed by the physician is prepared by skilled hands from standard formulas." J. E. Lippincott Company are its publishers.

BEGINNING RIGHT.—"I do not tell my pupils that there is always room at the top," said a well-known artist the other day. "I emphasize, instead, the more directly practical truth that there is always room at the bottom. The worker who begins with the bottom job and does it too well to stay at the bottom, inevitably rises—he can't help it. Many an illustrator commences in the advertising pages of the magazines, and is so strikingly too good for them after a while that the editor has to have his work for the front page. It's the people that despise the bottom job and its opportunities that complain that it is hard to get a start.

PRACTISING MEDICINE AT NINETY.—Longevity of Irishmen is proverbial, but even in that country for a doctor to be in practice at the age of ninety is unique. Dr. Woods of Birr has that distinction, and at the last meeting of the district board of guardians it was decided to grant him a full superannuation allowance. Popular with his patients, whom he visited on a bicycle, the venerable practitioner strenuously objected to retiring when the proposal was first brought forward. He urged that he was willing and able to earn his salary, and did not wish to take money from the public that he did not earn.

OLIVE OIL TO THE RESCUE.—A tablespoonful of olive oil a day, taken internally, will help liver trouble and indigestion.

It is also healing for throat or stomach catarrh.

Serve it frequently in salad dressings, where it will be both appetizer and medicine.

For severe internal disorders or emaciated and run-down condition of the body, rub the patient every morning for twenty minutes with the oil, then with a bath towel; at night rub the spine for ten minutes, and in two months you will see a great improvement.

Mixed with quinine, then rubbed on the chest and back, it prevents cold; mixed with camphor then applied to the throat, it cures soreness; mixed with kerosene and turpentine, then used on the throat and chest, it relieves the most obstinate cough.

THE FEAR OF TAKING COLD is so strong in many people that a draught of fresh air becomes a bugaboo to their contracted, sensitive nerves. Draughts are imagined as existing everywhere, and the contraction which immediately follows the sensation of a draught is the best means of preparing to catch a cold.

Fear of accident keeps one in a constant state of unnecessary terror. To be willing that an accident should happen does not make it more likely to happen, but it prevents our wasting energy by resistance, and keeps us quiet and free, so that if an emergency of any kind arises, we are prepared to act promptly and calmly for the best. There are big and little nervous fears, and each and all can be met and conquered—thus bringing a freedom of life which cannot even be imagined by those carrying the burden of fear, more or less, throughout their lives.

THE LOAVES OF PHARAOH.—Loaves of bread thousands of years old have recently furnished an interesting study to scientists abroad. Professors Brahm and Duchwald have analyzed a number of specimens found in Egyptian tombs, and Dr. Lindet has examined some old Roman bread dating back before the Christian era. The Egyptian bread was more than 3500 years old, but was still recognizable as a cereal product prepared by baking. Grains still retained their peculiar structure, while dead yeast cells were plainly discernible. The grain of which the bread was composed was emmer, which is related to our modern wheat. These ancient Egyptian loaves had the appearance of being charred as if by fire—a circumstance due to slow oxidation by the atmosphere, going on through thousands of years. It was ascertained by experiment that the same effect would be produced upon new bread by exposing it for forty-eight hours to a temperature of 220 degrees Fahrenheit. In either case the process was one of combustion. —Kansas City Journal.

LINCOLN AND THE BIRD.—In "Our Birds and Their Nestlings" we find this story of Abraham Lincoln:

In the early pioneer days, when Abraham Lincoln was a young attorney and "rode the circuit," he was one day traveling on horseback from one town to another with a party of friends who were lawyers like himself.

The road which they traveled led across prairies and through woods. As they passed by a grove where the birds were singing merrily, they noticed a baby bird which had fallen from the nest and lay fluttering by the roadside.

After they had gone a short distance, A. Lincoln stopped, turned, and said, "Wait for me a moment; I will soon reinjoin you."

As his friends halted and watched him, they saw A. Lincoln return to the place where the helpless bird lay on the ground, and tenderly take it up and set it on a limb near the nest.

When he joined his companions, one of them laughingly asked, "Why did you bother yourself and delay us with such a trifle as that?"

Abraham Lincoln's reply deserves to be remembered. "My friend," said he, "I can only say this—that I feel better for it. I could not have slept to-night if I had left that helpless little creature to perish on the ground."

PHILADELPHIA GIRL AS MASTER MARINER.—That a society girl is of necessity a butterfly, is too ancient a fiction to need refutation. But Jane Morgan, a daughter of Randall Morgan of Philadelphia, has just successfully passed an examination before the local United

A master mariner must be able to handle ship under all circumstances, and to understand the intricacies of harbors and channels. It is said that there are but four other women masters in the United States, and but very few more in the world. She is the only one known to this port.

It was the desire to command her father's yacht that led Jane Morgan into the two year course of study necessary to secure a license. As her license reads "for all oceans," she is, it is proven capable, not only of taking charge of a yacht, but even of an ocean liner. An ordinary license restricts the owner to coast travel, and often prescribes the limit of such travel: Jane Morgan's stands for the highest order of steamship and navigation proficiency.

Even should the essay naught more than command of her father's yacht, which is 22 feet long with a 27-foot beam, Jane Morgan will have proved herself one of the women whom the verb "to do" is of more value than the verb "to be."

THE STAR ANTARES.—In the constellation Scorpio, seen, when visible at all, low down in our southern sky, is a star of about first magnitude, called Antares. This object is, according to measurement of its parallax by Sir David Gill, enormously distant and must therefore be a colossal body. One of our astronomers, J. E. Gore, computed from photometric considerations, that its mass is probably 88,000 times that of the sun. As a result the tendency of astronomers is to do whether such differences as these figures in exist among the celestial orbs, but undoubtedly the mass of Antares must be exceptional. Prof. Larkin of the Lowell observatory, California, points out that round this great star is a wide region "about as void of stars as any known to the telescope." Many star fields are encountered in the heavens. "The blackened and waste areas show no stars, if any, they are on the extreme limit of vision in this splendid and pure mountain air. In these dark expanses no trace of the delicate pearl white, shimmering background of sidereal structure can be seen. The inference is that all the matter once in this area been drawn in to build up the colossal sun-tares." The space has been swept clean. In the constellations Sagittarius and Scorpion there exist many black fields without a star or nebulous background.—London Graphic.

You can make the clock strike before hour by putting your own hands on it, but will strike wrong. You can tear the rose open before its time, but you mar the beauty of the rose. So we may spoil many a gift blessing which God is preparing for us by our eager haste. He is weaving our lives to patterns of beauty and strength. He has a perfect plan for each. Don't pull at threads of life. God's love is the motive all day, to give us unexpected and surprising blessings.—Selected.

THE crisis of life is usually the secret of wrestling.

THE ABSOLUTE SIMPLICITIES.—A few days a cultivated lawyer, an alumnus of one of the best colleges in the country, a traveler in many countries, liberal in his religious views, holding to the fundamental principles of orthodox Christianity, approached the editor of this paper on the cars and said, "Here is a problem for you that I cannot solve. I do not see why clergymen when they find men their audiences supposed to be learned or ignorant, do not understand that if they wish to gain their respect or admiration the surest way to do so is to stick to the absolute simplicities as they would if they were not present." The "absolute simplicities" are added to by minds of the highest grade in the country, and they are most frequently used by the half-educated, the persons who are addicted to phrase-making rather than to thinking, who take their language from the books they read, or who are afraid to be original in speech lest they should not be able to reach a sermon of the conventional length. The absolute simplicities in the realm of religion should be presented in language clear and sharp as crystal or they will not be understood. The days of pompous styles are over. Now and then a man appears whose condition is semi-hysterical, who can attract a large concourse merely by his energy, dramatic delivery, and other sensational methods; but not much comes of it. Beecher was a vast crowd, and he was a man of the absolute simplicities; so is Dr. Cuyler; so was William Hall; so was Wm. M. Taylor; so, presently, was John Wesley, and, in language ideas, also George Whitefield. Wendell Phillips adhered to the absolute simplicities, the consequence was that there was not a pond of time when he spoke that he was not listened to.

The absolute simplicities are as essential to a pure character as to an intellectual, and the love of them is the fountain of sincerity and the source of permanent conviction.—Christian Advocate.

"Men," said Tolstoi, "are fractions." In the soul the best qualities, the real merit man, the numerator, and the opinion he has of himself, the denominator. The larger the denominator, you know, the smaller the importance of the numerator.

Items Concerning the Society.

A Philadelphia Meeting for Sufferings is issuing an important and timely address on "Sacredness of Human Life,"—a tract which will receive widespread attention.

The name of Henry Longstreth, as publisher, is associated with many books relating to Friends, their history and doctrine, generally reprints of standard English books more familiar to the generation just past than to the present. It is nearly a century since he gave up his book-publishing business. He died at Lansdowne, Pa., on the 25th of Twelfth Month, in the ninety-first of his age.

Friends, William C. Allen and William B. By are reported to have arrived at Porto Rico on the 4th day, Twelfth Month 22d, beginning their religious service of some four months in the West India Islands. George C. Williams, of New York, a member of New England Yearly Meeting, is said to be expecting also to pay a religious visit to the West Indies during the winter.

A correspondent writes: "Now that there seems to be some interest manifested in our principles among some members not heretofore, apparently at least, much concerned the Journal of Thomas Story, especially in the abridgement published at 20 S. Twelfth street, Philadelphia, commends itself to me as one of the clearest 'manuals' of Friends' doctrines known to me. Thomas Story was a great controversialist, and in his frequent disputes was able to set forth our doctrines very clearly in convenient form for inquirers."

Notes in General.

The Central American Republics have a curious clause in their postal regulations. The posts that go by water or railway are required to carry the Bible without charge.

Dr. Dunning says, "The denominational newspaper is almost the only means by which intelligent unity and co-operation of the whole denomination can be secured."

Campbell Morgan says: "We smile in our broad-minded way at the Roman Catholic index of forbidden books. I often wish I could make an index of forbidden books for our young people."

M. Combes, the author of the Government's bill to separate Church and State in France, which the Parliamentary committee has voted against as not being radical enough, was educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood and actually took orders.

The belief is shared by many, that "the witnessing of those athletic contests and so called sports in which physical injuries and even death often result, tends to familiarize the public with brutality and a lowered sense of the sacredness of human life."

It is said that thousands of children in Paris alone are in the streets who formerly attended the free schools for the poor of the different religious orders. In the small villages and towns of France the Church schools are the only schools. The suppression of these schools leaves the children without instruction.

The religious movement in Wales which seems to be spontaneous resembles the great revivals in the days of Whitefield and Edwards. The principal leader is a young miner who speaks with simplicity and directness, but the remarkable awakening has also extended to many places which he has not visited at all. Ministers and laymen of all denominations speak of it and enter into it as a work of Divine power.

Madison C. Peters, of the Broad Street Baptist Church, Philadelphia, in which he has acted as a permanent supply, has severed his connection with that church, believing that he can reach more people by preaching in a near-by theatre which will hold three thousand people, and which for the five evening services he has already held, has been filled. M. C. Peters has also engaged a theatre for First-day afternoons and proposes working in the slum district in the morning.

It is a remarkably general sentiment among religious people that the Church should get back to the simple life and simple forms of worship of the Lord in order to prosper. Voices are heard on all sides mourning the departures from the way of God. As a result of this departure from most of the churches are gaining very slightly in numbers and power and some are going back. Is it not a little noteworthy that some of the most worldly churches have the smallest percentage of increase?—Christian Instructor.

The winter series of University Extension lectures in Association Hall, Philadelphia, began on Second-day evening of this week with a lecture by Edward Howard Griggs. On Third-day afternoon Henry Van Dyke, of Princeton, delivered a single lecture on The Moral Law in Art.

On Third-day of next week John Cowper Powys will begin a course of six afternoon lectures on Representative American Writers. His scholarship, united with exceptional skill and magnetism as a speaker, promises to make his University Extension work in this country as notable as that which he has done at home.

THE LANGUAGES OF INDIA.—Among the 145 distinct languages spoken in British India, says the Nineteenth Century, are some possessing only a few hundred words, others rivaling English, as Dr. Grierson says, or Russian, as I would say, in their copiousness; in which every word is a monosyllable, others in which some are elongated by agglutination—they run to ten syllables, like da-pa-l-cho-akan-tahen-tin-a-ae Sontali word meaning: "He who belongs to him who belongs to me will continue letting himself be made to fight." Some of these divers tongues lack verb and noun, others are as complex and systematic as Greek and Latin.

THE TORONTO CONFERENCE.—We have received a copy of the book entitled "Proceedings of the Friends' General Conference,—First-day School, Philanthropic, Educational, Religious, and Young Friends' Association,—held at Toronto, Canada, 1904."

This was a conference of members of Yearly Meetings which have been willing, for distinction's sake, to forego the appellation of "Orthodox." The various interests set forth in the above title are presented with clear ability by various voices which took part in the conference. Some of the prepared papers are strong, suggestive and valuable for the points which they would teach. The book comes to us marked as "Ethics." In that field it shows forth in many places, an advanced enlightenment. In this connection religious allusions would hardly fail to appear; but a cursory examination, while falling on some savor of unsettlement, shows as regards doctrines little said, and little for us to say. Whatever our difference in "theology" or its absence may be, the book seems to be made up of concerns and thoughts of men and women bent on the betterment of the condition of mankind.

The recent incorporation of the National Armenia and India Relief Association makes it very convenient and appropriate to forward funds for the thousands who are starving and freezing in Eastern Turkey through their treasurers, Brown Brothers & Co., 59 Wall street, New York.

Reliable information received from Dr. Norton, the U. S. Consul at Harpoot, who, under the direction of the Government at Washington, visited the Sassoun region and has just rendered his report, gives the facts. Small bands of Russian and Persian Revolutionists enter a town and barricade themselves. The Turks, irritated by their presence, order the indiscriminate killing of Christians, and thousands of helpless women and children, deprived of their husbands and fathers, plundered and burned out of their homes, appeal to Christendom for aid.

The Turkish Government announces that aid is being given for every individual, and then leaves them to starve. The Consul says: "Their case is one appealing most strongly to the sympathies of the benevolent." R. M. Cole of Fitts, missionary of the A. B. C. F. M. is familiar with existing conditions and with the facilities of meeting the exigency." To him the Association has cabled funds and pleads through its Secretary, Emily C. Wheeler, of Worcester, Mass., for further aid.

At least as important as the recent "airship" achievements at St. Louis, though not so sensational, and therefore not so interesting to so many people, are some experiments that have been made there with small rubber balloons that were sent up by Prof. H. H. Clayton of the Blue Hills Observatory, in order to acquire information about the upper air currents. These balloons carried only self-registering barometers to determine the highest point reached, and the temperature there and the velocity of the currents were estimated from the distance from the starting place at which the balloons descended after they had been exploded by the expanding gas. This explosion in most instances occurred at a height of about ten miles, and there was enough left of the envelope to act as a parachute and bring the instruments safely to the ground. The experiments proved that at altitudes above four miles there is, even in mid-summer, a region of perpetual ice and snow and an upper air current with a greater velocity than the lower, or surface, air currents, blowing as steadily from the west as the current of the Gulf Stream runs. The steadiness of this motion is shown by the fact that all the balloons sent up in the Ninth Month experiments were found within twenty miles of Nashville, Ill., although they took east, south, north, and northwesterly directions, and returned from Farrar, Perry County, Mo., sixty miles southeast of St. Louis, showed an altitude of five miles with a wind velocity of sixty miles in an hour and a half, proving that the velocity of the air currents increases in Winter, with a slight variation in the direction. By the use of those balloons facts unattainable by means of kites or ordinary balloons are secured, and their meteorological value is considerable.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The submarine tunnel, connecting Boston and East Boston, was opened for public travel on the 30th ult. The tunnel is double-tracked, 1.4 miles long, 2700 feet of which is under the harbor waters. The cost of construction was $3,000,000. In the four and one-half years have been consumed in constructing the tunnel, in the accomplishment of which many difficult engineering problems had to be solved, chiefly on account of the maze of underground pipes, sewers and wires located on the Boston side of the harbor, and also because of the late times perilous nature of the work of digging the large passageway underneath the bed of Boston harbor. The tunnel is built entirely of concrete, and is the only tunnel of that kind in the world. It has a maximum width of 23 feet 8 inches and an average height under the harbor of 20 feet 6 inches. It has been leased to a railroad company, and the time occupied in performing the journey between the two ends of the railroad has been reduced from thirty minutes to six minutes.

It is stated that Secretary Taft is determined to make an experiment with Porto Rican labor in the construction of the Panama Canal. It is proposed to place about five hundred Porto Ricans at work on the Isthmus at the earliest practicable day.

A meeting of scientists recently held in this city, A. Lawrence Rotch, of the Blue Hill Observatory, read a paper describing the results of experiments with balloons in ascertaining the temperature of the atmosphere at great heights. "From the barometric records the maximum height attained was found to be about 51,000 feet, where the temperature was 68 degrees Fahrenheit below zero on Ninth Month 23rd. At a height of about 45,000 feet the temperature was minus 72 degrees Fahrenheit, on Twelfth Month 2nd, the lowest temperature, minus 76 degrees, occurring at a height of about 35,000 feet on Eleventh Month 25th."

A despatch from New York of the 29th ultimo says: After truly heroic work by the lifesaving crews from Sandy Hook and Fire Island the captain and twenty-nine members of the crew of the British steamship Drumcliff, who has been in imminent peril on the stranded vessel for four days, were brought to shore safe and sound to-day. Commenting upon the achievement The Public Ledger remarks: "Exhausted but persistent, the lifesavers triumphed at last, and the three trips which they made to the wrecked hull are to be mentioned with the deeds which have been recited in enduring verse."

On the 27th ult. an unusually large number of horses in this city were found to have been seriously diseased on account of over-feeding during the two preceding days observed as holidays. It is stated that notices of the outbreak of epizootic distemper were sent by anti-social groups of veterinary surgeons bent on confronting with such a serious epidemic. The unprecedented prevalence of the malady is attributed to the over-feeding of the horses in warm stables while they were idle because of the double holiday.

It is stated that in Colorado Springs the Chamber of Commerce gathered statistics showing that over 100,000 evergreen trees are used yearly in the State of Colorado for the Yuletide celebration. Inasmuch as the age of the tree cut for use at this time varies from fifteen to twenty-five years, the loss to the forest area is great. The removal of 100,000 evergreens seriously affects the water supply. It is estimated that the removal of that many trees involves an annual reduction of from seven to ten cubic feet of the conserved water supply. "When, from a commercial standpoint, is worth more than the value of the trees."

The cotton crop this year is reported by the Census Bureau to be nearly twice as large as an excess over that of last year of more than three million bales. As a consequence the price has greatly declined, and prices have been reached which are lower than for nearly three years, some sales for future delivery having been made at less than seven cents per pound. A general revival in the cotton-weaving industry has occurred in some of the Southern States, in order to prevent a further decline and to advance the price, a portion of the cotton which had not been marketed has been burned by farmers and merchants. It is said that more than $100,000 worth has thus been destroyed. A general inquiry appears to warrant the statement that it will pay to produce cotton at from six to eight and a half cents per pound. Representatives of local banking interests, railroads in the South and capitalists concerned in the conditions of the cotton market have formulated a plan to avert demoralization in the cotton market, preventing further burning of the crops by Southern growers and to insure a steady price for the staple in the future.

A ukase was issued by the Czar of Russia on the 26th ult., which according to a despatch from St. Petersburg deals with practically all the subjects brought to the Emperor's attention by the memorial of the Congress of Zemstvos presented held last month, and, while not specifically pledging the Government to carry out all of their desires, it does so in a general way by the various reforms which each shall be referred to the Council of Ministers, with orders to report promptly on the fullest measures of relief which can be accorded on the various subjects.

It promises a full and equitable enforcement of existing laws; assures the Zemstvos of the fullest possible measure of self-government; and the enforcement of the measures now existing in their behalf; promulgates a scheme of workmen's insurance, and promises a full legal trial of all persons accused.

The ukase has been given a decidedly favorable reception by the press. The Novoe Vremya, concluding a long analysis of the document, says: "It will realize all the best expectations of the most liberal-minded Russians, and hope and believe also that it means the dawning of a better day and bringing more light and warmth and life into national existence, throughout the empire."

On the 23d inst., terms of capitulation for the surrender of Port Arthur to the Japanese were agreed on, and hostilities in that neighborhood have been suspended for a definite period. The siege of this fortress has lasted eleven months.

A London special gives graphic details of the devastation caused by a moving bog in the county of Roscommon.

The bog, which is known as that of Cloonsheever, is three miles from Castleroa. When it began to slide it moved three-quarters of a mile in a few days, covering everything in its way with pent and water to the depth of eight or ten feet.

The moving portion was about three hundred yards square and had been carried a distance fully three quarters of a mile.

Many of the houses of the hamlet of Cloonsheever have wholly disappeared, while all that is to be seen of the others is the chimney tops.

Captain Thwing, of the steamer Harold Dells, which has returned from the coast north of Siberia, tells of an invasion of the cities and villages of the Kamchatka Peninsula by hundreds of starving Siberian bears.

The ferocious animals, driven from the mountain hunger, made their way to the inhabited regions of coast and for days kept the natives in a state of suspense.

In a small town near the city of Petropavlovsk, one of the savage bears were shot in a single day and so roaming among the houses in search of food.

Co-operation.

The Christian work which the Head of the Church calls for is not so much operation, co-operation. Members may be hard at work, but if independently busy they are not hithered church.

We are members one of another, so that a member's operation must affect his fellow members; confusedly, at cross-purposes or unfruitfully, if it is not co-operative; harmoniously and fruitfully if under well-balanced operation. The one is a condition of sickness, the other of health.

But if all the members were strenuously co-operative merely with each other, very effective and aggressive work through this union of forces might appear; but yet it could be a case of insanity—that is a working independently of the Head and out of co-operation with it. They would not be doing Christian work, owned by Christ as his.

Therefore we say that the labor which the Head of the Church calls for is not simply operation, but co-operation; and not combination of members with each other only, but with Himself. Then as laborers together with fellow-members must be working co-operatively together in unity of exercise, and the operation of the individual is made noble and healthy. Centered in Christ as personally authorized by Him, the best work is done, and the most.

The apparently solitary worker moved by Christ—bearing his yoke with Him—is doing operative work, not with the Master only, but with all fellow-members. It is not for mechanic always to know how this piece of work he is turning out is to comport with the product of some other workman, in building up a structure designed by the Architect. We may think that his peculiar service is independent of what all others are doing;

but it cannot be so if handed down to him from head-quarters. There is some place in the Designer's economy for it to fit. The solitary work is co-operative enough with fellow-beings, and in good company enough with an appreciative Master Builder, if conformed to his appointment.

The whole operation and business of Christian work is co-operation with Christ. Whatsoever thy hands find to do is done as "unto the Lord," if it is done as with the Lord, and with Him. Co-operation with his Spirit is the only Christian service; and co-operatives with the same Master are sure to be union workers and a church under the one Head.

Christian service, or endeavor, is not guesswork: "for whatsoever is not of faith is sin." It is not the "nevertheless-let-me-run" activity towards an object that seems good, for the uncommissioned runner but wastes his breath. It is not the choosing what we shall do, but whom we shall serve. It is the hearkening unto the evidence of Christ's word in our hearts and then doing it. And the youth by beginning in little things or duties manifest to the heart, can learn one by one the letters of their spiritual alphabet so as to discern and read the living word of Christ, made clearer and clearer by obedience, which is but another name for co-operation with Him.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"THERE is a secret and inexpressible joy in possessing in oneself a deep inwardness which God alone knows, and from whose impulsion we live, and draw the spontaneity, and the daily renewal of our courage and the most powerful motives of outward action. When this intimate life loses its intensity, when man neglects it to care for the surface, he loses in value all that he gains in appearance.

By a sad fatality it also happens that often we are of less value, in the same measure as we are more admired. And we remain convinced that that which is best in the world is that which we do not know, for only those know it who possess it. If they told it they would at the same time deprive it of its perfume."—"The Simple Life," Charles Wagner.

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In accordance with the terms of the treaty of 1842 the Indians residing on the Buffalo Creek and Tonawanda Reservations were to remove therefrom, and were to be paid for their improvements, as also for the land. The value of the former upon the Buffalo Reservation was fixed upon by arbitrators, and the Indians residing there quietly withdrew from this tract in 1843 and 1844, and for the most part settled upon the Cattaraugus Reservation.

Those residing upon the Tonawanda Reservation having constantly opposed the treaty of 1842, declined to receive any of the money, which by its provisions should be paid to them; and also refused to allow the arbitrators to come upon the land to make an appraisal of their improvements. One of the white claimants undertook to expel one of the Tonawanda Indians by force, whereupon the matter was brought into court, which decided that the proper steps had not been taken to justify the claimant's action, and sustained the Indian. For several years the rights of the Tonawanda Indians to their reservation remained unsettled, and much litigation ensued, but in 1859 another treaty was made, by which they parted with 5,000 acres of their land and retained 7,000 acres; the latter they now hold in "fee simple."

In the autumn of 1842 a flood in the Allegheny River destroyed much of the crops which the Indians were depending on for their support, and the winter of 1842-3 proved to be a severe one. At this juncture Friends again assisted the Indians by distributing corn and potatoes amongst them, and in buying oats for their stock. Robert Scotten reports under date of Fourth Month 2nd, 1843, that he had purchased 500 bushels of corn, 1200 bushels of potatoes and 647 bushels of oats; which he divided among the more needy, and that thus they had been saved from great suffering, and that many had expressed their hearty thanks to the Quakers at Philadelphia for helping them in their time of need.

In a communication to the Committee about this time, signed by nine of the chiefs, they acknowledge the kindness which had been shown them by Robert Scotten and also their sense of his disinterested labors, particularly in the cause of temperance, many having reformed who had been objects of his care.

In the Fourth Month, 1843, Ebenezer Worth, a member of Bradford Monthly Meeting, Pa., under the belief that it was of Divine requiring laid before that meeting a prospect of offering his aid in carrying out the views of the Committee towards the Indian natives, which after serious consideration was united with by that meeting. Shortly afterwards it engaged the attention of the Committee, who concluded to accept his services, and he accordingly soon went to Tunesassa. Robert Scotten remained a few weeks after his arrival, and introduced him to a knowledge of the condition of the concern, and also among the Indians, and in the Sixth Month, 1843, returned to his home. Ebenezer Worth, whose sympathetic and exercised mind soon became deeply interested in the work in which he had engaged, remained for a number of years closely occupied in visiting among and advising the Indians.

Among the valued members of our religious Society who have been concerned for the welfare of these Indians, there has probably been no one whose Christian example and earnest labors have been more productive of good to the Indians or left a stronger impression on the neighborhood than those of this beloved and respected Friend, who has been regarded by some as the John Woolman of his day. In a Memorial issued by Bradford Monthly Meeting respecting him, it is stated, "He labored earnestly for the building up and strengthening of the weak places in the walls of our Zion, and the promotion of truth and righteousness among men; the meek and unassuming manner in which he performed his religious and social duties, bearing ample evidence that he sought no selfish aggrandizement or the praise of men, and giving a savor and seal to his services hard to gainsay or resist.

"In the year 1843, after a season of deep mental proving, he became assured that an impression which had for a considerable time rested weightily upon his mind, was a religious duty required of him by his Divine Master, whom he desired to obey and serve without any earthly reservation, to leave his pleasant and comfortable home, and all its endowments, and go to the Allegheny Reservation, in the State of New York, to assist in carrying out the concern which has long rested on Philadelphia Yearly Meeting for the civilization and improvement of the Indians residing thereon. And his offer of service having received the approval and encouragement of the Indian Committee, with the approbation and unity of Friends at his home, he soon after entered upon that important engagement, in which he continued about seven years, faithfully laboring among those poor people, under a deep religious concern for the promotion of their best interests, both temporal and spiritual; his unassuming manner, and firm, disinterested zeal on their behalf, ultimately inspiring a confidence, and giving him an influence with them which very few have obtained.

"After ceasing to reside near them, his concern for and deep interest in all that pertained to their well-being remained with him to the last; and often has he been heard to refer to the time spent among them, as affording in the retrospect some of the most satisfactory recollections of his life.

"He was blessed with more than a competence of this world's goods, which he used without abuse; distributing thereof with a liberal hand and generous heart to suffering humanity in want, his mind being humbled under a sense of his accountability as a steward and the awfulness of having to render a final account thereof."

there is published a series of articles containing a brief sketch of his character and extracts from his diary and letters, many of which, written at Tunesassa, convey an instructive view of the motives which prompted him, and the exemplary life which he led, in endeavoring to assist the Indians in different ways.

In the early part of 1843, some of the Indians residing near the Horseshoe Bend, in the upper end of the Allegheny Reservation, and also those living on the Corn Planter's tract, having expressed a strong desire that Friends would render them aid in schooling their children; and it having been represented that about forty at the former and fifteen at the latter place were then ready to go to school; Ebenezer Worth was authorized to employ a teacher for each at the expense of the Committee: provided he could procure suitable persons of good character to undertake the service. He was also desired to exercise a proper supervision over these schools, and report their situation as well as that of other schools on the Reservation, at least once in three months to the Committee. In addition to visiting these two places, which are probably thirty miles distant from each other, he was engaged in teaching a school himself at Cold Spring, about midway between them, at which he had in the Eleventh Month, 1843, as many as twenty-seven scholars.

In one of his letters Ebenezer Worth observes, "Although it has been something of a trial to submit to it, it has appeared to me to be my proper place and the service required of me, to spend nearly all my time on the Reservation in assisting and instructing the Indians." When not engaged at his school, he frequently not only advised the Indians in regard to the best method of clearing and cultivating their land, building houses, &c., but worked with individuals at times in order to encourage them, and manifest his interest in them.

At this time there appeared to be an unusual number of new buildings begun and additional land cleared by the Indians on the Allegheny Reservation. With the settlement of questions respecting the occupancy of these lands which had long agitated them, they entertained fresh hopes that they would be allowed to enjoy the fruits of their labor; and were thus induced to enter upon further improvements. The frequent visits of Ebenezer Worth from family to family and his sympathy and judicious help thus extended had also, we may believe, a strong influence in encouraging such efforts.

The Ogden Land Company caused fresh anxiety at this time by directing a survey to be made of the boundaries of the Allegheny Reservation, also that it should be divided into sections and quarter sections, the latter of one hundred and sixty acres each. The chiefs found themselves somewhat divided in sentiment in regard to allowing this work to be done, and desired the advice of the Committee in relation to it.

After consideration the Committee informed them that they could "not perceive that there is anything in the treaty last made, or any other with which we are acquainted, that requires such a survey and division to be made. We are also apprehensive that such a survey will, if made, give the Ogden Company an advantage which they ought not to have at your land. We think you ought firmly, peaceably, to forbid the surveyors from visiting that reservation at all."

A letter containing this information was terpreted to eleven of the chiefs in council on the twenty-second of Third Month, 18 who were united in accepting the advice, immediately sent word to the parties engaged in it that they would not have their reservation divided off into lots. These surveyors, as having traced the boundaries of the Reservation, did not proceed further to make a division of it.

A few months later another attempt made to survey the lines on the reservation in order to divide it into sections, but chiefs acting with much firmness, and two them standing before the compass, prohibited the surveyor from proceeding, and he reluctantly withdrew.

Getting Along With People.

Two men of affairs were discussing knack, or want of it, which some men display of getting along with their fellows. One of them named an acquaintance who had but only four years out of college yet was at head of a branch house of the concern who employed him. Said he:

"He is a great fellow to get along with people. No man would, of course, be put in a place of such responsibility without integrity, fair quickness and ability and a good education. But there are scores of men who have all those qualities and yet they do not go forward, because they cannot exercise authority. If they receive any they make the man under them cross and resent by petty tyrannies, or else they are too egotistical and lose the respect of the men, are imposed on by them and don't get any work out of them. It seems to be the natural tendency of young men who have dignity and keenness enough to maintain discipline, yet can make their subordinates bear the yoke cheerfully and render good service. Marry, fine, brainy fellow of noble traits fails in because he can neither manage men nor work with them on an equal basis without keeping them in a state of constant irritation. It is the divine touch of humanity which makes a real leader."

HAPPINESS is the great paradox in nature. It can grow in any soil live under any conditions. It defies environment. It comes from within; it is the revelation of the deep of the inner life as light and heat proceed from the sun from which they radiate. Happiness consists not of having but of being; not of possessing but of enjoying. It is the glow of the heart at peace within itself, martyr at the stake may have happiness, a king on his throne might envy. Man is agent of his own happiness; it is the aroma of a life lived in harmony with high ideals. What a man has he may be dependent on others; what he is rests with him under what he obtains in life is but acquisition, what he attains is growth. Happiness is the joy in the possession of the intangible. - lected.

Selections from Charles Rhoads' Journal.

[At the request of loving and interested friends, the family of Charles Rhoads feeling desirous to share portions of his private Journal with the readers of THE FRIEND, a paper in which he took an active interest for many years.—EDITOR.]

Of these occasional memoranda he writes:—"I began on some loose sheets of paper to write down an account of certain events in the life of my dear wife, and some of my own, and our beloved offspring . . . that perhaps you might profit by the experience of a father, whose mistakes in youth should warn them not fall into the same errors, and whose sense of a compassionate Saviour, when accepted in later years, might encourage them to trust in, and submit to that grace which bringeth salvation through Jesus Christ."

The first record of his spiritual impressions is made in his thirty-first year, dated Third month 20th, 1859:—"I think it desirable to record a circumstance that occurred on this day, which although probably unknown to any one but myself, and I apprehend not observed have caused a marked influence on my demeanor, yet was in my estimation the most important to me of any occasion in my existence hitherto. For years now past, and indeed from my earliest youth, thoughts of mortality and the welfare of my immortal part engaged much of my attention."

Then he writes of the long period of doubt and earnest aspirations for faith, which was closed by a special visitation of the Holy Spirit, in a meeting in Philadelphia, an account which appears in his Memorial, printed in these columns two weeks ago—and he concludes as follows:

"I have always thought it most especially desirable that I should not have to await a death-bed to prove my love for Christ, considering such occasions as but indifferent proofs of my sincerity, when compared with conversion and a religious life in time of health and prosperity. I think I may say that I was through His unmerited mercy favored to feel the real love for my adorable Saviour on this day, so that my whole heart was, as it were, opened up as it has never been before. It did not suddenly appear to others, but I feel if the gift of true faith was now, in some measure, granted me; and I earnestly prayed not to withhold His hand until He has set my feet surely on that Rock, which is Christ, my conscious of great natural depravity and weakness, and of much to be put off, and much to be learned in His school; and through His Spirit, I am resolved to travel in 'the strait and narrow way that leads to life,' from this life forward in my earthly pilgrimage."

In 1866 he writes: "Surely after we have remission of past sins, through faith and repentance, there is still a work of sanctification to be known. I do not mean we can go on sinning and repenting as we may please, and yet be all the time safe and accepted in the love of God; but it seems to me the 'motions of sin' in our flesh are still felt, and—although they yielded to—they produce a sense of unholiness that is at war with that purity, which the Divine Being requires in His creatures. I think that this internal impurity, be it ever so slight, may be all purged away, through the sanctifying power of the Holy Spirit in my heart. Our Saviour prayed that His disciples might be sanctified through His Father's truth. I do believe that sin and all its defilements may be and must be purged away from the soul in this life, but it seems to me a progressive work, not accomplished all at once in most cases, though that is possible with Him, and we have some instances of it. Our salvation is only secure upon condition that we abide in the true Vine, and a growth is to be looked for in the living branches. I wish to record my gratitude to my Saviour for the refreshing Meetings I have so generally enjoyed of latter time, and the contrast in this respect, to my experience for several years after I had become seriously awakened. I state it for the encouragement of any who have felt as I did during a long season of death and barrenness of spirit in Meetings for Worship, consequent upon a wandering mind and the intrusion of earthly thoughts, even at seasons when they were exceedingly distressing to me, but seemed to be pressed upon me by an unwearied adversary, till my soul fainted for the presence of the living God. Blessed be His mercy in that He heard me, after a long struggle and many cries and prayers for deliverance, so that I have to render to Him the incense of praise for the sweet seasons He has given me in our silent Meetings at Haddonfield!"

Ninth Month 13th, 1866. "This day attended our Quarterly Meeting. These Meetings have been, almost always, occasions of deep introduction of spirit, accompanied with a sense of reverential fear lest they might not be known to realize that object for which we profess to hold them—the solemn worship and service of the Almighty. I have, however, been mercifully favored to feel after most of them (since a member here) that it was good for me that I had been there. The Meeting to-day was, to my view, as a season of warm showers descending on the tender grass. Clarkson Sheppard was present, and was anointed to be the chief instrument through whom the Holy Head dispensed these blessings. My own impressions before he rose were of an unusual character in some respects, as I felt unexpectedly drawn to consider the nature of true Christian baptism and some views respecting its spirituality, and the doctrines and practice of our Saviour and his Apostles in this regard were forcibly impressed upon my mind, with a strong feeling of obligation to rise and communicate them to the congregation. But oh! the thought that the subject was an intricate one, and beyond my present status to unfold to profit, and the fear that I might stumble and bring some reproach on the Cause or myself, seemed too strong to be overcome, and I let the time pass by. My convictions, since and now, are, that the command to speak was as clear as was required to warrant me in rising, and that want of faith in the guiding power of the only Arm of Strength was my weakness. This humbling feeling has brought sorrow over my soul, that I should have distrusted Him who has been so compassionate and long-suffering a Saviour to me.

"May He forgive my failure, and not take from me that Holy Spirit," which was so sensibly present this morning!"

A Parable: The Test of Faith.

A woman once set out upon her life's journey with a guide and companion whom she called Faith.

And all went well until Pain appeared. Then Faith was blanched and weak with terror. And the long, slim lash of Pain descended upon it again and yet again, till in agonized despair the woman saw that Faith was dead.

Alone she went her way. But it was very hard, and all unknown to her. "Oh," she cried, "if I but had Faith again to guide me, and bear me company!"

And there came to her a new Faith, nobler, more beautiful than the first. And she taught her many things.

Then Pain came again with his long, cruel lash. But Faith was brave. The hiss of the lash did not terrify, the sting did not weaken her. She seemed, indeed, to grow the stronger, until she turned and slew Pain, leaving him by the wayside.

The woman was filled with wonder. "O Faith," she said, "glad, wise and brave Faith, you have taught me many things. Tell me, why that other Faith cringed and died under Pain's persecution, while you have but grown stronger?"

And Faith answered, "The Faith that died under the lash of Pain never was Faith at all."

Something Else Waiting

"Well," said the little neighbor who had "run in" to tell of her disappointment that her sister could not come to her for the summer, "well, it's done me a heap of good to talk it over with you. Of course I can't help feeling bad over not seeing Etta, but if you don't get one thing you always get something else, I've noticed. I'll go home and watch for something else."

A girl who had been curled up in a corner reading, looked up at that. She was young, and it seemed to her that if you didn't get what you wanted you missed everything. The little neighbor seeing the look, sent a word in her direction.

"Jessie there, doesn't believe my philosophy," she said with a laugh. "We don't, other peoples', but I don't know as that makes much difference if we find our own. But there's one thing, Jessie, that you don't want to forget. You may miss some things, or think you do, but you won't ever get to a place in life where there won't be three things waiting—some one to love, some duty to do, and some opportunity to discover; and as long as you have those three things life's bound to be good if you will meet it half way. Oh, before I go," turning to Jessie's mother—and then the talk drifted to other things. But the girl in the corner put the little sermon away to ponder over in her thoughts of life.—Forward.

A GREAT mathematician once said "No man is competent to calculate accurately until he has as perfect a conception of two-ness as he has of one-ness." How true this is morally as well as mathematically! There can be no large and noble estimate of life until one has reached the point where another's interest as well as his own enters into the solution of every problem.—Forward.

TEMPERANCE.

The matter under this heading is furnished to THE FRIEND on behalf of the "Temperance Association of Friends of Philadelphia," by Benjamin F. Whitson, 401 Chestnut St., Phila.

Whosoever may

Discern pure ends here, may grow pure enough
To love them, brave enough to strive for them, And strong enough to reach them, though the

To set the world rejoicing.

"The statistics of every State show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained in saloons than to any other source."—United States Supreme Court.

After reconstruction, the next great question will be the overthrow of the liquor traffic.—Abraham Lincoln.

"High class" places are more ruinous to the young than the "disreputable" place. If "disreputable" evil is dangerous, "reputable" evil is more so. "Reputable" evil is the step which leads to disreputable evil.—American Issue.

We do not favor the sale of liquor at any time or in any place, but if liquor is to be dispensed in the so-called clubs, we fail to see why the same scrutiny shall not exist there as in the case of hotel licenses. Evidently the time has come for some restrictions concerning the clubs.—Keystone Critic.

He who rents his buildings for evil purposes is betraying his Lord for thirty pieces of silver.—United Presbyterian.

UNDER LOCAL OPTION LAWS large portions of territory in the South are passing under prohibition. Of the 27,000,000 people of the South, 17,000,000 are living under absolute prohibition. Florida has but 125 saloons. Sixty-five of the seventy-five counties of Mississippi are under prohibition. Nine-tenths of Kentucky is under prohibition. Sixty of her one hundred and nineteen counties are under absolute prohibition, and in only a few of the remainder are there more than one or two licensed saloons. Georgia has prohibition in 104 of her 137 counties. In Texas there are 141 prohibition counties, and fifty-seven more are under partial prohibition. Under the Adams law, in Tennessee, the whole State is under prohibition except twelve cities and towns. This change has not all been brought about in the past year, but the year has witnessed marked progress.—From a Presbyterian Report on Temperance.

From the viewpoint of Leslie's Weekly, prohibition in Kansas has been a measurable success. The law was enacted twenty-one years ago. In five of the 105 counties of the State the law is pretty generally ignored. These counties include about 17 per cent. of the population and furnish 30 per cent. of the criminals. Take the State as a whole, however, and, while the population has increased from 996,616 to 1,470,495, the number of prisoners has decreased from 917 to 788.

The Southern Express Co. will no longer accept shipments of liquors to prohibition points in the South.

The Houston & Texas Central, the Houston-East & West Texas and the Houston & Shreveport railroads have decided not to receive for transportation from either connecting lines at junction points or from shippers at any point, shipments of whiskey or other intoxicating liquors when consigned to the point on their lines. Forty cities and towns on the Central and fifteen on the East & West Texas lines have local option.

The following measures are now before Congress in a more or less advanced stage of consideration:

1. The Cumber Sperry bill to forbid liquor selling in all government buildings.
2. The Hepburn-Dolliver bill to prevent the evasion of State laws by which the sale of liquors is forbidden in any territory, by providing that liquor transported within the boundary of any State shall be subject to the police power of the State the same as though made within the State.
3. A bill repealing or reversing the law that forbids the sale of liquors in the army.
4. A bill to admit Indian Territory and Oklahoma as a State without providing for the maintenance of our treaty with the Indians by which the sale of intoxicants in the Indian Territory is expressly prohibited.
5. A bill to prohibit traffic in opium, except for medical prescriptions, in the whole jurisdiction of the United States.

These bills are of special interest to two classes of people,—those who favor the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and those who would extend the traffic.

From these two classes congressmen are receiving many letters, and are doubtless judging the sentiment and reckoning the action of their constituents by the character and number of such appeals. The majority of people seldom, if ever, address their district representative in Congress; yet, when financial interests are jeopardized, men are usually very prompt to appeal to the Senator or representative most likely to have influence in the matter. The Temperance Association of Friends has recently sent out to members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting a circular letter asking co-operation in the matter of letters, petitions, etc., and offering to furnish information to any who may ask it. They hope their concern may be shared by others, and that many people all over our land may feel rightly drawn to express their views to the right party at the right time.

THE STATE RETAIL LIQUOR LEAGUE OF PENNSYLVANIA has sent a confidential letter "to the trade" urging opposition to the local option movement in Pennsylvania. The following extracts from this letter illustrate the spirit of it and show how strongly the liquor interest will oppose the proposed act: "To permit the electors of any county, city, borough or township, or of any ward of any city of the first or second class in this Commonwealth determine by an election, whether the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited, a providing penalties for the illegal sale thereof

The letter reads thus: "It is desired to the people of our State should be made acquainted with the fact that the very same men—preachers, temperance fanatics and cranks generally—who secured the passage of Brannock Law in Ohio, are now energetically at work openly avowing their purpose to cure the passage of a like law in the Keystone State. The experience of the Ohio people should teach the trade in this State that it is not safe to remain idle and indifferent. It is hardly necessary to remind you that 'Local Option' is merely Prohibition in disguise. It is prohibition within the region where it is adopted. . . . Your earnest attention (therefore, invited to the necessity for prompt energetic and persistent efforts to head off defeat the movement now so boldly making entail this monstrous evil (?) upon this State. You are urged to begin at once every effort you can command to secure the sympathetic co-operation of the legislators from your portion of the State in opposition to this movement. Such efforts should be made quietly, because publicity may assist instead of counteracting the efforts of the Prohibitionists." . . . This communication is addressed to you at the request of the State Temperance League.

Respectfully yours,

P. H. NOLAN, National Representative.
THEODORE HUCKSTEIN, Secretary.

When the vote was taken in the year 18 in the State of Pennsylvania as to whether should or should not adopt an amendment to the Constitution of the State prohibiting the sale of intoxicants, twenty-nine counties voted favorably to the amendment, and thirty-nine gave a majority against it. On account of the defeat of the amendment the counties voted "dry" have had no opportunity of bidding the traffic except by the cumbersome and illogical system of "remonstrance." Under a Local Option statute it is possible that of those twenty-nine counties and eventually many more would bar out the saloon. It is not seem strange that it should require a tremendous effort to get the Legislature allow the people to govern themselves, while the Government of these United States has been declared so emphatically to "of the people, for the people, and by the people."

Let the reader bear in mind that the opponents of this local option measure, now before our Legislature at Harrisburg, are using "every effort they can command" to defeat it. The Christian Temperance people doing all their duty calls for in an honest effort to secure passage? This remains to be seen. The result is sure to triumph when enough good people do their duty. Reader, hast thou a duty this matter?

"The little brook helps to swell the river and the river helps to fill the sea, so our feeble efforts help to accomplish the wonderful purposes of our God."

"THE situation which has not its duty ideal, was never yet occupied by man."

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

The Part Impossible to Exaggerate.

Seeing an article in a recent number of THE FRIEND, showing the great exaggeration of the number slain in the war in the Far East, brought to mind an article seen in three different neighboring papers, giving notice of a circumstance which occurred in this section, all of which were different, and all exaggerated, mingling for sensation. While the writer was thinking how wrong it is in reporters to give untruthful accounts of crimes, casualties, &c., to increase the sale of papers, instead of having a care to give correct accounts to the public, he was made to believe that while correct figures could exaggerate it, great as it is, yet when rightly used, no figures or words could describe, or bring to the senses of those who have not beheld, the many horrible scenes which for a long time have been occurring here. It is to be feared the surrounding nations are not rightly awed by the awfulity, or engaged in prayer to the Author of Good for its end.

While this sad subject was in mind, afresh reminded by seeing the above named in THE FRIEND, another was brought to mind, which is also sorrowful beyond description, as it has not been tolerated and has been going on with impunity in our enlightened and professedly Christian nation—this worse than brutal fighting, or "boxing" as it is termed, and its enormity—and to induce thousands to behold it as with seeming impunity; while the good, whose mercy goes forth in tenderness, even to the brute creation, would be like Cowper, in seeing such inhumanity in a man to man, to exclaim that "mercy to a bleeding heart would weep" when she sees such cruelty "inflicted on a beast." These facts took hold on the mind with desires all who love good, and who sorrow over which is displeasing to God, and is degrading or hurtful to their fellow-men, may fail to do what they may, as occasion offers, by word, or acts, to discourage all such inhumanity.

Rules for Home Life.

—To make home duties of the first importance; and to despise the very smallest, but perform it even unto God.

—To undertake no work outside which may be the neglect of even that small duty at home.

—To think of the happiness of others before my own, for even Christ pleased not himself and left us an example, that we should follow his steps.

—To try to add to the happiness of every member of my family, sympathizing in both joy and grief, giving them pain and pleasure.

—To find out my besetting sin, and fight to overcome it, for I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.

—To remember God has formed my home, as He leaves me in it, no one but myself can fill the niche in which He has placed me.

WOMEN AND WAR.

BY ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

We women teach our little sons how wrong
And how ignoble blows are; school and church
Support our precepts, and inculcate
The growing minds with thoughts of love and peace.

"Let dogs delight to bark and bite," we say;
But human beings with immortal souls
Must rise above the methods of a brute,
And walk with reason and with self-control.

And then—dear God! you men, you wise, strong men,

Our self-announced superiors in brain,
Our peers in judgment, you go forth to war!
You leap at one another, mutilate
And starve and kill your fellow-men, and ask
The world's applause for such heroic deeds.

You boast and strut; and if no song is sung,
No laudatory epic is writ in blood,
Telling how many widows you have made,
Why, then, perforce, you say our hardships are Dead,

And inspiration sleeps to wake no more.
And we, the women, we whose lives you are—
What can we do but sit in silent home?
And wait and suffer? Not for us the blare
Of trumpets and the bugle's call to arms—

For us no waving banners, no supreme, Triumphant hour of conquest. Ours the slow Dead torture of uncertainty, each day
The bootless battle with the same despair,
And when at best your victories reach our ears
They reach us with them to our pitying hearts
The thought of countless homes made desolate,
And other women weeping for their dead.

O men, wise men, superior beings, say
O there no substitute for war in this Great age and era? If you answer "No,"
Then let us rear our children to be wolves,
And teach them from the cradle how to kill.
Why should we women waste our time and words

In talking peace when men declare for war!

An Old-Time Friends' Meeting.

Thomas Story, in his Journal, gives the following interesting account of the first meeting he attended after his conviction. It may be found in Friends' Library, Vol. 10, pages 13-14. He says: "When we came to the meeting, being a little late, it was full gathered, and I went among the throng of the people on the forms, and sat still among them in that inward condition and mental retirement. And though one of their ministers, a stranger, began to speak on some points held by them, and declaim against some things held by others and denied by them, particularly predestination as asserted by the Presbyterians, yet I took not much notice of it. I did not doubt but, that like all other sects they might have something to say, both for their own and against the opinion of others, yet my concern was much rather to know whether they were a people gathered under a sense of the enjoyment of the presence of God in their meetings; or, in other words, whether they worshipped the true and living God in the life and nature of Christ, the Son of God, the true and only Saviour. And the Lord answered my desire according to the integrity of my heart. For, not long after I had sat down among them that heavenly and watery cloud overshadowing my mind broke into a sweet abounding shower of celestial rain, and the greater part of the meeting was broken together, dissolved and comforted in the Divine presence of the true heavenly Lord, which was divers times repeated before the meeting ended. In the same way, by the same Divine power, I had been often favored before when alone and when no eye but that of heaven beheld, or any knew, but the Lord himself, who in infinite mercy had been pleased to bestow so great a favor. And, as many small springs and streams, descending into a proper place and forming a river become more deep and weighty, even so thus meeting with a people gathered of the living God into a sense of the enjoyment of his divine and living presence, through Jesus Christ, the Son of God and Saviour of the world, I felt an increase of joy of the salvation of God, and the more by how much I now perceived I had been under the like mistake as the prophet of God of old, but was now otherwise informed by a sure evidence and token—by the witness or the Divine truth, in which no living soul can err or be deceived, being self-evident and undeniable in all those who truly know Him.

"Our joy was mutual and full, though in many tears, as in cases of the deepest and most unfeigned love; for the Friends there, being generally sensible I was affected and tendered with them by the influence of the divine Truth they knew and made profession of, did conclude I had been at that time and not before convinced and come to the knowledge of the way of Truth among them; and their joy was as of heaven at the return of a penitent, and mine as the joy of salvation from God in view of the work of the Lord so far carried on in the earth, when I had thought not long before there had been scarcely any true and living faith or knowledge of God in the world.

"The meeting being ended, the peace of God which passeth all the understanding of natural men, and is inexpressible by any language but itself alone, remained as a holy canopy over my mind in a silence out of the reach of all words, and where no idea but the Word himself can be conceived. But, being invited, together with the ministering Friend, to the house of the ancient widow Hall, I went willingly with them; but the sweet silence commanded in me still remaining, I had nothing to say to any of them till He was pleased to draw the curtain and veil his presence, and then I found my mind pure and in a well-bounded liberty of innocent conversation with them."

PATIENT CONTINUANCE IN WELL-BEING.—Whether we be high or low here, bond or free, it imports little, seeing that these differences shall be so quickly at an end. With particular men, it is so in their graves; you may distinguish the greater from the less by their tombs, but by their dust you cannot, and with the whole world it shall be so in the end. . .

Now this is the great rule, for all the servants of God in what state soever, to set the Lord always before them (as an exact workman is ever and anon laying his rule to his work, and squaring it), to do and suffer His will cheerfully in everything, being content that He choose their condition and trials for them; only desiring that He hath chosen them for His own.—Robert Leighton.

Science and Industry.

"Those are my precious things," said the chemist, as, exercising my privilege of exploring in the laboratory, I peeped into a small box on whose crimson velvet lining shone a collection of crystals of many colors, some rough and jagged, imbedded in pieces of stone and some skillfully cut into gleaming polished facets, which caught and reflected the rays of light. There were rich red garnet masses, dainty columns of tourmaline, turquoises of robin-egg's blue, one sapphire of clear azure, amethysts, opals with fiery gleams, sea-green beryls, and other bright mineral fragments. Among them I noticed a small, dark green stone of no special beauty.

"Why do you have this dull thing among your pretty gems?" I asked.

"That," the chemist answered, "is one of the greatest treasures."

I looked more closely, but saw nothing attractive in the stone, except its fine, soft lustre.

"See!" said the chemist, suddenly turning on the mineral the light of a gas jet. Instantly fiery gleams flashed out in its darkness, and it blazed into a rich, red glow like a royal ruby.

"This stone, the Alexandrite," said the chemist, "does not show its beauty in the daylight, but, by the artificial light of gas or fire, it blazes into its glorious color. God makes them different, stones and people. Don't think you have seen the whole of a person in one light, under one set of circumstances; sometimes you must wait for a special light; to see shine out the noblest beauty of a soul. There are persons like the Alexandrite, and they are treasures."

In a large glass tank, filled with sea water, sea moss and mud from the oyster fields off the New Jersey coast, the oysters may be seen. Here is the spat of the oyster before hatching and here may be seen the development of the oyster from the spat or egg state to the ostreidae or young oysters.

Within two hours after the spat of the oyster is deposited, it begins to undergo a transformation by hardening and the changes which follow are numerous until the young oysters become living shell-fish two weeks later. These tiny oysters cling to everything that is stationary, nature impelling them to do this in order to escape being swept away by the tides. Some specimens are shown in the cabinet at the World's Fair, clinging to an old pipe that had been dropped into the bay, others are seen clinging to a doll, others to a baby's shoe and others to a set of false teeth that some one had lost. As a barnacle the young oyster clings to anything that comes its way. It does not move but attaches itself to various objects.

The oyster is good to eat at three years of age and is prime at four years and over. The New Jersey exhibit shows all of the phases of the oyster industry. The spat, the young and old oysters, the tongs for catching oysters in shallow water, the iron dredge with chain attachment for dragging the bottom of the bay for oysters, pictures of the oyster spat and pictures of the spat or eggs magnified many times.

The clam industry is also a feature of the New Jersey exhibit, the various stages of the clam being shown from the egg to the soft shell or little neck clam, which is the young clam, to the hard shell or old clam. Lobsters and crabs are also shown in their several stages.

Or take a handful of quicklime and four ounces of linseed oil. Boil, and pour out on a plate until hard. Melt and use.

Or take one pound of common glue—not fish glue—in two quarts of skim milk. Soak and boil. All these are good.

To Loosen a Rusty Screw.—One of the simplest and readiest ways of loosening a screw is simply to apply heat to the head of the screw. A small bar or rod of iron, flat at the end, if reddened in the fire and applied for two or three minutes to the head of a rusty screw, will as soon as it heats the screw, render its withdrawal as easy with the screwdriver as if it were only a recently inserted screw. This is not particularly novel, but is worth knowing.

How to Soften Putty.—Putty which has become hardened by exposure, as around window sash, may become softened and readily removed by the use of the following mixture:

Slake three pounds of quickstone lime in water and add one pound of pearlash, making the whole of about the consistency of paint. Apply to both sides the glass and let it remain for 12 hours. At the end of that time the putty will be sufficiently soft so that the glass can be lifted out of the frame.

How to Clean Polished Wood.—An encaustic composed of wax, sal soda and a good soap is excellent for cleaning and polishing at the same time. Shave the wax and the soap and dissolve them in boiling water; stir frequently and add the soda. When the wax and soap are thoroughly dissolved place the mixture in a vessel which can be closely covered and stir constantly till cool.

This mixture will remove ink from polished surfaces and may be satisfactorily applied to marbles bricks, furniture, tiles and floors.

THE MOST USEFUL TREE.—Of all forest trees the eucalyptus is the most beneficial to mankind. The list of useful articles it furnishes to the world, as told in the Saturday Evening Post, is almost incredible.

It is predicted by the United States Bureau of Forestry that within a few years the different varieties of eucalyptus will solve the fuel problem, both in America and Europe. In the rapidity and hardness of its growth this tree has no equal. Five years from the time of planting, groves raised from seedling will yield seventy-five cords of stove wood acre. Three to five years from the time cutting, sprouts that spring from the stum mature into trees that produce more cords the acre than the original growth. Repeat cuttings add to the thriftiness of the eucalyptus. A period of twenty-five years will develop trees the size of oaks known to be three hundred years old. In some sections of the Southwest where oak has been nearly exhausted as fuel the eucalyptus is taking its place.

Some varieties thrive in tropical swamps others flourish in the mountain snows far above the timber-line. To every degree of climate and condition between these extremes so species from this prolific genus is adapted. Scientists have demonstrated that eucalyptus has a wonderful effect upon climate. From some of the swampy areas of Italy malaria has been banished by the growth of eucalyptus groves. This is due both to the tonic medicinal effect of its aroma and to the tremendous capacity for absorbing water.

Notwithstanding the latter trait, however, some varieties of the blue gum will thrive on arid plains. Soil on which not even cactus will live will produce great eucalyptus trees.

The genus is invaluable as a source of timber. The uses it is put to in this regard are amazingly diverse. In Australia it is used extensively in the construction of ships, buildings, bridges, vehicles, agricultural implements, furniture, barrels, and hundreds of minor articles.

Faultless hardwood logs over two-hundred feet long, twelve feet in diameter at the end and thirty feet in diameter at the base, hewn from giant eucalyptus.

It is one of the most durable of hard woods. This is a remarkable fact when the celerity of its growth is considered. In repairing a decayed pier at Santa Barbara, California, it was found that a few piles were perfectly sound. Examination disclosed that they had been hewn from eucalyptus trees.

LEARNING TO BE KINDLY.—There are no people who excuse themselves from the little familiarities and kindnesses of life on the ground that they are not natural to them. These people say that they are reserved disposition, and cannot be free and easy in meeting other people.

But we can learn to be genial and generous, just as we can learn to row a boat or to tell stories or to write shorthand or to speak a language.

"That homeliness and unaffected simplicity of address which made Ruskin so approachable to child or man, was the work of a long discipline. The strongest of men, he made himself the servant of all, and judged his own standard his greatness had lain here," says Canon Rawnsley.

What Ruskin learned we can learn. Greater the difficulties we have to surmount the sweeter and more fragrant the gentleness we shall acquire. It will have a beauty of its own, because it will be the product of growth help in our lives, just as those whose love and friendship are most valued which wrung with most effort from the dearest natures.—Forward.

Items Concerning the Society.

chester Monthly Meeting, held at Moorestown, N. J., has changed its hour for assembling, from 8 a. m. to 9:30 a. m. This change is made for the better accommodation of members who have to go farther to Philadelphia.

Findings of Wm. C. Allen and Wm. B. Harvey in a trip to Rio, too late for insertion in detail until next week, exhibit one week of diligent labor upon military classes, prisoners, hospitals and elsewhere, and solemn impressions evident among many who had never heard of Christ or the Bible. Field hitherto closed to religious labors seems remarkably open to these Friends.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS AFTER.—In 1796 an excellent combination of Quaker and Methodist disciples and practice led to the formation of the Quaker Methodist body. To-day the members, numbering 10,000, and mainly in Lancashire, are well known as the Independent Methodists.

Some fundamental doctrines these bodies have much in common—although until four years ago they were but little of each other.

John Chamness and companion left Baltimore on the 3rd inst. for her home in Iowa. She had been some months engaged in Gospel service in North Carolina. Before the late Yearly Meeting there had gone through most meetings and families in the Eastern Quarterly Meeting and since then in B. P. Brown for guide and companion, spent nearly two months in an extended visit among friends in other parts of the State. Her labors there to have been greatly blessed.

Albert Cook Myers contributes to the Intelligencer of the First Mo. 7th, a very carefully prepared copy containing a verbatim et literatim copy of a large Fox's will. Francis Bugg seems to have envied the unorthodoxy of Fox's spelling or language, like J. Morgan who afterwards published will "to convince the world that he who made will could not write one Line of True English." The Friends answered Bugg in the question: "not the Gospel of John as bad Greek as any man's English?"

To Church of the future, says the Friends' Intelligencer, can stand on the sandy foundations of liberalism. As radicals we may have our own opinions and with them we may contribute toward the atmosphere, toward putting aside the mummies and stumbling blocks of creeds; but it will be at our peril that we stand in antagonism to the thought of those Christ-thinkers of our time who are really to get at meaning of their message, and to appropriate their contribution to the study of the gospel.

Some statistics for 1904, of all the religious denominations of the United States, given by the Christian Advocate, we find the following figures at the head of Friends: orthodox: ministers 1,281, meetings 830, members 92,820,—a gain in 1904 of 91 ministers and 15 members.

Liberal: ministers 115, meetings 183, members 45,—a decrease of 18 meetings and 1,295 members.

Conservative, or Smaller Bodies: ministers 38, meetings 53, members 4,468.

Primitive: ministers 11, meetings 9, members

Notes in General.

Native priests are now a part of the working force of the Catholic Church in northern and equatorial Africa, in the Chinese Empire, in Korea, in Japan, Persia and in some of the islands of the Pacific.

John Wanamaker has devoted large sums of money to the erection of buildings for the Y. M. C. A. in the great cities of India, believing the work of that association to be the most hopeful of all mission work in India.

Hungary has expelled Mormon preachers. An appeal was taken from the action; but the Minister of the Interior has rendered a decision prohibiting the Mormon propaganda within Hungary, on the ground that such a movement is undesirable, both from the standpoint of state policy and religion.

The Pilot gives a description of "the most wonderful book in the world"; it bears the title of "The Passion of Christ." It was written as far back as 1640. It is neither written nor printed, but has every word cut into its pages and perfectly formed and can be read with perfect ease. The sum of eleven thousand ducats was offered for it by Rudolph II, of Germany. It belongs to the family of Prince de Ligne and is now in France.

J. H. Jowett, the distinguished English preacher, who is carefully considering the revival in Wales, says: "The movement should not be condemned because some part of it could not be explained." J. H. Jowett says that the events now taking place in Wales "are just the same as when John Wesley and George Whitefield swept through the country like a train of fire." Campbell Morgan has been in Wales studying the great movement.

We annexed with the Philippine Islands some 400 years of ancient history, on which there is in this country very little data. The documentary source-book of that history is published periodically for subscribers by the Arthur H. Clark Company, Cleveland, Ohio. The edition will hereafter be limited to the number actually subscribed for during the present month. Libraries providing for serious historical work to be done, may well take note of this.

The demand for deaconesses is very general. The training schools are not well filled with pupils, and graduates are hired at once. This situation obtains in all bodies having deaconesses. In the Middle West at the beginning of the year the supply in one religious body is fully one hundred short of the demand. In the East the demand is quite as great. In modern parochial conditions a pastor, like the head of a business house, has many things to do, and finds a trained woman for visiting indispensable.

Of the 177 Americans in Siam to-day all but about a dozen are, or have been, Presbyterian missionaries and their families. There are no other Protestant missionaries in the entire kingdom, except one agent of the American Bible Society. The King of Siam, who is the most enlightened Asiatic ruler, is interested in the Presbyterian missions and has given much valuable property for their schools and hospitals, and appointed Dr. McFarland, principal of the Royal College at Bangkok and superintendent of public instruction, and another missionary, Dr. Hayes, the surgeon general of the Royal Navy.

James Kekela, who has recently died in Honolulu, was the first Hawaiian ordained to the gospel ministry. In 1853 J. Kekela consecrated his life to the work of preaching the gospel to the natives of the Marquesan Islands, who were cannibals of the lowest type. For fifty years he labored among these people who at his death were civilized and living in peace in their quiet valleys. In 1864 President Lincoln presented to J. Kekela a gold watch inscribed in Hawaiian for his gracious deed in saving the life of an American ship's officer, who was about to be devoured by the cannibals.

The Wicklyffe Preachers in England, hardly fifteen years of age as a band of workers, have come to be the foremost Protestant agitators. The late John Kensit was their leader for a time, and now a training home is to be established just outside of London, to be named in memory of him. Agitation by High Church people in the establishment, and by Roman Catholics, is general throughout England. Everywhere, however, their efforts are counteracted by Protestant agitators, who declare themselves unwilling that fruits of the Reformation shall be lost. The tight little kingdom is in more or less of a ferment, chiefly more. The new home for the Wicklyffe Training School is to cost $40,000.

THE PEACE SOCIETY AND PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.—A cordial reception was accorded by President Roosevelt to Dr. W. Evans Darby, (who was lately acceptably among Friends in Philadelphia), the Secretary of the Peace Society, 47, New Broad Street, London, E. C., at the White House on the morning of Tenth Mo. 31st. Dr. Darby presented a Memorial from the Peace Society urging the negotiation of an arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the United States. President Roosevelt warmly replied that he was in thorough sympathy with the movement, and added that negotiations for such a treaty were already in progress. By a happy coincidence the President's invitation to the Powers to attend a second Hague Conference was published in the Press that very morning, and formed part of the conversation. Secretary Hay's speech in Boston was also heartily endorsed by President Roosevelt. "Ah! He spoke well, didn't he?" was his remark.

A second Memorial was presented by Dr. Darby to the President from the "League of Universal Brotherhood and Native Races Association," referring to the lynching and lawlessness in the Southern States, and thanking him for his independent and impartial action in the matter. President Roosevelt was equally in sympathy with the object and terms of this Memorial, and expressed himself very emphatically on the subject, though he suggested that the Memorial should not be immediately published, seeing they were in the throes of a contested election. He welcomed, he said, any expression of opinion on this subject from disinterested and philanthropic outsiders, who had a perfect right to express themselves in regard to a matter that belonged to the whole of humanity. It would be his care, to the utmost of his ability, to secure the due and impartial administration of justice; and, he added, striking one hand into the other, "My dear Dr. Darby, I will never consent that any man shall suffer loss or be placed at a disadvantage because of his circumstances, or his color, or anything over which he has no control." No section of a community, he thought, could be guilty of wrong or injustice towards another without the whole community suffering. With the terms of the Memorial, which he observed was wisely and temperately worded, he was in the heartiest accord, and he especially noted the comment from Lowell with which it concluded:

In the gain or loss of one race
All the rest have equal share.

Dr. Darby also presented, on behalf of the Committee of the Peace Society, a handsomely bound copy of the fourth edition of a book ("International Tribunal") which he describes as having been found useful, and declared to be of standard value, by diplomats, international jurists, and others. This President Roosevelt cordially accepted with the remark that though he was not a Tolstoyan—he had fought, as his visitor knew, in the war—he was in hearty accord, and would give his warmest support to all measures and efforts for the promotion of Peace. This ended a remarkable interview, which left the impression of a genuine, sincere, independent, and large-hearted man who had set the good of humanity, not only of his own country, steadfastly before him.

We may add to the above Baroness Von Suttner's account, translated for the Friends' Intelligencer, of a part of her interview with the President, who spoke German. He greeted her with the words, "Yes, peace is coming, it is most certainly coming, step by step, and I too am working for it." And then Roosevelt spoke of the gathering of a new conference at the Hague, of the adoption of arbitration treaties between individual States, and for Austria, also, which he always kept in mind, he had some warm words "It is significant of the President's great energy," said Baroness Suttner, "that he has kept his promise."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch of the 6th from Washington says: Arbitration treaties between the United States and seven foreign Governments were made to-day by the Senate in executive session. The countries making the conventions are Great Britain, Portugal, France, Switzerland, Germany, Italy and Spain. All of the treaties are free of practical effect. The following are the most important articles being as follows: Differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent Court of Arbitration established at the Hague, provided nevertheless that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence or the honor of the two contracting States and do not concern the interests of third parties. In each individual case the contracting parties, before appealing to the permanent Court of Arbitration, shall conclude a special agreement defining clearly the matter in dispute and the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, and fixing the periods for the formation of the arbitral tribunal and the several stages of the procedure. Meetings have recently been held in this city and elsewhere to urge upon Senators the importance of approving of these treaties.

A despatch from Washington of the 6th says: The nomination of W. D. Crum, a negro, to be Collector of Internal Revenue for the S. C., was confirmed by the Senate in executive session to-day by a vote of 33 to 17. Crum had been nominated by the President three times and in addition had received three recess appointments. He is now serving under the last of these recess appointments. Confirmation was opposed by Senator Tillman, who objected to the appointment of a negro to the office.

The Supreme Court of the United States has reversed a decision of the Supreme Court of Iowa in two cases involving the construction of the Iowa prohibitory liquor law. The sending of intoxicating liquors into Iowa from neighboring States was judged unlawful by the Iowa Court. By the United States Court the judgment was reversed on the ground that it is in violation of a clause of the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

Governor Penneycker, of this State, in his message lately sent to the Legislature, says: "The State now owns 544,958 acres of land for forestry reservation purposes, and is under contract to purchase 154,363 acres more, making a total of 700,000 acres." They are of the highest time that attention be given to the preservation of our streams, gifts of God to humanity, which are essential to happiness and comfort and even to life. Our streams are losing both beauty and utility, and are being encroached upon by filling along their banks and using them as dumps for the refuse and pollution which come from the factories, factories, and cities. They are being seized upon by those who hope to make them commercially profitable, and in some instances the waters are being diverted from their channels." He recommends intelligent study to preserve the purity of these waters.

In a recent address to the American Forestry Congress in Washington, President Roosevelt said: "If the present rate of forest destruction is allowed to continue, a timber famine is obviously inevitable. Fire, wasteful and destructive forms of lumbering, and legitimate use are together destroying our forest resources far more rapidly than they are being replaced. What such a famine would mean to each of the industries of the United States it is hardly possible to imagine. Unless the men from the West believe in forest preservation the Western forests cannot be preserved. The policy under which the President creates these national forests is a part of the general policy of the Administration to give every part of the public lands their highest use. That policy can be given effect in the long run only through the willing assistance of the Western people, and that such assistance will be given in full measure there can no longer be any doubt."

A despatch says: The New Pacific Railroad has adopted the type of gasoline motors which it will use on its branch lines in Nebraska and Kansas, and this month will see a number of them installed and in operation. In general they will be used on the cars of an open passenger and freight coach, one end being fitted up for passengers and the other end as a baggage and freight car. The motor is between the two. It is expected that the car will develop sixty miles an hour, and its use will enable the company to give more frequent service on its branch lines. Only a motorman and conductor are necessary to run this car.

Dr. Abbott, Chief of the Bureau of Health in this city, has issued a circular letter to physicians in Philadelphia asking for the names and addresses of patients suffering from tuberculosis, the list of which is not to be made public. He says: "Cases of tuberculosis are not regarded in the same light as are those of the acute transmissible diseases. They are not, therefore, subjected to the same official supervision. Nevertheless, for the protection of the public health, it is essential that cases of tuberculosis be kept under sanitary supervision. The board recommends that all rooms occupied by tuberculosis patients be periodically disinfected during the course of the disease, and again after the rooms and houses have been vacated."

Philadelphia, it is said, now contains 287,558 dwellings. Estimating the population at 1,400,000, the proportion of inhabitants to a dwelling is 4.808. The average size of the American family is 4.7. In New York, in 1900, nearly two-fourths of the population were living in homes containing eleven or more persons. In Philadelphia only one-eighth of the population were thus housed. In Chicago and Boston half the inhabitants were living in such dwellings.

In an address before the Washington Academy of Science, Dr. Henry Kramer, of the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy, declared that the best application of the copper cure for dangerous drinking water is in the homes of consumers rather than in the public reservoirs. He said that he used the copper in the form of foil rather than the sulphate, because it is not always possible to obtain the salts or sulphates, and that four hours after the introduction of the copper foil he found all the cultures killed and wholly innocuous.

The sulphur mines of Louisiana produce, it is said, pure sulphur in great quantity. The first shipment were made in the Seventh Month last and were about 10,000 tons.

FOREIGN.—A despatch of the 8th from St. Petersburg says: The conference with Emperor Nicholas has been dealing with members of the Council of the Emperor, other ministers and advisers on the internal and external situation was continued to-day, but nothing was divulged which would indicate that the Government is prepared to depart from its present programme of continuing the war.

A despatch from London of the 29th ult. says: There are 25,000 orphaned women and children in Tottenham, an outer suburb of the metropolis. The crisis will assume appalling proportions if outside aid be not at once supplied. Young men and women, who are not householders, are seeking in vain for work. Every man, woman and child of these many thousands is in desperate need of practical human sympathy, and this need is not only a present one, but a permanent one. The cry is for help—help which they have already claimed—numberless victims.

The Government of Turkey has refused to allow the Bible to be sold on the streets on the ground that agents of the Bible societies indulge in a propaganda in explaining the utility of the Scriptures, and that as all propaganda are forbidden by the laws of the empire, the action of the colporteurs brings them under prohibition. Consequently the Government can no longer consent to the system of peddling Bibles, but must insist that the sales be confined exclusively to shops or the depots of the societies.

Large beds of iron ore of rich quality have been found on the shores of Lake Winnipeg, about 12 miles from the Canadian Pacific Railroad, and are now being explored with a view to their development. Coal also is reported to be accessible.

The Russian and Japanese armies along the Shakhe river have approached to within a short distance of each other, and a confined cannoning has taken place.

By the terms of capitulation at Port Arthur, all Russian soldiers, marines and civil officials of the garrison and harbor are made prisoners; all forts, batteries, vessels, munitions, etc., are transferred to the Japanese in the condition in which they existed at noon of the 3d inst. The total number of Russian prisoners taken at Port Arthur is stated to have been 878 officers and 23 soldiers.

A recent despatch mentions that the Canadian Niagara Falls Power Company have lately set in motion two of their 10,000-horse power turbines and dynamos. They are said to be the largest turbines and dynamos ever installed in the world, and their successful operation marks an important era in electrical development.

In many cities of Germany there have been established during the last forty years schools for the instruction of women in different trades. Among the trades are machine sewing, tailoring, linen sewing, millinery, washing, ironing, cooking, nursing, serving, domestic economy, embroidery and ornamental drawing. In many of these industrial schools the girls display a character as the schools of domestic science, in that young women are taught cooking and other duties pertaining to the home. These schools were founded to check the tide of young women toward the workshops and factories, and it is said their remarkably large growth attests their success and value.

The value of the output of gold last year is estimated at three hundred and fifty millions of dollars. The gold fields of the Klondike and West Australia have contributed to this amount.

THESSA WILDMAN, Secretary.

DIED, at her residence in Burlington, N. J., on Month 25th, 1904, MARY ANN HAINES, widow of Dr. Haines, Jr., of her age; a member of the Particularist loved member and overseer of Burlington Monthly Meeting of Friends, N. J. "Thou shalt come to thy full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in its season."

—, in Philadelphia, on the twentieth of Twelfth Month, 1904, ELIZABETH KENNARD, daughter of the Eli and Mary Kennard, of Barnesville, Ohio, in the 73rd year of her age; a member of the Particularist Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. She called upon to pass through a lingering illness of a critical suffering, her composure of mind and close of expression in reference to her disease, and her peaceful and cheerful endurance, were an example and lesson all who came in contact with her. Her faith and dependence upon her Heavenly Father evinced at all times, and the abounding love in her for every one, found frequent expression, and near close, in a message of "love to all the world." "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, . . . and they will follow them." Interment at Barnesville, Ohio.

The Declension in the Ministry.

The reasons usually given by notable men to explain why so few are now choosing the ministry as a profession, are to a great extent worldly-minded reasons. They convince us that the gospel ministry suffers nothing by being cleared of candidates with whom such reasons prevail as President Harper exposes. Young men find, it is said, that in these modern times the other professions are relatively more attractive. They "offer better opportunities for acquiring wealth." "The early influence of the minister has diminished," while that of the lawyer, physician, scientific investigator, industrial engineer, professor, teacher, or editor has increased. Vocational training in these times has taught young men a wider range of free thinking than the doctrine of a church would allow to be expressed. "Salary too poor to permit one to live in a fashion to win the world's respect"—for the world has come to estimate an individual man or his profession "in terms of a commercial character." The Methodist denomination, indeed, offers the station of bishop as a possible goal for a minister to aspire to, while in other churches this incentive ambition is lacking, or rendered more remote. The picture presented by these general advantages is pronounced "not one which would fire the imagination of a young man." Added to these are other explanations noted on self-seeking; as, that home-religion is once stronger than now, and father and mother do not, as formerly, set aside some of their sons for the ministry; and there is a general decay of religious expression in families. Also the theological uncertainty, which abounds in the present period of transition, deters many who are conscious that the trumpet has not the certain sound. As in transition periods, we have learned to apprehend that so far from being signs for alarm, they are a sifting out of "the things that are shaken, that the things which cannot be shaken may remain."

We cannot object to it, if the signs of the times should be sifting the spurious from the precious, the worldly from the spiritual, amongst possible candidates for the ministry, and that they whose eye is attracted by larger outward bait, "supposing that godliness is a way of gain," should be turned aside unto their own commercial place in life, from an employment said to be "the noblest of callings and the meanest of trades." But we would rather they should be born again, and unto a higher ministry, becoming authorized in spirit, and dedicated in heart for Divine service. We would rather they should be brought to the place of discovery that "woe is me if I preach not the gospel."

That those unworthy motives for "adopting" the ministry as a profession should be confessed as so prevalent, exposes so low a spiritual standard, adopted or winked at, for the carrying on of that which is called ministry, that we wonder its decline has not been manifest sooner. But we believe there would be more ministers if there were fewer, and they genuine as authorized by the Holy Spirit, being prophets of the voice of God. In the deepening of spiritual life as the fruit of these dedicated instruments, there would arise others converted to the same cause and surrendered on right grounds to the same divine service. Let all but the true voices be set aside, and more voices that are true will be heard from.

We have seen a day when there was shown a profound reverence in churches for the office of the minister, and a general regarding of his declarations as a preaching of the word of God. But it came more and more to light that the minister was speaking his own selected or best opinions—good sentiments indeed, but yet his own, and as such, human. The aspect of Divine authority has more and more vanished from the sermon, till neither preacher nor layman expects to stamp it higher than a religious lecture. There was one people raised up to stand as a testimony for the ministry of the Spirit. These would preach under his anointing, or else worship in silence. For this cause they found warrant to thank God for hearers to whom they could say, "When ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe."

But now large sections of descendants of these sons of the morning have joined in with the modern cheapening of ministerial discourse, perhaps never with finer and abler language of culture than now, or with less authority. Often in speaking it seems to be made an object to display a lowered standard—a product of human construction, book-marks in their bible as pre-arranged guides of discourse, paper note-slips as a substitute for the "Good Remembrancer," and much other advertisement that preaching under the title of "Friend" has descended from the prophetic to the man-made plane, also has become marketable, and not without reported instances of "preaching-matches" as means of deciding which of two candidates shall be employed. For this deterioration of the ministry from the word of God down to the words of men, ministers have themselves to blame, and cannot wonder that they have subsided from magnifying their office, or that their hearers receive their productions for what they are humanly worth.

But if our sons and daughters are not to prophesy, the Christian ministry is soon to be dead and gone.

We cannot now doubt that the prophetic principle for gospel ministry was committed to this religious Society to stand on, for such a time as this. The principle of ministry which has been in vogue among churches is confessedly veering towards an end of itself. Our question is, has a once prepared people gone too far in undoing that preparation of itself as an exponent of the true ministry, to be qualified now to say to Christendom, "Behold I show you a more excellent way?" We have nothing to boast of, in any quarter. Our much-abused principle of a ministry to be exercised only in the fresh openings and constraint of the ability which God gives is still held to in some quarters, but much creaturely imperfection attends, and none are more aware of it in themselves than ministers whose ideals are the highest. But there are embers of a living ministry yet preserved among us, and sometimes tongues as of the holy fire leap forth. Our hope still lives that the smouldering flax will not be quenched, till the Minister of ministers shall have brought forth judgment unto victory.

A Nation Alive to Religion.

In our Notes of general information there have appeared occasional allusions of late to a notable religious awakening now going on in Wales. Under the above title we find in the Boston Transcript an editorial review of the present situation of this movement, which we here extract as interesting information for our readers.

No such intense and far-reaching religious awakening has been known in Christendom for many years as that which is now sweeping over Wales, from one end of the land to the other. It has reached such proportions that London journals are sending their special representatives to describe the demonstrations on the ground, and to weigh their worth. The testimony of such cool, impartial outsiders is singularly unanimous in vouching for the genuineness and value of the movement. It is altogether the uppermost interest of the entire Welsh people to-day. It has taken hold of all classes of society. Theatres, literary clubs and political issues have lost for the time being their usual attractiveness. Frequenters of public houses have to such an extent deserted their customary haunts that the proceeds from the sale of liquor are in some cases only one-tenth of what they usually are. Estrangements and quarrels of long duration have ceased to exist. Especially is this true at Bethesda, the scene of the protracted disputes in connection with the Penryn quarry, where for many years the strife between capital and labor has been intense, and the residents have been divided into hostile camps.

So far as the revival can be ascribed to human instrumentalities, the most important influence has been exerted by a young miner named Evan Roberts. He is only twenty-six, and his smooth shaven face gives him a boyish aspect. Last summer, just as he was beginning a course of study preparatory to entering the ministry, he received what he considers a baptism of fire. It led him to return to his rural home to wait for further revelations from heaven. In the course of a week they seemed to come to him, and since that time, accompanied by several women singers, he has been going about from the churches, speaking for a day or two at each, and arousing a marvelous response. Modest and retiring in disposition, there is something wonderfully magnetic in his personality. He seems to have as clear a consciousness of a divine commission as ever Joan of Arc had.

But the movement does not appear to be dependent on any one man. It is breaking out spontaneously and with power in every part of the country. Great meetings are held at railway stations as well as in the churches, where morning, afternoon and evening large congregations assemble. Down in the mines, too, half-hour prayer meetings are held twice a day, the men in the different shifts descending a half hour earlier in order to enjoy the opportunity without trenching on their employers' time. Members of Parliament are joining with unlettered peasants in fanning the flames. Even the Anglican Church is introducing prayer meetings, and its members are as eager as Non-Conformists to reap the fruits. According to William T. Stead, of London, magistrates, policemen, employers of labor and other disinterested observers are one in asserting that the revival has done good, and only good.

The absence of the usual machinery in connection with such awakenings, and the unmistakable tokens of spiritual empowerment make this Welsh revival still more unique, and the phenomena can hardly fail to be scrutinized by religious leaders the world over. Of late the drift in the churches, both of Great Britain and America, has been towards the emphasizing of the cultural and educational sides of Christianity. The evangelistic and revival idea has been relatively disesteemed. It has been felt that the main hope for the Christianity of the future was in the careful, quiet, continuous education of the young in Christian truth and practice. But now comes this remarkable demonstration of the fact that the era of the old-time revival has not forever gone by. It has been proved over and over again in Wales during the last two months that men may rise into the spiritual life by a sudden and rapid flight, as well as by the more leisurely ascent through educational processes.

A fresh interest is imparted to the whole subject in its bearing on American church life by the fact that W. J. Dawson, of London, is soon to undertake among the Congregational churches of the country, under the direction of a national committee headed by Newell Dwight Hillis, of Brooklyn, a campaign of earnest, broad-gauge evangelism extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There are many who hope and expect that the outcome will be something akin to what is now taking place in Wales.

Water Baptism.

In reading the history of the early races in connection with the early Christian Church, it would seem that many of the rites and ceremonies which the Church later adopted were nothing but customs and forms used by the people in the heathen times. This seems true as far as it relates to water baptism. Robert Barclay says: "Infant baptism is a mere human tradition, for which neither precept nor practice is to be found in all Scripture."

It would seem that some form of baptism was found among the Hebrews, the Hindus, the Franks, Greeks and Egyptians as far back as we are able to trace these races. Among the Northmen we have the sagas, which chronicle the lives of these people from earliest time down to the twelfth century, and water baptism is frequently mentioned a long time before the Christian religion was spread among the people. It was not till about 1000 A. D. that Christianity was spread at all among the people, and for a long time after this the people clung to their old gods in preference to the new form of religion, which was slowly making inroads along the coast.

A custom existed among the Northmen, as well as among the Spartans of exposing infants, a practice which seemed to have been common among many of the races. If the child was to be exposed or was to live dependent on the father, or in his absence on the next of kin. The father would take the child in his arms and judge of it by its appearance, as to its qualities, etc. If he decided to let it live the practice of baptism was performed; if not, the child was exposed to die on a rock or out in the open ground away from the house.

In case the water baptism was used, called ausa vatn (meaning to sprinkle the child with water), the ceremony was looked upon as most sacred rite, and the integral part of the old Asa faith being of great antiquity, antedating the Christian baptism many centuries. To expose a child after this baptism was looked upon as murder, and for this reason it would seem that for that day and age of the world it served a good use and answered a certain purpose and a well defined law or custom. Water baptism was performed as soon after the birth of the child as possible. When missionaries began their labors it was no doubt easier to make inroads by adopting some or custom in vogue among the people, and time the meaning might change without changing form or custom. Thus, while as early as the eighth century a society was constituted to expose an infant if deemed customary, this changed, and course of time baptism or no baptism would not permit of this practice of exposing children. Still, if child-murder ceased with the advent of civilization, the form of water baptism was kept up for a very different purpose than which it was used for in the beginning. From the sagas we have many proofs that the water baptism, as practiced by the heathen, was not recognized by the Christian Church, but the rite was performed again a second time, much in the same manner, by the priest who took the place of the father. In the sagas the pagan form was called ausa vatn and the Christian form Skirn.

The child was often named after some renowned kinsman, and sometimes the person who performed the rite gave it his own name. It was believed that the luck of the name would follow the child through life. This rite of baptism was not performed by any clergy, but by the father, as the head of the family; for among the Norsemen, according to the pagan faith, there was not any recognized class we call clergy, but the head of the household performed all such services.

It would seem that this old heathen rite was taken up by early missionaries, and was later adopted as part of the creed of the churches. It would also seem that in the mind of the pagan there would be a close connection of a physical and spiritual cleansings by means of water, and in course of time was easy to adopt baptism as one of the sacraments of the church. Among the tribes of the North it would seem that water sprinkling of infants had a tendency to preserve such infant's life from the hands of murderers, but why this custom should be embodied into the creed of the churches has when such an ordeal became unnecessary, not so easy to explain.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IA.

It is not strength of brain that saves man, or orthodoxy of creed, or connection with a church. All these have often proved to be but ropes of sand. They are not proof against the tides of temptation. There must be firm, heaven-implanted principle; for one is safe in business, or in politics, or in social life, or anywhere, when conscience is loosened from God.—Cuyler.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

In 1844 a Council was held with the Seneca Indians at Buffalo, by the United States Agent borne for the purpose of paying them their just claims, in the course of which the Agent inquired of them how many were willing to emigrate to the Western Country; concerning which he had heard very conflicting accounts. Upon close questioning, five only, one of whom is not present were found, who declared their willingness to go, three of these were intemperate men and were frequently drunk.

It also appeared that two thousand dollars had been offered to at least one of these Indians, white men to induce him to go, and to use their influence to persuade others of his people to emigrate. Under these circumstances the Agent promptly informed the Council, much to the satisfaction of the Indians, that the Government would take no further steps to encourage them to leave their Reservations.

The Agent, however, informed them that by a treaty of 1842, they would be compelled to leave their Buffalo Creek Reservation, and advised those who still lived upon it, to make their arrangements, hard as it would be for them, to quietly leave their former homes, and seek new ones on one or other of their remaining Reservations.

This advice was received by most of the Indians in silence. George Greenblanket whose name was on the Buffalo Reservation, however, desired to be heard:—On account of the sickness of his child at home, he had not time to come, but he must say a little. He stated that in the dealings of the white folks with us we have been very injurious to our people. "They have come to us with false words, and got our children bound, who afterwards could not get released. Before this we lived in peace among ourselves, but now it is different: they have made some of our people hate each other when they were once lived in peace. Big Kettle told me the same before he died and warned us to beware of our white brethren. God had created me, and placed him on his farm, and he has buried his children here (pointing to the burying ground near by) aside of the graves of his brethren. His sick child, he expected would be buried a few days, and would be buried there; but he had supported him until now, and he believed it was the will of the Great Spirit, that should live and die here also.

"He should remain unless compelled to remove by force, until his Father called him me." This speech—but a faint outline of which is given—was delivered in the most impressive manner, and with a depth of feeling seldom witnessed. When alluding to his family at home, the speaker, was frequently so much empowered with grief, as to be unable to proceed for some minutes.

At a special meeting of the Committee held on the twentieth Month, 1844, the following minutes were made, "The attention of the Meeting being called to the suffering condition of the lives west of the Mississippi, both those under the care of our brethren of Indiana Yearly Meeting and those residing on the adjacent settlements, and it appearing that in consequence of the destruction of their crops by the unprecedented floods during the past season, they are reduced to extreme want even of the necessities of life; and believing it would be consistent with the object for which the funds under our care were raised to afford them some aid, it was on consideration concluded to forward to the Committee of Indiana Yearly Meeting the sum of four hundred dollars to be expended under their direction in relieving the wants of the needy and destitute."

At this time a school known as Friend's Shawnee School was maintained near Westport, Jackson County, Missouri, and the families in each tribe for a district of from fifty to eighty miles around it who lived on the water-courses had not only their dwellings carried away by the flood but their household stuff and provisions, leaving them destitute. Perhaps not less than five hundred families of the Ottawas, Delawares, Muncies and Shawnees were thus situated, among whom provisions obtained with a part of this money were distributed.

In acknowledging the receipt of this acceptable donation, Thomas Wells observes, "Could you witness the gratitude of some of these half starved and thinly clad women and children as they carry away their portion of corn you would be satisfied that in the bosom of untutored and half civilized Indians dwells some of the refined feelings of polished society."

In the Second Month, 1845, Ebenezer Worth writes to the Committee that he then had three schools in operation, one at Corn Planter one at Cold Spring and one at Horse Shoe, the former of which was taught by Edward Pierce, an Indian whose knowledge of our language, and his qualifications for teaching and governing had exceeded his expectations, and had afforded him much satisfaction. The other two schools were taught by white men and that sixty children had been receiving instruction in the three schools. Two other schools had been taught, probably public schools, which though open to the children of Indians were but little attended by them.

In the year 1846 the construction of the New York and Erie Railroad towards their Reservation with the prospect that it would follow the windings of the Allegheny River for a distance of twenty miles through their land, engaged the attention of their chiefs and leading men, as well as of Ebenezer Worth and other Friends. The latter were of the judgment that its construction through the Reservation would not benefit the Indians, but on the contrary introduce among them influences of a demoralizing character, which might seriously injure them. On the other hand they felt that it would probably be impossible to prevent it from being built, as proposed, permission having been given by the Ogden Land Company for its construction through the Reservation, probably between the years 1835 and 1842, and that all that could then be secured for the Indians, was a proper compensation for the right of way.

In the report to the Yearly Meeting in 1846 the Committee thus allude to the probable results of the construction of this highway, which, it may be safely said as respects the injury to the Indians, have been more than realized. "Besides the serious evils which will be likely to accrue to the Indians by association with the laborers, whom the prosecution of this undertaking will assemble on their land, they will probably suffer considerable loss as it runs for a great part of the distance through their best land, and in some places so near the river and to a newly laid out road, as to leave strips of ground scarcely worth clearing or enclosing. It will also occasion much expense and labor for additional fencing, and there is reason to fear not only that the damage done them, will be very inadequately compensated, but also that the facilities of intercourse and more rapid settlement of the adjacent country which will probably follow the completion of the road, will shapen the cupidity of those who are eagerly watching an opportunity to wrest from this feeble hand of aborigines, the scanty remnant of their once wide spread domain."

The construction of the railroad was followed by the erection at Salamanca, one of the stations upon the Reservation, by the Railroad Company of shops for the building and repairing of their cars, which employed a considerable number of operatives, and a town was thus started, which now, in 1905, contains over four thousand inhabitants; other settlements followed; and connecting railroads have been built.

In 1846 the Committee was able to say "The Indians have shown a disposition to resist the attempts of white people to settle on their lands, and also considerable firmness in opposing the sale of ardent spirits among them, and it is probable the reservation is now more clear of the article than it has been for many years." One person has been convicted and fined for selling liquor to the Indians, and two others indicted for the same offense." In this exclusion of intoxicating liquors from amongst them, the earnest and diligent labors of Ebenezer Worth who was greatly concerned on this account, were no doubt very helpful: but with the increase of the white population the number of persons who sell such drinks has multiplied until there are now in 1905 probably forty saloons in Salamanca alone, and although selling liquors to Indians is still punishable by law, yet practically they are easily procured by those who can pay for them.

DURING the war with Spain, we often read in the daily press that such and such a vessel had left port "under sealed orders." For prudential reasons no man outside the Bureau of Navigation knew the purpose of the movement or the destination of the vessel. The commander himself did not know, much less any of his crew, until far out at sea the orders were open-ed and the direction of the voyage determined accordingly.

It is a momentous day for a man when he leaves his old habits and associations at the bidding of conscience or duty, or any other of the manifold voices of God. He sails under sealed orders, and the Master's assurance is his only guarantee of safety. "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." He proceeds by faith, not by sight. He traverses unknown seas. He meets unsuspected enemies. Hands grow weary at the helm, and hearts heavy with watching. But the end is not in doubt. No man ever obeyed the commands of God who was not ultimately led to enrichment and victory.

AN EVER PRESENT HELPER.

"Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved." Acts ii: 21.

My soul, when morn from slumber gently wakes thee

Do thou arouse and on thy Saviour call.
When noon's quick, crowding duties claim attention

Ask help from Him, and trust thy All in all.

When day's decline brings welcome rest from labor,

Seek thou thy God as falls the even's shade,
Lo, at "the cool of day" of old in Eden,
The Lord drew near the man whom He had made.

Let each event thou meetest in life's journey

The precious opportunity afford

For asking blessings on thyself or others,

For fresh communing with thy risen Lord.

Through all the way, in pleasure, toil or sorrow, Thou then shalt find thy Saviour close beside,
No anxious care need fret thee nor annoy thee,
The heart can rest which in Him doth confide.

So that great hour toward which we all are hastening,

Will find thee watchful, neither deaf nor dumb,
When He shall say, "Lo, I am coming quickly," Thou canst reply, "Even so, my Saviour, come."
S. J. T.

The foregoing lines have been suggested by a sermon preached at Twelfth Street Meeting on the words above quoted from Acts ii: 21.

Eleventh Month 30th, 1866.—"This date again records the anniversary of my loved one's flight heavenward. Truly 'it is a time for memory and for tears!' The Apostle wisely administers the healing balm, when he tells us that these afflictions work for us a 'far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory,' if we look 'not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are unseen'—the eternal. May my eyes be more steadily directed to the 'mark for the prize!'

And now, oh my soul, remember thou the covenant made with Him who 'wounds to heal, and kills to make alive' in thy hour of deepest distress! He has fulfilled his part in giving thee victory at times of trial over thy most powerful temptations, and granting His Holy Spirit and consolation in hours of weakness, and, may it be said with humble thankfulness, in making thee at a few seasons His messenger to others. 'Eternal Spirit, let thy word prevail to take away the sting of human nature,' and grant me an increase of earnest living faith—of humility—and devotion to Thy glorious cause of Truth!"

Second Month 10th, 1867.—"I apprehend that most of those whose feet have been mercifully turned into the Christian path by the convicting power of the Holy Spirit, must yet, as heretofore, realize that it is 'a straight and narrow way' which leads to eternal life. That it is from the heart of man whence proceed evil thoughts and desires, leading to the act of transgression and sin, so that nothing less than a thorough cleansing of the inside of 'the cup and the platter' will produce fruit unto holiness, and the end (of) everlasting life. St. Paul says that he had not 'already attained,' nor was he 'already perfect' at the time of writing to the Philippians (iii: 12), but he 'followed after' and 'pressed towards' the mark for the prize, and this mark was nothing short of that indicated by his exhortation in Ephesians (iv: 13): till we all come unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." Paul gave no countenance to that specious delusion embraced by some professors, that we are not to expect deliverances from sinful practices in this life. His command in Colossians (iii: 5) is strictly in accord with the doctrines of our Society, viz: 'mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth,' &c. How aptly he describes the conflict which takes place in the soul of the believer when first convicted for sin, in Romans, chap. 7. But he positively avers in the next chapter (v: 2) that 'the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death,' so that the state spoken of in the preceding chapter, where he says that with the flesh he served the law of sin, must have been an earlier experience, and not his then present condition. This is confirmed by Romans (vi: 22), where he says to those he is addressing, 'but now, being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness.'

Sixth Month 2nd.—"My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death! These words of our Holy Surety seem to express my feelings this day. Various causes probably conspire to this state."

After mentioning some special trials, his lack of physical strength and endurance, causing mental and spiritual depression, and some trying religious service for individuals, he adds, "I think I shrink more and more in my natural feelings from speaking in public; may the fear of man not overcome my duty to my Maker. Oh! the doubts, the questionings and the misgivings that sometimes toss and try the soul in this service! Believing, oh Thou Holy One, that unless Thy Word be clearly given, it is safest to 'abide still in my tent,' I would crave of Thee to send out Thy Light and Truth to illumine and guide my tottering feet every day of this wilderness journey."

"The above remarks, written a few hours ago, I feel would be ungrateful to my compassionate Saviour, did I not acknowledge with humble thankfulness His kindness in raising me in some measure, from the low dungeon that I seemed shut up in spiritually, by His life-giving presence coming into my heart and answering my petitions for help. 'Bless the Lord, oh my soul and forget not all His benefits!' Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God! I am at times made sensible that even those accounted most spiritual do not render the incense of praise and gratitude to our Glorious High Priest as often as He would take pleasure in it. I am but an ungrateful creature, often complaining but seldom praising. Dearest Saviour, grant us the gift of truly grateful hearts; for this, as well as every other perfect gift, cometh down only from the Father of Light."

This gift of gratitude was conspicuously granted, though the struggle to attain it was not realized by his family until they had access to his Journal.

eldest daughter," he writes, "I desire to be duly thankful to Him, who has given me that unspeakable comfort of a firm trust and confidence that my dear child had been redeemed by His precious blood, through the acceptance of His grace in her soul unto repentance, truth, faith, and forgiveness of her sins."

1868.—"Since my last memorandum in this book my spiritual condition has been of varied hue, but I have felt that I might safely record a hope I have had to-day, that so progress is experienced from time to time (through Divine mercy), in that holy way which leads to 'the City that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God;' yet sorely have I often to feel that I take many halting steps through want of entire dedication to a humble, naked faith in Christ. I have lately been afresh convinced not only of my deep need of the renewed extensions of Divine love and the reception of spiritual food from Christ to keep my soul alive unto Him, but also knowing His atoning blood to be again applied, to wash away those stains of heart that arise from unhalloved thoughts and inconsiderate, yea, sinful actions, grown out of the old root of bitterness within. How does the Word of God which is 'quick and powerful,' discern 'the thoughts and intents of the heart,' and lay bare our most secret feelings and motives to our own view, in the same light in which they are judged by the Almighty."

DIVINE PROVIDENCE.—A traveler was hurrying along the esplanade of a Continental port to embark on a steamer starting at once for America, when he noted at his feet a plant of four-leaved clover. This seemed to him in accordance with the popular tradition, of good omen for his voyage. He gathered a tiny shoot of the flower, to find himself instantly arrested by the sentinel on guard near by, on the offense of gathering flowers on this public ground, in defiance of municipal prohibitions. Remonstrance, resistance were unavailing. To the police station he was hurried. As he had received his reprimand and paid his fine, and hurried breathlessly to the quay, a steamer was under way, far beyond any possibility of overtaking. The hapless traveler stirred with vexation and rage against an unfortunate clover-plant, the rascally sentinel, the insane regulations of the port, the world, his particular destiny, etc.

Some days later he was dilating on his graces to his fellow-guests at his hotel, when one of them handed to him a newspaper, which he opened, pointing to the tidings that the steamer on which he had been prevented from sailing, had gone down—"all lives lost!"

The youth was overwhelmed with emotion. Prostrate before God, he asked forgiveness for his anger: profoundly moved by the mercy which had saved him alone from amidst so many, he yielded his heart in gratitude of trust to Him who "willeth not the death of a sinner." A few weeks later he journeyed from the old world to the new, a new man. Christ Jesus, resolved that all his life long, whatever might befall him, even to the thwarting of his own desires and plans, should be accepted as the loving kindness of a faithful God.—Young People's Paper.

THE BLOSSOM.

Only a little shrivelled seed—
It might be flower or grass or weed;
Only a box of earth on the edge
Of a narrow, dusty window ledge;
Only a few scant summer showers,
Only a few clear, shining hours—
That was all. Yet God could make
Out of these, for a sick child's sake,
A blossom wonder as fair and sweet
As ever broke at an angel's feet.

Only a life of barren pain,
Wet with sorrowful tears of rain;
Warmed sometimes by a wandering gleam
Of joy that seemed but a happy dream.
A life as common and brown and bare
As a box of earth in the window there;
Yet it bore at last the precious bloom
Of a perfect soul in a narrow room—
Pure as the snowy leaves that fold
Over the flower's heart of gold.

—Henry Van Dyke.

Turning to God from Idols.

There occurs in a late number of China's Lions, an interesting and heartening account how a devotee to opium smoking was cured that entrancing habit, how he became a fever in the Gospel, and how he was instrumental in assisting to set forward others the better way. He had come from a small age about twenty miles distant from Hung-gu, to the latter town, where there is one the Opium Refuges of the China Inland Mission. He was favored to be not only red of the opium thralldom, but to witness range of heart. "He could not read and did not know how to preach, but he 'lived gospel,' and was pre-eminently a man of yer." He became prayerfully concerned behalf of his fellow-villagers—only about ty families of them—and a large propor- of them opium smokers.

With plenty of good land available for cul- tion, these people were nevertheless red to beggary—through opium. Here is picture of them in their extremity of in- nance and degradation. "Their homes were ost destitute of furniture, and their poor- ciated bodies were clothed in rags. Mor- ally they were utterly depraved—cursing, ting, stealing and vices unmentionable, as of daily occurrence in the village. Their tched condition was made more so by a ession of bad harvests. For two years ly any rain fell at the proper season, the crops were spoiled. Even when, during season, the rainfall was such as to inspire a swarm of locusts settled upon the young at and devoured every green blade. The ple were in great distress. In vain they ed the temples—there were eight in the ge—and burned incense and offered pray- to the idols there." Their gods had failed.

It was at this disastrous conjuncture of rs that the old Christian, animated by new faith that had altogether changed own life, suggested to his fellow-villagers the only way out of their miserable con- was to repent and break off their opium- ing. They appeared willing to make the t, but as they had neither food to eat, money to pay for medicine, they saw no to make a start. This the old man solved, however, by pledging his own land to secure the needed aid, while he likewise opened his house as a temporary refuge for the opium-smokers, waiting upon the patients, cooking their food, etc. There was some quarreling at first, but the old man was in earnest, and two native Christians assisting, the Gospel quickly found entrance, so that it was not long before the people began spontaneously to remove the paper gods from the walls and doors of their houses.

One man showed his interest by putting a cave, large enough to accommodate one hundred people, at the disposal of the missionary for use as a chapel. Others provided time and labor to improve the place and make it more suitable for this purpose. The work spread rapidly, and many of the villagers were converted. Several who had some opium in a few acres of irrigated land, but who were now convicted of the evil of so doing, plucked up the young seedlings, and thus destroyed the crop. "The crowning day seemed to come when the villagers agreed to destroy the large village idols in the eight temples, situated some inside and some outside the village. From generation to generation, through- out a long series of years, probably hundreds, these idols had ruled the darkened minds of the people of this district. Now, however, the day had come when they were to be cast to the moles and the bats." Nearly the whole of two days were spent in this work of destruction, in which hundreds of idols were broken in pieces, some very large and heavy, weighing quite half a ton each.

The account further states that in the year or more since the above occurred, the blessing has spread to several villages in the vicinity, in these there being a number of inquirers. "In one village, containing about forty families, the Holy Spirit has been working very specially during the year. Many of the vil- lagers have broken off opium-smoking, and fifteen families, or thereabout, have put away their idols." Twenty-four Opium Refuges, some only temporary, had been opened in the dis- trict, and upwards of eleven hundred men and women, former slaves of the habit, had been released from the seemingly hopeless bondage. It is gratifying to perceive that the agency of the Holy Spirit is so depended upon in this curative and transforming work.

If some one is "King and Emperor by the grace of God," why may I not be a physician, an attorney, a teacher or a journalist; a ploughman or a shoemaker, or whatever I am—by the grace of God? The vision of Joel contemplates the coming of a time when the prophetic spirit shall be common. "Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy; your old men shall dream dreams; your young men shall see visions." Ruskin, points out that truth to the Divine ideal, in building and in life, is the best demonstration of harmony with the Divine mind. May we not say, therefore, that whoever puts himself in alliance with the highest forces is a prophet and minister of God? —Charles C. Albertson

"God is the spring of our best activity and fullest energy. He is also the haven of deep and untroubled rest."

On The Road to "Wellville."

Among the hopeful signs of our time, we are glad to note a growing appreciation of physical culture, an admiration for a well-developed physique, indicating "power through repose." Seventy-five years ago our young people were of a different type—languid, pale, sentimental youth was tolerated if not encouraged, while vigor was counted inelegant. But happily we are aware now that the greater demand on intellectual ability involves a corresponding strength of body. Children are sent to the gymnasium at an early age, the girl even outstripping her brother, since she avoids the tobacco or the liquor to which he enslaves himself.

It is however, another phase of physical culture which I should especially advocate: the man or woman in middle life, whose office routine or sedentary habit needs just the antidote of brisk exercise for fifteen minutes daily.

Many a mother argues that her domestic duties are sufficient, but they reach only one set of muscles, and the very languor of which she is conscious could be cured by Swedish movements each evening before retiring. One matron with whom we are acquainted says "this is only fit for children," yet she is an invalid. A wiser course is pursued by a dear friend, over seventy, who claims that "the older we are, the more necessary is it to limber the joints," and who keeps herself young by a systematic round of simple gymnastics daily. How much more rational is such a life than one which ignores the laws of health in various ways, and then resorts to medicine.

"An apple a day keeps the doctor away," is a wholesome rhyme, and when we add to these the cold sponge-bath each morning, and the drinking of water between meals, not at them, we are far "on the road to Wellville."

Walking is becoming a lost art since other means of locomotion are so easy, yet we may cultivate pedestrianism, by beginning with a short distance and gradually increasing, until many miles can be covered without fatigue, as evinced by our English cousins. An erect carriage and deep inhalation during this exercise bring a sense of enjoyment and vigor, which sends the blood bounding through the veins—a fine remedy for cold hands and feet.

We recall a story told us by an aged Friend, how in boyhood he felt doomed to an inherited pulmonary disease, but was advised by his physician to live out of doors as much as possible, and to form the habit of deep breathing; this was before the days when consumptives were banished to Colorado or the Adirondacks. Such home-treatment resulted in a complete cure, for we remember him as a wonderfully erect and healthy old gentleman of ninety.

Surely fifteen minutes daily can be given by us all to these easy methods of keeping in good condition, a duty we owe to ourselves and to our friends. A little less newspaper reading will give us the time, and if two or three in a family agree to exercise together at a certain hour, each inspires the other, in a course of Swedish movements alternated with Delsarte.

On a smooth voyage across the Atlantic recently, the passengers formed a large class on deck, and did some excellent work, assured as they parted in England that they felt stronger, happier and better acquainted for this rational diversion—physical culture. The very attainment of deep, slow breathing is in itself an antidote to sea-sickness, which largely arises from dread, from tension caused by resistance to the watery environment. If the voyager can only put himself in harmony with this unfamiliar element, can enjoy it as a wonderful evidence of Divine power, he feels himself "rocked in the cradle of the deep," a confidence possesses him, and he conforms his breathing to the stately motion of the vessel; a sense of repose becomes his habit, while he loves the sea in all its variations.

A hale and genial Friend, a beloved minister among us, was fond of jumping rope each evening, when a girl, and continued this exercise to the close of her three score and ten, maintaining that it benefited the whole physique, by well distributed activity. Another who was an elder of the most cheerful nature was, throughout his long life, an excellent skater.

The ascetic idea of ignoring the body's needs, of actually disfiguring and reducing it, has given place largely to the conviction that we are bound to make the best of ourselves, and that so connected are our material and spiritual parts, that neither can rightly succeed without the other.

The question of securing a teacher is a most natural one. There is generally some young person in a neighborhood who has received sufficient gymnastic instruction at school, to give a few lessons, either for compensation or from a desire to benefit others.

H. P. MORRIS.

First Month 2nd, 1905.

THE OPTIMIST.—A few months ago, the editors of one of our religious weeklies asked a number of well-known men and women to answer briefly the question, "Why am I an Optimist?" Among the answers given, a portion of Alice Palmer Freeman's was most significant:—

"My training as the child of a country doctor in a home where the daily interests of every member of the family centered in caring for the sick, the poor, the aged—where everybody brought his needs and his anxieties—this was the true training for an optimist. For no one can be permanently helpful who merely looks on at life, criticising those who work. To see clearly the tragedies and to spend self in trying to save, makes an optimist."

Perhaps the secret of optimism was never better revealed than in that last sentence. The true optimists of life are not those who have always "had things easy" and know nothing of care or trouble; neither are they the ones who resolutely refuse to acknowledge the presence of sin and sorrow. They are those who determine to meet facts honestly, and then give themselves eagerly, untiringly, to fighting the sin, and lessening the sorrow and the pain. Only he who has given himself to a cause knows all the allies of that cause. He who has devoted himself to the mighty work of advancing God's kingdom of righteousness sees, as others cannot, a thousand signs of hope and cheer in unlikely places.

WINGS OF A DOVE.

At sunset, when the rosy light was dying
Far down the pathway of the west,
I saw a lonely dove in silence flying,
To be at rest.

"Pilgrim of air," I cried, "could I but borrow Thy wandering wings, thy freedom blest,
I'd fly away from every careful sorrow,
And find my rest."

But when the dusk a finny veil is weaving, Back came the dove to seek her nest Deep in the forest, where her mate was grieving—
There was true rest.

Peace, heart of mine, no longer sigh to wonder;
Lose not thy life in fruitless quest.
There are no happy islands over yonder;
Come home and rest.

—Henry Van Dyke.

Science and Industry.

England is making extraordinary efforts toward the promotion of cotton cultivation in the West Indies. Four thousand acres are to be planted with cotton in the Windward and Leeward Islands and Barbadoes. Cottonseed is furnished free. The government is aiding in the establishment of factories for ginning and baling. The first of these factories has just been completed at Bridgetown, Barbadoes; another is being built at Antigua and a third is to be built at St. Vincent.

HOW TO DARKEN OAK.—Oak may be immediately and easily darkened by laying on liquid ammonia evenly with a rag or brush. The effect produced is just the same as is produced naturally by age and the color will not fade. Bichromate of potash, dissolved in cold water and applied with a brush, is another method of deepening the color, or new oak may be brought to any shade or nearly black, by the application of a decoction of green walnut shells. Be careful to apply each coat evenly.

TAKING OUT BRUISES IN FURNITURE.—If the bruise is very small all that is necessary is to soak it with warm water and apply a red-hot poker near the surface, keeping the spot continually wet until the bruise disappears, which will occur in a few moments. For larger bruises or dents wet the part with warm water and double a piece of brown paper five or six times, soak it, lay on the bruise, and then apply on top of the wetted paper a hot flatiron until the moisture has all evaporated. Keep this process up until the surface is level.

A NEW ANTISEPTIC.—Simple and harmless antiseptics are more and more demanded for household use by modern ideas of cleanliness and hygiene. Great interest, therefore, attaches to the report made by M. Henri Moissan, the man who makes diamonds, to the French Academy of Sciences, in which he describes a new chemical compound, sodium perborate. This is a white crystalline salt, made from boric acid and sodium peroxide, which, when dissolved in water, gives off over a hundred times its volume of nascent oxygen and leaves sodium borate, common borax, in solution. Nascent oxygen is extremely active and a very powerful germicide and disinfectant, while the cleansing and antiseptic properties of borax are known to every one. The substance seems likely to be of use in the home as well as the hospital, since it would not have the disagreeable and injurious odor of chlorine or formaline, and would not, like carbolic acid, be the cause of accidental or intentional poisoning. It could be kept dry and made available for use at any time simply dissolving in water.

THE USE AND ABUSE OF ATHLETICS.—An exhaustive examination of the case for and against athletics in the Medical Record, Dr. Robert E. Coughlin, of Brooklyn, N. Y., comes to the following conclusions: "The principal object in athletics is improvement of the general health. To obtain good health muscle-building is not a necessity.

"One cannot judge of a person's health by the size and hardness of the muscles. We have seen that the converse may be true. To obtain health one must not be in a perfectly trained condition, owing to the effects of severe training on the nervous system. There is no evidence to prove that athletics as a muscle-building improve the constitution. One should always keep in mind the fact that built-up or hypertrophied muscle has a tendency to degenerate. The heart being a muscular organ shares in this tendency.

Although the evidence for and against athletics is contradictory, the whole subject may be summed up by stating that athletics are beneficial when properly and judiciously applied, and very injurious when the precautions above mentioned are ignored or carelessly guarded."

ARIZONA CACTUS FARM.—A mile south Phoenix, close by the usually dry channel Salt River, is one of the oddest farms in America, says the Los Angeles Times. It is planted to nothing but cactus of every kind found within Arizona. Each kind is cultivated under the same conditions that prevail in its native heath, to as great an extent as possible, and most of them thrive well upon the hot skies of southern Arizona, cared for by experts.

The main owner of the farm is Dr. R. Kunz, a college bred German scientist, who has taken up the study of cacti and their cousins as his life work. A physician has particularly studied the plants for the possibility of securing products valuable as medicine. And the utilitarian side has been appealed to him in other ways, and he knows the plants wherefrom come good fruit, to that bear good water for the thirsty desert traveler and those useful to the architect of the aboriginal house builder. Arizona has become the source of supply for cactus for most of the botanical gardens of the world and this demand for plants has increased a lucrative industry has arisen from what would seem to the uninitiated one of the unpromising in the world.

The most prominent of the cacti of the garden is the saguaro. It is one of the marks of the desert. Its large white flowers cover the end of every branch in Fourth and Fifth Months, followed by a greenish yellow fruit, which, when it bursts, discloses a soft pulp filled with black seeds. This is a nutritious.

other species of far greater use, if not more so, is ceres thurberi or pitaya of the West, which was named after the late Dr. George Thurber, editor of the American Agriculturist of New York. Its northern limit is about a hundred and fifteen miles from Phoenix in a southwesterly direction, and extends into Arizona southward. The flower is white, nocturnal and smaller than that of the saguaro. The fruit of this species is of delicious taste, and for months is the support of tribes of Indians, who then feast upon it. The pulp also dried for future use, and a syrup, as well as an intoxicating liquor, is made from the fresh fruit. The Yaquis, Papeagos and other tribes largely subsist on the fruit of this cactus. The stem of this cactus grows from about two to twenty feet high.

Perhaps the queerest cactus of all America is ceres greggii of Arizona, known to Mexicans as yara matraca. Unlike any other cactus it has a very large tuber in place of fibrous roots and it resembles a great sugar beet on the surface, growing from two to four feet high, as thick as a finger and covered with very short spines. The tuber is medicinal, and is used externally in Mexico. It is the Arizona cactus blooming cactus, fragrant, the flowers are large as a saucer.

Englemann's hedgehog cactus, known as inocereus engelmanni, grows in clumps of two to twenty joints, having very large white spines, from one to one and a half feet in height. Its brilliant rose-colored flowers, very fragrant, appear in Fourth Month, and by the latter part of Fifth Month are covered by a crimson edible berry of the size of a large strawberry.

"Opuntia" is the prickly pear family, of which we have many species of various colors. The flat-jointed bear in some cases fine fruit, like the round-branched, often twisted like a rope, have a woody fruit, unfit for food. Some are met with on the desert, table-land and mountains. But most of these are seen either, cultivated on the cactus farm near Phoenix.

Discoveries Made in Silence.

The enclosed was written by a young girl anxious to her becoming a member of our religious Society, and when her home was entirely isolated from friends. I send it, thinking it might be given a place in THE FRIEND. Quakerism is of itself a pure system, and if followed closely will lead to purity and perfection. But for a correct sample of Quakerism I recommend you to attend a Quaker meeting, and there you will find what true peace and quiet means; there you will find a refuge from the noises and clamors of the world; and enjoy at once Solitude and Society, and possess the depth of your own spirit in stillness, without being shut out from the world by any of your species; there to be seen, yet accompanied; solitary, yet not desolate; singular, yet not without some to keep you in countenance. Here are tombs, no monuments; but here is something which throws light on the foreground. Silence, oldest things; language of old Night, and as deep as the night before the winds were made.

Frequently the Meeting is broken up without a word having been spoken, but the mind is fed, and you have been where that unruly member, the Tongue, has strangely lain tied up and captive.

What a balm it is to go and seat yourself among the gentle Quakers. Their garb and stillness conjoined present a uniformity, all enjoying the same silence, which is surely the most ecstatic pleasure a contemplative mind can enjoy. It is there we find that peace which is rarely to be found in the courts of the great, and incites us to contemplate and adore our great Creator. Silence affords to the contemplative mind a variety of pleasing sensations, which improves it, and renders it alive to the various beauties which are displayed in the great book of nature. Blest Silence! may we never forget the advantages that may be derived from devoting a part of our time to thee; but continue sensible of thy great value.—E. K.

Items Concerning the Society.

W. C. ALLEN AND W. B. HARVEY IN PORTO RICO.—Accounts received by a Friend from William C. Allen and William B. Harvey show that they had hard weather in reaching Porto Rico, where they arrived late at night Twelfth Mo. 21st. They at once proceeded to get into touch with government authorities who could help in opening the way. On the 25th, a Friends' meeting was held in the marine barracks, probably the first of its kind in that land. Amidst them wearing the trappings of war, the labor silent and vocal seemed blessed to all. Another meeting was held in the infantry barracks. The attenders from the forts belonged to the native Porto Rican regiment, and were a wild, singing, roaring lot of men. But they left the meeting after giving profound attention, some with reverent and awe-struck countenances.

The jail is a sorrowful place,—a child eight and one-half years old serving three months with others of tender years; and older prisoners infecting them with vice. The women's apartments exhibit the depth of immorality and degradation to which humanity can sink. To all these as they stood in squads before them, our Friends talked. Many confessed that they had never heard of Christ or the Bible. Many confessed they felt in their own hearts a condemnation for their evil practices, and occasionally some would shed tears as the love of Jesus and the need of repentance were presented to them. There are in confinement 625 prisoners, of whom about 200 are murderers. In the charity schools about 400 children were visited. In the court-yard under the blue sky very satisfactory meetings were held with the children. A wish was felt that children in our own land were as reverent as they.

Some of the places where our Friends have labored have never before had religious teaching or services, as jealousy caused by political and semi-religious conditions have barred such work. So wonderful has arisen at the remarkable way in which things have developed, and thanksgiving for a week spent largely in preaching Christ in San Juan, where He is so imperfectly known. In all cases but one, an interpreter has been necessary. The missionaries have shown a noble spirit for their help. The latter concludes thus: "Brethren pray for us; is well our cry!"

Notes in General.

If the ten or more denominations of Presbyterians come into the proposed union it will bring together in one organization two million or more members.

London stands first in the circulation of Bibles in 1904, and China second. More Bibles have been sold in China during the past year than in the whole five years previous.

Protestants and Catholics have given liberally toward the erection of a Methodist Church building in Montevideo, South America, intended to be a centre of evangelistic influence throughout the land.

St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Jerusalem, which was built by the English, was left by them unconsecrated in order to allow clergymen not belonging to the "apostolic succession" the use of its pulpit.

The Bible Societies of America, England and Scotland are working in union in Japan and they have published the Scriptures in cheap editions so that now the New Testament can be bought for two and a half cents and a single gospel at half a cent.

The great religious movement in Wales occupies large space in London journals and many prominent Londoners have visited and are now visiting Wales to study the phenomenon at close range. Among them are William T. Stead, C. Silvester Horne and Lloyd George, J. P.

Some clergymen are trying to discredit the revival on the ground that it cannot be explained,—that is, cannot be accounted for on the basis of any man's ministry. Others rebuke them for this notion that the immediate movement of the Holy Spirit depends on the intervention of a man.

Fanny Crosby, the famous blind hymn writer, at an advanced age, goes on long trips lecturing on missions and giving her time and money to the promoting of charities. She has written more than 6000 hymns and still writes them. Some of her hymns have been translated into all the tongues of Europe.

Tablets with cuneiform inscriptions which go back to the time of Egyptian rule in Palestine, 1400 years before Christ, have been discovered at the ancient city of Taanach, in South Palestine, and will soon be published. Only one such tablet has been found before in Palestine, the one found by one Bliss in Lachish.

What a mighty power for civic righteousness, says a Boston paper, would sweep this country if all churches, ministers and reformers would do and dare as well as pass resolutions. District Attorney Jerome has a right to expect such "to go with him to the mayor and to the courts to back up their fervid and multiplied words with deeds."

Dillon Bronson in his interesting letter from Jerusalem, written to Zion's Herald, says: "When one sees how many sects in this city claim that they, and they only, teach the truth, he wonders if the Savior does not weep over poor Jerusalem as of old, and does not grieve over the introduction of each new 'ism' from the Western world."

Murata, a high official in the Island of Kiushu, fifty years ago found an English New Testament floating in the harbor of Nagasaki. He procured a Chinese translation of the book and studied it with great interest for ten years with his relatives and friends. Murata became a Christian and afterward translated the New Testament into Japanese.

The Bohemians who come to this country have many First-day schools in which no Bible is taught, but doctrines of anarchy and atheism are diligently inculcated in the rising generation. Between 90,000 and 100,000 Bohemians live in Chicago. In Cleveland Dr. Schanfler and Dr. Adams are carrying on missionary work among Bohemians there with good success.

On the very spot where Bonner lived, who condemned Ridley to the stake, a new settlement is established on "Reformation lines," and to be called Ridley House, and is soon to be opened. The settlement is splendidly equipped and while spiritual work is placed first and the Church and not the club-room is the centre, there is scope for all sorts of social work.

According to the Review of Reviews there are to be no more legalized bull-fights in Spain, and industrial and commercial establishments are to be closed on the First day of the week.

May the reform reach America, where thousands of people together can brutalize their spirits by gloating over human bull-fights, as we heard a traveller recently call our foot-ball contests.

CAUSES OF HOMICIDES IN THE UNITED STATES, 1894-1900.—Quarrels, 31,516; murders, jealousy, 3313; liquor, 2845; highway robbery, 3151; infanticide, 1819; strikes, 365; outrage, 188; riots, 132; insanity, 827, etc. Total, 62,812.

Judge Thomas, of Alabama, recently showed that the number of homicides in the United States was one-third larger than the losses of the British army in South Africa in the same period. That is the Boer war cost England 22,000 lives, while the homicides in the United States were 31,395.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is stated that Henry Hippo, who founded and endowed the Hippo Tuberculosis Institute in this city, has given the 100,000 square foot building to the tenants, preferably in New York City, if the land at a feasible price shall be obtainable. For some years the City and Suburban Homes Company, of New York, has been doing this work on a limited scale, and has furnished decent and beautiful homes for persons of very limited means, and has made the enterprise self-supporting.

Secretary Taft, in transmitting his report of the Philippine Commission, says in a letter to President Roosevelt: "Except in the wild, mountainous regions of the unexplored island of Samar, and in the Moro region of the Rio Grande, and Lake Lanao in the sparsely settled islands of Luzon, and in the island of Jolo, conditions as to tranquility and order continue to improve, and except in the places mentioned, agriculture and the arts of peace are not at all interfered with by lawless bands or depredations."

A despatch of the 13th from Washington says: The Senate to-day ratified and made public an arbitration treaty for pecuniary claims which was signed at the second conference of American States at Mexico in 1902. It provides for the submission of such claims not settled by diplomacy to The Hague, unless both parties prefer that a special jurisdiction is organized. The treaty is to be in force five years. The countries signing are Bolivia, Colombia, Costa Rica, Chile, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, the United States, Guatemala, Hayti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Peru and Uruguay.

It is said that the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission has received over 20,000 applications for medals or pecuniary rewards, and more are coming in every day.

The number of immigrants landing in New York since the first of the year is said to exceed all previous records, and that deportations for the same period are also record-breaking. For the first ten days of the new year, 478 persons have been deported from Ellis Island, against 70 for the same period of time in 1904. Of the arrivals during this period 9135 were Hebrews. Of the deportations 55 per cent. were Hebrews. The arrival of the Russian and Hungarian Hebrews in such large numbers is largely due to aversion to serving in the army in Russia. There are also two large Hebrew societies in Europe systematically organized to assist immigrants to come to this country. This assisted immigration is strictly prohibited by the United States laws. The large number of deportations is due to the fact that the immigration officials have knowledge of these societies and are trying to break up the practice.

It is stated that the census returns show that in 1900 one-third of the people in this country were living in towns of 2500 or more persons. The country is so crowded that the number of poor persons in excess of the demand for their labor leaves the open country where their services are needed comparatively deserted. A statement has lately been made in The Public Ledger that at least 20 per cent. of all the people living in the sixteen foremost industrial States of the Union, with a population of 38,000,000, are in poverty or in such plight that they and their offspring tend to become paupers. The general intelligence of these 7,600,000 people in the industrial States must be added more than 3,500,000 degraded poor in the rest of the country, making a grand total of more than 11,000,000 inefficient and acutely suffering dwellers in the richest country in the world in a time of very general prosperity.

It is stated that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will plant 800,000 trees this year, for the purpose of obtaining cross ties, realizing the approaching scarcity of timber. The trees planted are the yellow locust, the use of this wood having been found durable and lasting. It has also been stated that the number of trees used annually in extensions and repairs is estimated to be from 90,000,000 to 110,000,000, requiring annually the entire product of 200,000 acres of woodland. Each year the supply of timber is farther from the base of transportation, many of the former sources of supply having been exhausted. The Pennsylvania Railroad is now compelled to get its supply from inland Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky and other States.

It is reported that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad is extending the use of the telephone for the transmission of ordinary business messages, connecting the division headquarters with the terminals of the divisions by means of the "composite" telephone method. The system admits of the simultaneous writing to and from a group of telegraphically without interfering with each other.

The conflagration in Baltimore in the Second Month last destroyed 1382 business structures. Rebuilding has been going on since with a view of improving the character and appearance of the new city. It is stated that the space formerly occupied by 424 buildings has been condemned and purchased by the city for dock improvements, street widening, straightening and openings. At present 377 buildings are rising on the 958 building lots left for improvement. Of the 457 lots on which operations have not yet been started, 387 have been made ready for the builders.

It is stated that after months of careful experiment Maj. George O. Spier, of the United States Signal Corps, has discovered that trees may be used to catch wireless telegraph messages and to convey them to an observer standing on the ground. He has found that trees may serve the purpose of Marconi's metal towers or masts or masts or towers, also serve as trunks to bring electro-magnetic currents to earth.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 12th says: The Government, it seems, is about to make the irrevocable decision that prestige abroad and the situation at home necessitate the continuation of the war till peace with dignity is possible. Beyond this point, however, confusion exists, especially regarding the immediate development of the interior situation. The lack of cohesion and alignment of the forces opposed to the existing state of things, and mutual distrust of each other's programme seems to make anything approaching actual revolution at the present time impossible. Socialists, revolutionists and other extreme elements, as well as the subject races on the borders of Russia, all have different objectives, with which the conservative liberals whom the Government really hopes to appease have little in common; and, above all, Russia's unnumbered millions of peasants, whom they have made the mainstay of the war, principally for economic reasons, and because it takes their loved ones away, have given almost no evidence of having been stirred by the prevailing political agitation.

A Berlin despatch relates the results of a riot in Warsaw between the "reservists" of the Russian soldiery and the "landwehr" of the Poles, which resulted in several killed. It says: A large number of reservists are now in prison. They declare they do not want to be needlessly slaughtered. "Put us in prison," they say, "If we go to the war we shall be killed. It is better to be sent to Siberia than to be sacrificed for nothing. Prison is warmer than Manchuria."

The British troops near the Shakke river are said to number 388,000.

In Great Britain the Government has issued an order permitting wireless telegrams to be received and forwarded at any postal telegraph office in the United Kingdom. Messages may thus be transmitted to a destination by wireless, using the necessary apparatus while at a distance of 200 miles or less from the stations on land. This order went into effect upon New Year's day.

A despatch from Washington says: How rapidly the good results of the American commercial expedition Abyssinia, which brought about the commercial treaty between the United States and that country, are being felt. The fact is that a report to the State Department from the American Consul General at Merselles, in which he says that many American orders now being shipped direct to Abyssinia and that trade between the two countries is increasing steadily.

It is reported that in the State of Campeche in Mexico an army of black ants has been seen in making its way to the State, destroying growing crops, and that number of persons and scores of animals have perished from their bites. Portions of this district have been abandoned on this account, and work of all kinds has been suspended. It is said that the ants appear every ten years; where they come from and go to is unknown. The fact is that the ants do not live in deep water can not live in the Black Sea has long been known. The effort to stock it with these fish has failed several times. The cause of the failure has been attributed to the quantity of sulphuretted hydrogen gas in the water, which bacteriologists now say is due to the presence of countless microbes in the ooze at the bottom of this sea.

At the home of her son-in-law, Dr. J. C. Starr at North Adams, Mass., on the 12th of Eleventh 1904, after a short illness; RACHEL F. PARKER, in fifty-ninth year, wife of Ira J. Parker, of Penna. Penna., an elder of Muncy Monthly Meeting. As she much desired she just quietly "slipped away from sorrow and suffering" which had in recent years her portion. A few days before she passed to her rest, she remarked "I have had such a joyful time. His Presence with me all day, and this has often been feeling before any deep trial or suffering was appearing." Naturally retiring in her disposition, she was the midst of her generation without fully revealing the depths of the spiritual exercises through which she passed; but there was abundant evidence of those fruits of the Spirit which produce "a quietness and a peace forever." She will be greatly missed in the at her own meeting as a concerned elder ended with unusual degree of good judgment. For her being recognized for her faithfulness for "she bath done her duty." She was born in England, was married only two months before her death. Her life here on earth would not be long. Recently standing by the side of this dear child she said with much feeling:

"Some day, Some hour, at word of Thine Shall break the silver cord,
The foe fulfilled the rapture mine, Forever with the Lord."

HANNAN BOONE, the second daughter of Am Boone, deceased, at her home in Pickering, Ontario the 20th of Twelfth Mo., 1904, aged seventy-one years and seven months and nine days. This dear Friend, a member of Pickering Monthly Meeting, tendered her mother during her last days. She herself had for some time been an invalid, bearing her sickness with Christian fortitude and patience. She was of a quiet retiring disposition and by watchfulness to the last and leadings of Divine Grace, she was strengthened to walk boldly and unblameably before men, and to be beloved, and to have the witness that she had the happiness of an assured hope of blessedness hereafter through the redeeming love of her Lord and Saviour. Her walk was consistent with the requirements of a high and holy calling in Christ.

Atheism Unscientific.

It looks as if the unscientific reason of some scientific men, whether ministers or laymen, are running away with their rational reason. Why should all nature be an exception to self-evident truth that a mechanism proves there was a mechanic, and the orderly running of it that it has an engineer?

In every other instance known to us we are convinced of a maker by the thing made. Why would we drop reason, just as soon as all studies in science show only expressions of laws of a Supreme Intelligence?

The charm of scientific pursuit, and confidence in it, consist in ever fresh discoveries an unexplored, unexhausted Intelligence.

Wisdom, combined with far-reaching intuitions of Love and Helpfulness. The sciences, when brought out in their true clearness, are pages of a Supreme Mind's Word.

Without confidence in an Eternal Reason running through them, we would drop them as fables.

Every scientist confesses by his very persistence in study, that the organisms which he investigates have a systematic Planner—

Inventor more than a match for human comprehension, to say nothing of human or dental fabrication. The atheist scientist practically a self-contradiction, inasmuch as he latently believes more than he believes he believes.

What heart could he have to work in science, if he did not rely upon the laws of nature as tantamount to a Divine Wisdom? Would that Christians stepped out of the known will and promises of God, as confidently as scientists plant themselves upon immutable laws which they read in the book of Nature.

God has provided a way by which Life should be the death for every man, mortality be swallowed up of Life, and forgiveness found by the soul surrendered to his Life.

Life-saving and Murder.

Americans seem to show a deep earnestness in life-saving, and an appalling levity in life-taking. The result of some men coming into the world is to destroy men's lives, in direct opposition to Christ's purpose of coming into the world to save men's lives. The Address which Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has given to the public on "The Sacredness of Human Life" has come none too soon. The question is not whether it could have been prepared for this or that literary taste, but whether it has been prepared for Christ and for conscience. We believe it conveys a cogent message to the conscience of men and women, to co-operate with the Life Saver's purpose in coming into the world. May it reach legislators, courts, kings, editors, teachers, ministers and murderers with a conviction strong to turn their course from indifference to that of Life-savers together with Christ. To extend the circulation of the Address among readers who would not otherwise see it, it is printed in the present number. (P. 229).

As an indication that a quickened realizing of the inherent preciousness of human life may be dawning "in the air," we come upon the following from a South Carolina paper, the Columbia State:

That was a tale of thrilling bravery and self-sacrifice that the press despatches told of the wreck off Cape Hatteras. The crews of the life-saving service who went out in their little boats and rescued the shipwrecked mariners, performed a deed which deserves to live in history.

Twenty-two lives saved! Rescued at the risk of other precious lives!

But are lives precious after all? Is it worth while taking a risk to save a life? According to our standards it is worth while; but according to our practice it often is not. That is to say, almost any man will risk his own life to preserve that of another human being, but there seems to be a terrible callousness, nevertheless, to the taking of human life. It is an anomaly of human nature that this should be so—that men should be so ready to save life when it is endangered from accident or the elements, and yet so quick to take life in anger or passion, so ready to excuse or lightly to regard the destruction of that which is so dear.

One of the solicitors in a recent article published in another paper said that the editors write about what they are ignorant of when they criticize the courts, that the newspaper men could learn something about the way in which justice is administered if they would attend the sessions of the criticized tribunals. This is in striking contrast with a conversation among some newspaper men the other day; they were saying that the most conspicuous and shocking thing observed in the lesser and higher courts is the indifference manifested in cases where the taking of life is in question, that from the inquest of the coroner's court to the trial on the charge of murder, a homicide case develops not seriousness among those conducting the inquiry, but oftentimes a spirit of levity and of indifference to the grave matters involved. These newspaper men had seen attorneys engaged in trying the most horrible cases bandy jokes and jibes during the process of the trial, had seen even the judge on the bench not only permit levity, but indulge in it, and had observed the demoralizing effect on the audience, robbing the proceedings of that seriousness which the circumstances demanded, and depriving the public of that lesson which ought to be taught—that human life is precious and not to be lightly destroyed, that to kill a human being under any circumstances, even in self-defence, is an act that justifies the most solemn inquiry.

One of the things that need now to be done to restore the respect in which life ought to be held is to invest all the courts of justice, from the coroner's inquest to the highest tribunal, with the dignity and solemnity which is in keeping with the seriousness of the subjects that come before them. We need to be constantly reminded that human life is precious—the courts should always be permeated with the thought which actuated those brave men at Cape Hatteras when they launched their little boats on a raging, tempestuous sea to rescue the precious lives on board the stranded craft.

The divine, impartial justice of Truth does not give men something for nothing. It is folly to seek the reward of working if we are not doing the work. When divine Love says, "Son, give me thine heart," it is not enough that one half, or three fourths, or even nine tenths be offered, while the balance goes to selfishness and hate. If men were not capable of righteousness it would not be required of them. The man with the one talent was not expected to do the work of the man with five, but the full work of the one was justly required. God did not expect Judas to do the work of Jesus; but He did require the honesty and fidelity which he was able to give and through which he could have grown toward his Master.—Extract.

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Shortly after the death of Corn Planter, which occurred in 1836, a designing white man living nearer the Corn Planter tract, under a pretence of doing the children of the aged chief a kindness, induced them to sign a power of attorney authorizing him to collect an annuity of two hundred and fifty dollars, which was paid during Corn Planter's life to him, and which was also to be paid to his children or the survivor of them. In the course of a few years this man induced two of Corn Planter's sons Charles O'Bail and William O'Bail, his daughter Polly Logan, and a son-in-law, Moses Pierce to sign certain promissory notes acknowledging their indebtedness to him to the aggregate amount of several hundred dollars. A certain part of this sum appeared to have been justly due him, for money advanced to these Indians or for goods sold to them.

In the course of ten or twelve years judgments were found to have been entered up by this man against the Corn Planter tract, which in accordance with the laws then existing might be sold for the debt. In their distress in the prospect of losing their patrimonial estate, consisting of about eight hundred acres, which had been granted to Corn Planter by the Legislature of Pennsylvania for his services in influencing his tribe not to join with the Western Indians in hostilities against the United States; the heirs of Corn Planter turned to Ebenezer Worth to assist them in coming to a settlement with this creditor who they claimed had defrauded them. This was not an easy thing to do, as his accounts with the Indians had been very irregularly kept, and he declined for a time to allow Ebenezer Worth to inspect them. After several unsuccessful attempts to ascertain the exact condition of the affair, Joseph Elkinton and Joel Evans in 1846 succeeded in settling the disputed accounts by paying to the Individual referred to, the sum of five hundred dollars, and of obtaining a release from him of the principal part of his claim. The money was advanced by Friends, who were afterwards reimbursed from the annuity as it became due.

Some years after this a division of the property was made among the heirs of Corn Planter, under the direction of the Orphans' Court of Warren County, Pa., in accordance with an Act of the Legislature of Penna., obtained for this purpose. This Act guards these lands after the division from becoming liable to taxation on the lien of any judgment or claim, or from any judicial sale except to descendants of Corn Planter or to members of the Seneca Nation of Indians.

Jonathan Thomas who for many years was a valued helper among the Indians, and for a time a member of the Committee died in the year 1829. He was a nephew of Abel Thomas the minister, of whom a memoir is in print, and was born Tenth Month sixth, 1766.

From an account which his family compiled some years after his death, it appears that he was the son of religious parents professing the principles of Friends, and his father dying when he was about two and a half years old the care of himself and a younger brother developed upon his widowed mother. He says of her "she was a religious woman, and her counsel sank deeply into my mind at many times.

"I was placed with a weaver, and when free, settled with my mother to help her on with a living which I did for nine years, she being still a widow. She was again married in 1795.

"During said year, my mind was seriously arrested with the belief that I would have a duty to perform to some one of the Indian Nations; her marrying again seemed to open the way for a living for her without my care.

"I considered it the workings of an Omnipotent being, opening the way for me to prepare to perform my Indian prospects, in which I had many trials."

Under an impression of religious duty in the Tenth Month, 1796 and with the concurrence of Uwehlan Monthly Meeting, Pa., of which he was a member he removed to the settlement of the Oneida Indians in Oneida County, New York, where he taught school, engaged in mechanical trades and gave instruction in farming. He remained there about three years and returned to his home in 1800.

His concern for the Indians continuing, in the Fifth Month, 1800, he went to reside among the Seneca Indians on the Allegheny Reservation where he remained for two years and a half; and in 1803 returned there and labored among them again for about the same length of time. In 1806 he married Ann Lewis and settled upon a small farm in Chester County, Pa., but under an impression of duty left his home in 1809 to again assist the Indians upon the Allegheny Reservation, returning to his family in 1812, and at the request of his father-in-law took charge of his farm. He remarks, "After being there some three or four years, and having much business to attend to, my mind became impressed with the belief that I must again go amongst the Indians.

"Having many concerns of life to attend to and much business, I made excuses; I cannot go, I will not go; After laboring in this way for about a year, and still refusing to go, the language very intelligibly crossed my mind, 'well if thou wilt not go I will blast all thy endeavours'; I then became willing, knowing it was the language of an Almighty power; to have all my endeavors, both civil and religious, blasted, was more than I could think of, and I was willing to go. It has been said, 'my people shall become a willing people in the day of my power'; I felt that power and my will was given up. I may here remark one circumstance that happened in the spring of 1816. I was then a member of the Indian Committee; great anxiety was manifested for some one to offer to go amongst the Indians; I regularly attended its sittings and felt the anxiety that some would offer to go. "In the midst of this anxiety, a beloved Friend and preacher, John Shoemaker, I believe of Bucks County, Pa., had asked leave to sit with the Committee that day, which was readily granted; after Friends had expressed themselves, he quietly rose and said he felt no anxiety about it, for he believed Jonathan Thomas' mind was under impressions to go." "This was a hard stroke to me, knowing that I had never opened my mind to any one on the subject, not even to my wife. I knew it was revealed to him in that sitting." "I accordingly made ready and started in the Eighth Month, 1816, taking with me my wife and two children, and arriving safely in the Indian Country. We remained there until the year 1821. In the spring we returned home and settled on our farm, and became very comfortably fixed."

He had acquired a knowledge of two of the Indian languages, and had many opportunities with individuals and in their public councils to advise them to the relief of his mind. In reference to some of the exercises he passed through while among the Indians in which his wife was his sympathizing and steady supporter he said, "They would kill some of the people for the supposed crime of witchcraft which we endeavored to have done away. Our language to them, individually and in the public council, was, that such a thing did not exist amongst the now civilized nations. We had the satisfaction to hear from their Chief Corn Planter, and from their warrior Chief that the Council had been called to say that they were determined now to cast the thing behind their backs and never do the like again. I was called to their Council to hear the conclusion; on hearing it, I thought I never heard words that did me more good for I labored years to remove such erroneous opinions. They kept their word, and the evil was removed. While I resided among the school learning and the mechanical arts were included in our labors; many could read a white and interpret our language into the Indian. We had two Indian weavers, three blacksmiths, three carpenters, one cooper a several pretty good farmers."

His daughter writing of him says, "Though but a little child, I well remember his stern and serious deportment while laboring for the improvement of the Indian people; to them he was a true helper, and his counsel was often sought and his advice followed. It was a common expression with them 'Jonathan could not be wrong; he did not know how; and would about to leave them, as he told them, for the last time, some followed him to the river where he and family were about to embark, and the checks of men were seen the tears of grief, for the Indians loved their friend, as I felt they should see him no more."

After residing in Pennsylvania for several years he made a journey on business to Ohio in 1833, and from there went to visit daughter and her husband J. J. Lewis residing in Indiana, while on this visit he felt an impression that it would be right for him to move to that neighborhood, Falls township Madison County, in that State. He says, "I was walking along the road where our meeting house and grave yard now are, I felt a remarkable stop in my mind. I turned around, and had a full view of the ground where they now are; the language distinctly to my inner man, passed through my mind. 'Nay buy this place and give Friends a lot here, a meeting house and grave yard, and that thy bones may be laid.'"

Following the impressions thus made upon his mind he purchased this property and moved to it in 1834, and in the retrospect of his life in 1839, he writes: "When I look back to that day, and remember that there were but three or four families of Friends here; then again look to the crowded state meetings on First days, I am humbled under the consideration of the progress of our meeting, and I believe that some valuable friends are amongst us. I have to acknowledge that the hand of God has been in this, that encouragement to attend to small duties, what the reward! It is peace to the mind, having performed them." A serene and peaceful calmness was experienced by him in closing days.

He died on the sixth of Ninth Month, 1839, the seventy-third year of his age, and his remains were interred in the grave yard he had given to Friends for a place of burial.

Christmas War-Toys in Paris.

ALL the new toys for which this season is famous in Paris deal this year with the Russo-Japanese War, says a Paris dispatch to the Wendland Plaindealer. "Port Arthur (in cardboard), is fired on at every corner of the alleys by diminutive cannon composed of papier mache, and the battle of the Yalu represented in mechanical form through a revolution of a small set of cogwheels turned by the hand. We have the bold Cossack on horseback, looking much more formidable than the Cossack exploits in the East lead us to believe that he really is; and the toy shops are full of little models of Trans-siberian Railway. Dolls are made to resemble faithfully all of the more important leaders on either side, and one infantry toy represents a brave Russian, who has a single shot lays flat a file of ten Japanese, on whose painted faces is an expression of death.

"Nearly all the mechanical toys represent the Japanese getting the worst of it. In this even grown-ups are fond of these toys, which hundreds of new types are created each year toward the holiday season. They are usually sold by street fakirs, who pass in and out of the terraces of the boulevard cafes to cry their wares in high shrill voices. Everybody buys, nearly, for those who do not care for the toys themselves probably have the ones at home who do. The cost is insignificant in most cases; the Russian shooting a file of Japanese costs just two cents and warranted not to break if handled with ordinary care."

It is probable that the Japanese would show themselves professedly Christian, national opponents of Paris, a better example than the foregoing, inasmuch as they seem not to be in the mood to exult over their foes. Now, in Philadelphia, we may go into some of our large department stores, and in the sections devoted to playthings for juveniles, will see the war very elaborately treated, cavalry, infantry and artillery, redoubts, bastions and fortifications, and all the brave array of bayoneted muskets, cannon, swords and the like. They are indeed "only toys," yet are they a schievous agency in the spread of the martial spirit.

It is a practical experience with Friends that the limitation forms a part of Divine guidance.—Adam Spencer.

A Sketch of the History of Friends in America (Chiefly in Philadelphia) 1735-1775.*

BY ABBY NEWHALL.

Thomas Clarkson, in his life of William Penn, alluding to the years between 1682-1754, writes: "During the seventy years while William Penn's principles prevailed, or the Quakers had the principal share in the government, there was no spot on the globe where, number for number, there was so much virtue or so much true happiness as among the inhabitants of Pennsylvania." This period has been called, The Golden Age of Pennsylvania.

A brief review of the conditions existing at that time will show the wisdom of the opinion just quoted.

In a letter from William Penn to his wife regarding his children the following advice is given: "For their learning be liberal, spare no cost, for by such parsimony all is lost that is saved."

One who had written "No Cross, No Crown" in the twenty-fourth year of his age, would not be likely in later life to undervalue or overestimate the advantages of education. The privileges he desired for his own children he placed within reach of others; and schools were established soon after the settlement of Pennsylvania, that all classes might acquire at least the rudiments of education.

"In 1697 a public school was chartered, intended to be a Latin school of considerable advancement, after the fashion of an English grammar school, which still exists under the name of The William Penn Charter School. There were a number of branches throughout the city to give all a fair chance to secure these advantages."—("From a Quaker Experiment in Government.")

Among the Friends who came to this country with William Penn were several scholarly men, university graduates. One of these was James Logan, who acted as his confidential secretary, and filled several important positions in the Province of Pennsylvania.

He was a man of powerful intellect. His erudition led him into extensive correspondence with learned men in Europe. He bequeathed his valuable library of three thousand volumes to the citizens of Philadelphia, with the sum of thirty-five pounds a year for its maintenance. It forms part of the Philadelphia library, and is known as The Loganian Library.

In a letter from James Logan to his friend, Thomas Story, written from his country home at Stenton, he alludes to his young daughter as follows: "Sally, besides her needle, has been learning French, and this last week has been very busy in the dairy at the plantation, in which she delights as well as in spinning; but is at this moment at the table with me, being First-day afternoon and her mother abroad, reading the thirty-fourth Psalm in Hebrew, the letters of which she learned in less than two hours' time. An experiment I made of her capacity only for my diversion, though I never designed to give her that, or any learned language, unless, indeed, the French be accounted as such."—(From Life of James Logan, by Wilson Armistead).

Here truly was an example of the virtuous woman:

"How she seeketh the wool and the flax and worketh with gladness, How she layeth her hand to the spindle and holdeth the distaff."

And the so-called higher education was not omitted.

This same Sally Logan married Isaac Norris, who was speaker in the Assembly of Pennsylvania for fifteen years. And he it was who suggested the motto inscribed on the Liberty Bell now in Independence Hall: "Proclaim Liberty throughout the Land, and to all the inhabitants thereof."

"It was a matter of comment that Friends were the best educated people of the counties. The number of self-educated mathematicians and naturalists, especially botanists, among them was rather remarkable."—("From a Quaker Experiment in Government.")

In 1748 the Botanist Kalm, a Swede, came to this country and was much among Friends, as he found more interest in science in their society. Our native laurel is named in honor of him Kalmia.

John Bartram, who was born in Pennsylvania, lived at this time. His attainments in natural history attracted the attention of Linnaeus, who pronounced him the greatest natural botanist in the world. His house is still standing in the well-known Bartram's Garden. Over the window is placed a stone with the words engraven by his own hand:

"Tis God alone, Almighty Lord,
The Holy One by me adored."

—John Bartram, 1770.

Humphrey Marshall was also a botanist of distinction. These two Friends, John Bartram and Humphrey Marshall, from similarity of taste, had much intercourse with Dr. John Fothergill, of London, who had the best stocked botanical gardens in the world, except the Royal Gardens at Kew.

Lindley Murray, the well-known grammarian and philanthropist, was born in Pennsylvania in 1745. Among his writings, which obtained great popularity both in England and America, were the Power of Religion on the Mind, the English Reader series, and the Grammar of the English Language. These books, however, were written in his later life after he had removed to England.

An act to establish the Pennsylvania Hospital was passed by the Assembly in 1751. At this time Isaac Norris was speaker, and the first Board of Managers was composed largely of Friends. The inscription on the cornerstone, written by Benjamin Franklin, is as follows: "In the year of Christ, 1755, George II happily reigning, (for he sought the happiness of his people) Philadelphia flourishing (for its inhabitants were public spirited). This building, by the bounty of the Government, and of many private persons, was piously founded for the relief of the sick and miserable. May the God of mercies bless the undertaking."

Silk had been made in Philadelphia from the native mulberry, and Friends with others were much interested in this industry.

The Friends' Library, now in the building on Sixteenth Street, owes its origin to a bequest made by Thomas Chalkley by his will, dated Second Month 19th, 1741.

The words of the bequest are as follows: "Having spent most of my days and strength in the work and service of the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, and having been joined as a member of the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia for above these forty years, to them I give my small library of books." The number of volumes included in this bequest was one hundred and eleven, but it was gradually increased by donations of interested Friends, among whom were David Barclay and Dr. John Fothergill, of England. By the will of John Pemberton a large number of valuable books was added to the Library. An extract from his will states the books were given, "Wishing the beloved youth were more willing to read and become acquainted with the trials, sufferings and religious experiences of our worthy ancestors."—(From Journal of Friends' Historical Society, London.)

The Yearly Meeting was held until 1684 in Burlington, N. J. After that date it was held alternately in Burlington and Philadelphia, until, in 1700, it was decided to hold all Yearly Meetings in Philadelphia as most convenient.

In 1681 William Penn wrote: "The Church increaseth, which increaseth the business of the Church. And women, whose bashfulness will not permit them to say or do much as to Church affairs before the men, . . . when by themselves may exercise their gift of wisdom and understanding." Accordingly the records show that Yearly Meetings for women were in existence in this country in 1684.

One hundred years later (1784), during one of the sittings of the Yearly Meeting of London, it was announced that two women Friends were at the door desiring admission. One of these was Esther Tuke. Tradition says that, as the stately woman and her companion walked up the meeting, the clerk felt inclined to address her in the words, "What wilt thou, Queen Esther, and what is thy request?" It shall be granted thee even to the half of the kingdom."

The request was for a women's Yearly Meeting, and a document authorizing its establishment was at once issued by the assembly she addressed.—(From the Records of a Quaker Family.)

At that time there were meetings of Friends in Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, New Jersey, Long Island, New York, New England and Pennsylvania. Five thousand Friends attended the Yearly Meeting at Newport.—(Journal of E. Peckover, Journal of Friends' Historical Society, London.)

"The meeting at Nantucket was very large, more than fifteen hundred professors and four hundred out at sea fishing for whales."—(S. Fothergill.)

In 1747 certificates were granted to Peter Davis by South Kingston Monthly Meeting, R. I., for service in this country and Great Britain. If the records be correct he was at that time thirty-five years old, and yet he calls himself an "antient" Friend. This same Friend lived more than one hundred years, vigorous in mind and body.

The story is told that, on one occasion, as he was riding along the road, erect as usual, a party of younger Friends following thought him out of hearing, and discussed his great age, saying they would not like to live so long. The old man turned in his saddle and said gently: "Boys, it is sweet to live; I love life."

He enforced the judgment of the meeting, and the meeting was equally stringent with him. On one of his religious journeys a committee was appointed to inquire into his conversation and report upon it. The report was, they "found things clear concerning Peter Davis, all except his setting out on his journey before he had a certificate."—(From Narragansett Friends' Meeting.)

Friends were truly watchful over each other for good, and not afraid, in those early days to say very plain things. For example, in a Monthly Meeting of Rhode Island, the following was read:

"A man came to me in my field, and though I desired him to keep off, yet made an attempt to beat or abuse me, to prevent which I suddenly and with too much warmth pushed him from me with the rake I was leaning on, which act of mine as it did not manifest to that Christian patience and example in suffering trials of every kind becoming my profession, I therefore freely condemn it and desire that I may be enabled for the future to suffer patiently any abuse or whatever else I may be tried with, and also desire Friends to continue their watchful care over me."

Another Friend in New Jersey contended with a neighbor for what he apprehended to be his right; endeavoring to turn a stream of water to its natural course, "gave way to warmth of temper and put my friend W. into the pond, for which I am sorry."

The following is recorded on the minutes of one of the Monthly Meetings in Rhode Island: "Friends are advised to be careful how and what they offer in prayer, and not turning from supplication into declaration as though the Lord wanted information."—(From Narragansett Friends' Meetings.)

An event of general interest took place about this time. A change in the Calendar was effected by an Act of Parliament dated December 31st, 1751.

An act titled for regulating the commencement of the year and for correcting the Calendar now in use. The numerical designation of the months adopted by Friends, which made March the First Month, was legalized by an Act of the Provincial Assembly in the ninth year of the reign of Queen Anne.

London Yearly Meeting took action first, followed at once by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

They ordered that "the first day of the Eleventh Month next should be the first day of the year 1752; and that the month called January shall be successively called the First Month of the year, and not the month called March, as hath been so called heretofore."

In 1748 the Governor of Pennsylvania laid before the Assembly the defenceless condition of the State, and called upon them to grant money for a vessel of war, to be stationed in the Delaware, and to assist in the erection of batteries which had been begun. (At this time there was war between England and France, and a French privateer was cruising near the mouth of Delaware Bay.)

John Churchman was visiting Friends in Philadelphia. He felt himself Divinely called to go to the Assembly, "And lay before the members thereof the danger of departing from trusting in that Divine Arm of Power which had hitherto protected them."

In his address he said: "May it with gratitude be ever remembered how remarkably we have been preserved in peace and tranquillity for more than fifty years! No invasion I foreign enemies, and the treaties of peace with the natives, wisely begun by our worthy proprietor, William Penn, preserved inviolate until this day."

In concluding he said: "It is not from respect to the King or government that I speak after this manner, for I am thankful in heart that the Lord in mercy hath vouchsafed that the throne of Great Britain should be filled by our present benevolent prince, King George II. May his reign be long and happy!"

At this time Friends had the controlling voice in the Assembly. A prominent figure was John Kinsey; he led the Assembly who Friends constituted from twenty-five to thirty in a house composed of thirty-six members.

He pleaded both civil and criminal cases before the bar, sat on the bench of the Supreme Court, and was speaker of the Assembly for a number of years. At the same time he was an elder of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting a clerk of the Yearly Meeting.

It is related that in his early days he commenced speaking in court with his hat on. When the Governor ordered him to remove he declined, saying he could not do so for conscience' sake. The Governor ordered the officer to remove the offending hat, and the case went on. A ripple of laughter went round the court-room, and the incident was supposed to be closed. Not so the Friends, the Quarterly Meeting took up the case, declaring such proceedings to be an infringement of the religious liberties of the community. A protest was sent to the Governor, and the result was an order was issued that anyone professing to be one of the people called Quakers should be obliged to observe the ceremony of removing the hat in court.

This incident illustrates the care observed that the article in William Penn's charter regarding liberty of conscience should not be violated.

The later years of John Kinsey's life show a constant growth in activity. His summer home, The Plantation, was considered a charming country residence. It was located at the present site of the United States Naval Hospital.

In less than seven years after John Kinsey's death, Friends had disappeared so rapidly from the Assembly that they composed scarcely one-third of that body.—(John Kinsey, by Jos. Wallon.)

(To be concluded.)

I THINK of no truer test as to whether we are growing in spirituality than this: Are becoming increasingly sensitive to the approaches of sin? Does the sinfulness of sin continue to grow upon us? Are we becoming increasingly haters of sin? Christianity multiplies the list of sins. Acts which other religions condone and practice are counted the followers of Christ as sinful. Wherever I have gone in the non-Christian world or the darker parts of the so-called Christian world and have found Christianity spreading in its purest form I have found the number of things that are looked upon as sins multiplying in the consciousness of the people.—John Mott.

Seventh Month 16th, 1868.—"It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord." These words of David impressed my mind much in our mid-week meeting to-day, with feelings of great obligations to Him for His loving kindness and tender mercies to me.

I have long been convinced that one of the most dangerous temptations of those who have entered out of the vanities and corruptions of this life, to follow Christ in the way of His Cross, is to murmur at the asperities of the path they are bound to tread, in their journey to Canaan spiritual Egypt; and to forget the depth of the bondage they have been redeemed from. The exceeding great reward promised them by their Captain, if they persevere and overcome. They think only of the trials or privations of the present, not looking at the unseen eternal glory of the future life. Thus, fret repining and ingratitude are indulged and I apprehend great danger is run of being earthward and perishing in the wilderness, the murmuring Israelites experienced. I have found myself liable to this temptation, and although through the continued but unmerited favor of God, I may be more and more brought into the state I think I was favored in to-day, so that I may pay my vows to the Lord to His high and offer unto Him thanksgiving, only in sentiment and sweet feelings of the heart, but by a practical obedience to His revealed will in all things.

First Month 1st, 1869—"Another year is passing among the past and the solemn inquiry is pertinent,—How have I occupied those gifts of time, earthly possessions, and the blessings loving relatives and friends, as well as the superior mercies of Divine grace, which have so freely bestowed upon me within the past year? Truly it becomes me to acknowledge that I have been but an unprofitable servant. To incline my heart unto Thy testimonies and to covetousness seems an appropriate aspiration for me."

Fourth Month 18th, 1869.—"It seems so unsatisfactory, and I hope may prove a means of length to me, to record seasons of Divine favor, which have been experienced as waymarks in the wilderness. The children of Israel were commanded to take up twelve stones from the bottom of the river Jordan, when they passed over it dry shod, and to build an altar with them on its banks, in order to perpetuate the recollection of that great event at all the people of the earth might know of the hand of the Lord, that it is mighty." Although my small experience in religious things is indeed insignificant by comparison with the wonders testified of in the Scriptures, yet they are a part of that great plan of redemption of humanity from sin and its thralldom, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, which was ordained from the foundation of the world; and for I will with David 'remember the years of the right hand of the Most High.' I allude to the occasion of the late examination at Western School, where I was present as one of the Committee, and our being assembled at meeting for worship on Fifth-day with the children. I had greatly craved before the time for this meeting, that it might be a period of Divine favor and refreshment to us all.

Very soon after sitting down we seemed to be overshadowed by the heavenly presence and love of Christ, so that many were in tears, I believe, before a word was uttered.

Samuel Bettle was then engaged in testimony in a very affectionate and moving manner, and this was followed by—in prayer much to my relief of mind, and ——— preached most excellently, and in so great a measure of life, that it seemed to reach most of us and break up the fountains of contrition, in a manner that I have seldom witnessed. Surely our compassionate Redeemer that day baptized some of us by His Spirit, in a manner too obvious to be doubted! Death and barrenness are often the experience of some of us, in our religious meetings, so that the soul is sometimes led to cry out like the disciples in the storm, 'Lord, carest Thou not that we perish?' Let us endeavor in these proving seasons to remember that Jesus is 'the same yesterday and to-day and forever,' and although He may appear to be asleep, as He was then; His almighty power and care, over those whom He has brought with His own blood, is increasing; and as 'mighty to save' when His face is veiled from our narrow ken, as it is during the most evident times of refreshment, and the display of His overruling providence."

First Month 1st, 1871.—"This has been to me a day of spiritual refreshment and I hope of instruction from the Divine treasury. My spiritual conflicts for some months past have been closely proving, under a deep concern that I may be purified as the sons of Levi were required to be, in order to answer the holy requisition, 'be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord.'

I believe it to be good to wait in patience as at His feet, to hear the gracious words which proceed from His mouth, and not to offer a sacrifice before the people, except in His own time and way. A little evidence of Holy help and guidance was afforded in our family Bible reading, and again in our meeting, where the call seemed imperative to warn some careless ones of the danger of longer stultifying convictions of Divine grace in their hearts, calling them to repent and live. I may say I am satisfied of the authenticity of my call to this service, so that we would have been unto me had I not been obedient to the Heavenly vision.

May I ever dwell lowly and humble at the feet of the Saviour, where only I feel that there is safety for me."

Sixth Month 25th, 1871.—"I can testify from some experience of the trials as well as of the enjoyments of life, that there is no joy to be compared to that of being at peace with God, and knowing one's sins forgiven, through the mercy of His dear Son. All other sources of happiness are transient, and must pass away with this fleeting life, but this hope reaches forward to Eternity. Earthly friends must die, but Jesus is 'the same yesterday and to-day and forever!'

Amid sickness and sorrow there is no comfort to be compared to His favor and love. If we are favored with earthly happiness, and are surrounded by the beauties of nature, and the good things of this life, how a sense of our Heavenly Father's love in the soul heightens every feeling of enjoyment, and hallows all our emotions of pleasure!

Gratitude to Him, when it pervades the mind, is productive of the most refined and exalted happiness, and leads the possessors to the cultivation of kindness and consideration for all those with whom they may be associated."

The Sacredness of Human Life.

The frequent occurrence of lynching, of murder and of suicide in our country has aroused the attention of thoughtful persons to the increased disregard of the value of human life and has been attended with a prompting to inquire for the cause, and to suggest a remedy.

That proclivity of human nature, which indulges resentment towards those who have injured us or our friends, and carries that resentment to the extent of taking the means of redress or punishment into our own hands must be subdued, if even the ordinary liberties of mankind are to be preserved. How much more if the higher law of Christ, to love enemies is to be our guide!

LYNCING.

The temptation to the practice of lynching, which has sorrowfully pervaded many parts of our country, resulting from an increased impatience with the deliberate processes of law in dealing with atrocious crimes, and the thirst for vengeance on those who commit them, thrusts aside the safeguards of liberty intended to be secured by orderly government.

These motives if carried to the extreme which the first evil impulse prompts, would lay all members of a community open to the outrage of brutal passion. The reign of law having been annulled by a resort to mob violence, every one is thrown on his own resources for protection or defence, the effect of which must tend towards reversion to barbaric anarchy; a condition in which a loose rein being given to the worst instincts of our nature, those crimes which first aroused vindictive feelings will be multiplied many fold; unless at length sober reason and a sense of justice shall compel a return to the rule of law.

We would seek, to impress upon our fellow citizens and legislators, a sense of the solemn responsibility of depriving any human being of the sacred gift of life: a gift which none of us can restore when it is taken away. So fearfully and wonderfully is man made, in all the intricate mechanism of body and mysterious organism of mind, soul and spirit, that a more monstrous violence to a crowning work of God's creation cannot be imagined than that any but God himself should undertake its dissolution. No earthly consideration, no mortal's judgment is worthy to justify it, and especially awful seems the responsibility that rests upon one who has consented to send the immortal soul of a fellow-being, prepared or unprepared into the never ending conditions of eternity.

To assume the responsibility which belongs to the Creator and Giver of Life, of ending in his own time and way the earthly existence of those He has formed in his own image, is to usurp a right which the enlightened mind must admit belongs only to Him whose power must ever be paramount in the affairs of men.

The whole tenor of the life and doctrine of the Lord Jesus is contrary to the destruction of human life by men. "He himself said, "I came not to destroy men's lives but to save them."

And the apostolic teaching inculcates the principle of leaving vengeance to the unerring justice of our Supreme Judge. "As it is written, vengeance is mine, I will repay saith the Lord."

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

We are aware that many among professing Christians who admit or advocate capital punishment and war, ground their plea on the Old Testament law and history. These cover times of an ignorance which the long suffering of God bore with, before men were prepared to receive the teaching of universal love and benevolence, brought to light by our Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of all who believe in and obey Him. The gospel declaring that the Old Testament law made nothing perfect, brings in the new commandment of love, which seeks not to meet evil with evil and harm with harm, "but to overcome evil with good." In the progressive revelation of God to the sons of men as they are able to bear it, his latest word best speaks to our own condition and is the present authority for us. He is shown by Christ to have adapted his older teaching of men to "the hardness of their heart." The temporary features of the Law and the Prophets having served their time, the commands from heaven concerning our transferred allegiance to the Son of God, was "Hear ye Him." Why should our recourse for certain indulgences be to the law which "made nothing perfect," when the spirit of the gospel is found too pure for us?

We are persuaded that legal enactments which enjoin or permit the taking of human life, with the design to suppress unlawful violence against the persons of others, do in effect contribute to the spirit of bloody revenge and hatred which inflames the murderer's heart, and incites him to his deed. The nation cannot consistently imbrue its hands in human blood and expect to imbue the conscience of its subjects with a sense of the sacredness of human life. Governments cannot inculcate a principle which they violate. Clearly they must cease to accustom their people to ideas of homicide, if they wish to teach them that it is a sin.

Experience has shown that juries are often unwilling to bring in a verdict in accordance with the facts of the case, when it is known that the penalty of death in accordance with the law, would necessarily follow; and we believe the ends of justice, both in the protection of the community and the reformation of the criminal, would be promoted, if it was understood that imprisonment for life or for a long term of years would be the punishment in such cases.

WAR.

Leaving now the judicial method of taking life, we may glance at the enormity of a nation deliberately engaging in war, where thousands are induced or forced to place their lives and the surrendering of their convictions in the hands of fallible men, and to use their utmost efforts to destroy others, equally innocent with themselves, of any offence between the opposing nations.

A cool calculation which involves the sacrifice of many hundreds or thousands of the lives of its own people by a government in going to war, certainly impresses those whose highest conception of right and wrong is bounded by the law of the land, with a low estimate of the sacredness of human life. For these reasons we believe no small degree of accountability rests on such a government for the frequency of lynchings and murders.

To the people at large we would appeal that they may turn their attention to that sense of accountability which they have to the Divine law written on the heart, and bringing all their secret impulses and motives to the Light of Christ inwardly shining, be led to promote the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was heralded by the message, "Peace on earth, good will to men."

The application of the rule given by Christ Jesus to our intercourse and dealings with others, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them," is so easily understood and readily made that it would enable us quickly to decide between justice and injustice, right and wrong, if adopted as the law of our own conduct.

SUICIDE.

To those who, under stress of disappointment, difficulties and trials, are tempted to despair, and to terminate their earthly existence, we would open our hearts in sympathy, rather than utter the language of reproach. And yet to these we would recall the value of faith in Him who has given us a being and placed within our knowledge a sense of his power and love in thus making it possible to be inheritors of everlasting blessedness, as we patiently await the results of his providence; rather than to take the alternative of ending earthly existence, "uncalled of God," and appearing before his judgment seat as souls whose time of probation has by themselves been cut short.

By self-destruction life as a gift from heaven is ungratefully cast away, and a fatal break is made in that continuity of Grace which is intended to result in the full fruition of all that is possible to an immortal soul dwelling in the presence of ineffable light and glory.

Where a species of revenge possesses the mind, directed towards unrequited friendship and affection, the perpetrator of suicide must be ranked with him who takes the life of another; and can find no justification in the fact that it is his own life which has been sacrificed to petulance and passion.

THE SAVING REMEDY.

We believe that all our fellow-citizens who profess Christianity will agree with us that it is righteousness alone which exalts a nation, and while honestly differing as to our views of national conduct, can we not unite in looking to the Redeemer and Saviour of the world as our perfect pattern? As we profess allegiance to Him, shall not the spirit of his teachings and those of his immediate followers as expressed in the New Testament, be taken for our guide? If this is done we believe that war and the destruction of human life will be shut out. The hatred which breaks out between the different races and classes of men, the covetousness which is idolatry, the oppression of the weak by the strong, the selfishness of unconsecrated riches, and all those evils which spring from the lusts warring, our members will disappear from that nation or community in which the spirit of Christ hinders its full sway. The power of a nation which filled with the spirit of Him who is the Prince of Peace has not yet been shown to the world. Shall we, as American citizens, draw back from the race which is set for us to run in the sight of men? Let us not shrink from the high task to which we are called in the exercise of that spiritual power which is bestowed upon the faithful followers of Christ.—Address from Philadelphia Meeting for Sufferings.

Let Thine Eye be Single.

I was reading "The Simple Life" with much interest and admiration. It is certainly an invaluable gospel to those who are servants (in the worst sense) and not self (in the best sense), and to those who put weight on the result more than in the motive. Our lives will become perplexed and entangled as soon as it seeks to compromise with every phase of human life. I think that is seeking for eternal life on one hand and hunting for the worldly fame on the other, to-day for the absolute truth, to-morrow for the conventional excuse of doing evil; now in church and then in dancing hall and so forth.

It is truly out of possibility to combine together those opposite extremes, and still poetry to do so; the consequence is the destruction of simplicity and of harmony.

I remember now an instance which I saw while I was in Japan. Will you let me tell you a commonplace story?

It was in the spring of year before last when I received tidings from New York mentioning the death of a brother of my intimate friend. It was a great shock to me. My friend wrote to me that his brother was a very promising fellow with shrewdness and character though he had no means of carrying out his aim. He did not hesitate to face every obstacle in order to attain his aim. He became merchant, teacher, official and writer, with more or less success, but so far, not with absolute victory. He was incessantly acting his character was the curious combination of generosity and of ambition. He struggled the last breath of life, now warning his schemes then calling on the name of God. He fought like a lion and died away like a bubble.

This struck me very strongly. I did not know exactly why. But something restless and awfully seized my heart. I could not rest that day. At the evening of the same day I got another letter of death. It was from Sapporo, informing that an old woman who had been keeping the church building to which I belonged, died.

Of course I knew her well. She was strong, small, red-cheeked old woman, a vocation being to keep the building clean. She was a widow and had no child nor relations. She lived alone except with "the church." Her "the church" was everything. I used to see her looking so glad when she came from the building after her work, which was humble. But no one in this world ever could surpass her in devotedness and earnestness in this line of work. She had her own domain (not the church, but the condition of her inner life). She was the queen; she could maintained the peace and order of her dominion, while the great number of so-called rulers did to go in spite of their world-wide fame, and she died. I did not feel any regret or sorrow by learning of her death, but on the contrary did feel peace and calmness.

All the dread which I experienced in the death of the brother of my friend ceased to oppress my heart. I did not know exactly why ever since until that day. Now I can clearly understand by reading "The Simple Life" why I felt that way. I ought to notice the death of the former the utter lack of a simple life, and in that of the latter the eminent perfection of the simple life.

The former did not find out the sole object of this life or the simplest attitude toward this life, while the latter attained it fully, although the scope of work was unfortunately extremely small and limited.

As to the war raging still in Manchuria, I desire to say that humanity does not leave our world. Out of the maddening cry of thousands of thousands of so-called patriotic people, whose voices are heard clearly and persistently vociferating peace. But I am very sorry to say that no Christian (except Mr. Uchimera) has ever tried to nurse up this small voice. I believe I can say this without hesitation that the Christianity which was introduced into our world is the mere shadow, appearance, smell and residue of the true Christianity and nothing more. Or else how can it remain so powerless? Feel very sorry indeed.—From a Letter of Rev. A. Arishima, Christian Japanese Student, Harvard University, Twelfth Month 3, 1904.

Address of Bristol Friends, England, in 1850, with Reference to the Recent Attempt of the Pope to Establish an Ecclesiastical Supremacy in this Realm."

We, the undersigned, members of the religious Society of Friends in Bristol, feel depressed of stating a few reasons why we refrain from uniting with our fellow-citizens in any address to the Queen on the subject of the recent assertion of the Papal Ecclesiastical Supremacy in this Realm.

Protestants, in the broadest sense of the term, we yield to none in reprobation of this kind of Spiritual Domination, as an attempt to forge and more firmly rivet those chains of bondage to the spirit of Antichrist, which were broken, but not wholly cast off, at the period of the Reformation.

We can unite with our fellow-citizens in an expression of our loyalty to our beloved Queen, as the temporal sovereign of these realms, and of our strong attachment to her person and government.

But, for reasons similar to those which form us to acknowledge the claim of the Bishop of Rome to be the supreme Head of the Church, we cannot, directly or indirectly, attribute ecclesiastical supremacy to the temporal sovereign, believing that it cannot be rightly claimed by a human power.

The Church of Christ is a spiritual body, comprising all, under whatever name or sect, the true men, who truly believe the Gospel of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

We acknowledge Him to be the only Head of that Church, who is described by the Apostle as "the Head of the Body, the Church," of whom it is said that God "gave Him to be the Head over all things to the Church, which is his body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all."

We believe that this Headship has been never delegated to any human authority or power whatever; and that to lay claim to it, is to invade the prerogatives of Him, whose sole right it is, in a spiritual sense, to rule and to reign.

In connection with the Papal claim to Supremacy, we take this opportunity of expressing our views on another subject which strongly agitates the public mind; we allude to the Romish and Tractarian Doctrine of the necessity of the priestly office, as the only appointed channel through which the blessings of the Gospel are imparted to mankind.

We believe that both these assumptions proceed from the same spirit of Antichrist; and that Christ, the Head of the Church, is also the fountain of all spiritual blessings; that all are permitted to have immediate access to the Father through Him, without the intervention of a human priesthood; and that the claim of any body of men to exercise a mediatorial office between man and his Maker, is an usurpation of spiritual power, and an assumption of the Divine office, unwarranted in holy writ.

We trust that Papal Superstition, whether in an open or disguised form, may never be permitted to strengthen its hold upon our fellow-countrymen; and that the time may be hastened when the minds of men may be loosed from the shackles of all priestly authority, and when Christ may reign freely in the hearts of all who profess his name. From Sarah Chamberlain's Memoranda.

Cork, the Third Month 19th, 1770.—We had a Quarterly Province meeting here and were favored with the company of Thomas Wiley, of Waterford, Thomas Taverner of Limerick, who lately came forth in the ministry. We had a meeting appointed Third-day for the youth of this city, in which our dear friend Samuel Neal was tenderly engaged to put us in mind of the tender mercies of our Heavenly Father to us in sending his beloved Son into the world, that none might perish, but whosoever believes in Him may have everlasting life.

He was very particular to the youth to examine themselves whether they witnessed Him come spiritually in them. We had several good minutes revived and read in this meeting, with very pretty remarks and good counsel given thereon. And may we who were present never forget the mercies of our Heavenly Father extended to us, for sure it may well be said: what could have been done more for a people than hath been done for us, to incite us to fear the Lord and keep his commandments?

Third Month.—This month, Samuel Neal, Thomas Wiley and Thomas Taverner were concerned to pay a family visit to Friends of this city. They were at my mother's on the 25th, and gave us all good advice and counsel; but more particularly to us who were young to seek wisdom. And often to get into retirement to find the work going on in our own hearts; and to remember what great things the Lord hath done for us. But the preacher was jealous there had not been thanks enough returned for all his manifold favors extended to us. Oh may it be a means to stir us up to more diligence, and to search where we are deficient.

Our dear friends William Hunt and Thomas Thornburgh, both from America, travelled this Nation in 1772. They were in Cork the 22nd of the Second Month, at our First-day meetings, and Second-day at the Men's and Women's Meetings and Third-day and Sixth-day meetings. The first was a sharp, powerful minister, and of a very discerning spirit, and labored much with the backsliders and revolvers, and said he had faith to believe that there was a trying time hastening and very near approaching on all the workers of iniquity and transgression, and that the measure of iniquity was almost fulfilled; but that some present would be called home, before that time and that some of the youths would be made as standard bearers in the house of the Lord in that day, and that a glorious time would succeed. He enlarged much on those subjects in a very awful frame.

In the course of a private visit he related as follows: That being exercised on account of his wife, he retired in private, and during his retirement he was shown that his wife was doing well, and had a son, and when grown he should be a preacher of the gospel.

The farmer does not expect to raise a crop by yelling at his horses. He knows that he gets better work and more of it by quietly speaking to his team. We once lived beside a neighbor who was always having trouble with his teams, and his voice could be heard afar scolding at the poor animals. They had become so used with his scolding that it had no effect. Another farmer, on the other side, always spoke kindly to his dumb brutes, and there was a good understanding between them.

Some ministers yell at their people in such terms as to provoke and confuse their minds and wake up unkind emotions instead of loving, earnest effort. They that would rule men should keep low their voices. The quiet word fitly spoken is apt to produce good fruit, whereas loud speech rouses antagonism instead of persuading to duty. When God seeks to win souls he speaks with the still, small voice of the gospel. But it is from the top of Sinai that the thunders of the law come sounding in the ears of the disobedient.—Christian Instructor.

Notes in General.

W. G. Shellabear has translated the "Pilgrim's Progress" into Malayesian, and it will be published at Singapore by the mission press.

The Christian Register says: "We have in America at this time all the conditions for a popular religious uprising except one thing, namely, hard times in business."

It is estimated that in the mining valleys of South Wales alone there have been ten thousand conversions, and the great religious movement has penetrated into the remotest corners of the principality.

A Christian woman in Tokio is having 30,000 "comfort bags" made for the soldiers in the field, into each one of which she puts one of the gospels and a tract. The soldiers welcome these gifts most heartily.

The Christian Science Church in Boston, called the Mother Church, reported, Eleventh Month 1st, 1904, a membership of 31,423, a gain of 3000 for the past year. There are now 610 Christian Science churches, besides the Mother Church, in the United States.

"The Everglade Mission," carried on by the Episcopal Church in Southern Florida, among the Seminole Indians, is making steady progress from year to year. These Indians are great hunters and roam over a large territory, making it difficult to do much for them.

It is said to be the purpose of N. D. Hillis, pastor of Plymouth Church, to become Pastor Dawson's travelling companion, as he goes from city to city in the United States. Pastor Gmsnaulof of Chicago, will supply the pulpit of Plymouth Church during its pastor's absence.

Hudson Stuck, archdeacon of Alaska, says: "I shall travel nearly two thousand miles behind the dogs this winter. I am looking forward to it with keen anticipation. It will be an entirely new experience for me. Think of travelling at 60° below zero for days at a time."

Services are held on First-day mornings in three carbars in Philadelphia. The service is short and the men are in no way interfered with, yet many of them listen to the brief service and seem to enjoy the addresses, given chiefly by laymen. The men continue to smoke and attend to their duties while the service is being carried on.

A statement comes from Baltimore that J. Pierpont Morgan will come to the relief of the Catholic University of America by purchasing the Woodley property, the title to which that institution claims under a deed executed by Thomas Waggaman. There is also a rumor that J. P. Morgan may make a large donation to the university.

The number of Spurgeon's sermons sold since 1855 exceeds the number of Bibles circulated since the beginning of the century. Charles Spurgeon has been dead twelve years, but one of his sermons has been printed every Fifth-day for twenty-eight hundred weeks. Thousands are sold over the counter in a morning, purchasers coming before doors are open.

Centenary Church, Napa, Cal., has just celebrated its golden jubilee. Only one of the founders of this Methodist Church is living now. The earliest preaching was in a rough shelter known as "God's Barn." James Corwin, the pioneer pastor, cut the trees, set up the sawmill, dressed the lumber and was architect, contractor, carpenter and cabinet-maker. The present building was erected in 1867.

South Church, Lawrence, Mass., takes this way to cancel its mortgage debt: About two hundred members have agreed to contribute not less than one cent a day toward this object and have been supplied with glass banks for their offerings, which are to be opened at the dates when, twice each year, the interest on the mortgage is due, and the sum collected to be used for the reduction of the debt.

George Fox as a figure in a stained glass window may now be seen in the new Congregational chapel, at Fairhaven, Lytham, where a number of windows representing "Champions of Liberty" are now being placed. The Fox window is also the figures of Milton and Cromwell. Other windows recall the forms of Wycliffe, Savonarola, Luther, Tyndale, Henry Barrowe, and John Robinson. Bunyan, Watts, and Wesley are still to come; and there is to be a missionary window showing Carey, Williams, and Livingstone. Whilst a stained glass window seems somewhat out of keeping with the spirit of Fox, it must be acknowledged that he has been thus memorialized in good company.—London Friend.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The regulation of railway rates by a Commission appointed by the President has been under consideration at Washington in accordance with the recommendation of the President in his late message to Congress, that there should be additional legislation in order to prevent unjust discrimination. It is stated that Representative Hepburn's railroad bill, offered in the House, provides for a court of commerce to be appointed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and a new Commerce Commission, to consist of seven members, to serve for five years.

A strike of workers in cotton mills at Fall River, Mass., in which 26,000 strikers and their families were involved has lately been settled, after six months of idleness. It is said of this by the Public Ledger of this city, in bringing about a settlement of the long strike in the Fall River cotton mills, the new Governor of Massachusetts has not only ended a struggle which for protracted bitterness, costliness and suffering is probably unparalleled in the history of the textile industry in America, but has done a public service in giving one more conspicuous example of the wisdom and efficiency of arbitration.

The cultivation of vacant lots in and near this city by poor persons who have been allowed by the owners of the land to do so, has been encouraged by the Vacant Lots Cultivation Association for several years past. In a recent report it was stated that in the last eight years more than 4000 families have been assisted by the association and taught to become self-supporting by cultivating vacant lots in different parts of the city. The report is also stated that large corporations are now taking an active interest in the association's work, and among them the Pennsylvania Railroad, which has turned over to the society many acres of land on the Philadelphia division for cultivation by the needy poor.

Land, representing in all 1383 acres, and owned by thirty-eight individuals, corporations or institutions, was lent to the association last year, and all was put under cultivation. Voluntary contributions from charitable citizens were used in assisting unemployed men and women to earn a livelihood by the cultivation of vacant lots.

Lieutenant G. T. Emmons, who has lately made an examination of the condition of the Indians in Alaska, by special direction of the President, says in his report that the influx of white men into Alaska has caused a complete change of conditions; that the game is being rapidly killed and the food supply of the Indians rapidly exhausted, and that it will be necessary to do something substantial for them at an early day to prevent actual suffering.

The President on transmitting his report to the Senate has sent a message in which he says: "I very earnestly ask the attention of the Congress to the facts set forth in this report as to the needs of the native people of Alaska. It seems to me that our honor and our interest alike demand that we should do something earnestly good that legislation along the general lines advocated by Lieutenant Emmons can be enacted."

Prof. Monroe B. Snyder, director of the Philadelphia Observatory at the Central High School, has announced that he has discovered, what had been suspected, the existence of radium in the sun, and in the northern aurora and in aurora borealis. In addition to this he also announced that he has found radium and its accompanying emanations, the latter being identical with what he calls, coronium, widely and correlatively distributed in stars, new stars, nebulae and probably in comets. He declared also that while the phenomena of comets cannot yet be adequately explained the law of radioactivity more closely accounts therefor than any hypothesis previously advanced.

It is reported that an architect in the State of Iowa has devised a method of using glass for the outer walls of residences and public buildings. His system provides for a steel frame, to be supported by brackets attached to the beams of the floors, in duplicate, making two walls of opalescent wire glass, the glass being set in the framework. The glass walls are, approximately, a foot apart, making an insulating dead air space to prevent loss of heat in winter and undue heat in summer.

FOREIGN.—Workingmen in St. Petersburg having joined in a steel frame for the cancellation of their contract, a despatch says that on the 21st inst. the situation had entered an acute stage, and the strike had assumed an open political phase. Mill after mill and factory after factory closed. Throgs of workmen paraded the streets, and when their colleagues refused to join them, broke down gates and forced out the men. All the textile mills and every printing office in St. Petersburg were closed down. Over 100,000 men were out of work. Throughout the day workmen's terms were held, in which speeches were made, the wildest threats being uttered as to what would come in the event of the authorities and employers failing to meet their demands. A leader of the strikers, priest Gopon, sent a document to the Czar requesting him to meet the strikers on the 22nd inst., at 2 o'clock P. M., to receive a petition drawn from the hands of the strikers. This request was answered by order to be arrested as defiant and insolent. It was met by an order to the military to disperse the crowds in the streets and troops fired upon the people, who were unarmed, killing in different sections of the city some hundred men, women and children.

A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 22nd says: This has been a day of unpeakable horror in St. Petersburg. The strikers of yesterday, goaded to desperation by a day of violence, fury and bloodshed, are in a state of open insurrection against the Government. A condition almost bordering on civil war exists in the terror-stricken Russian capital. Uprisings are reported in other parts of the empire.

In Germany a strike has taken place in the coal mining districts, by which, it is stated, 200,000 workmen are arrayed on one side against a powerful combination of capitalists on the other side. In their demands the miners are seeking to better their condition as to wages and hours for working. The miners have also made a demand of extraordinary efforts of the German Emperor to prevent such a step, and have the powerful support of the Socialists. The Government commissions are taking statements preparatory to the Government forming judgment, and are giving consent to both bell and sword.

The Italian Government has issued a decree providing for the abolition of slavery in Italy's East African colonies. The terms of the decree are considered to be more liberal than those issued by any other European nation having colonies in Africa.

A despatch from Washington of the 19th says: Secretary Hay has secured positive results from his efforts to have an attempt made upon the integrity of Chinese territory. Recently it was reported that so of the Powers had contemplated extending territorial possessions they already had in China at the conclusion of the war, in order to maintain what they called the balance of power in the East, asserting that the outcome would have been a readjustment of Chinese territorial boundaries. A circular note was dispatched by Secretary Hay to the Powers, based on this information, with the result that they have now all positively disclaimed any such intention.

The French Premier Combes has lately resigned, and it difficult to make out a working majority in the Chamber which was identified in favor of those measures with which was identified. The separation of church and State, which has made great progress during his administration, notwithstanding continued and strong opposition, does not appear to have been the immediate cause of his retirement, but the operation of the Government system of collecting secret information respecting the lives and political opinions of army and civil officers.

The announcement is made that the construction of a great trunk railroad line in China running northward from Canton to Peking, a distance of about 1700 miles, will be hastened, as the interests of a syndicate of Belgian capitalists in it have been secured. The project is a gigantic one, involving Pierpont Morgan, of New York, and others. It is said there are populous cities all along the projected route, and those which are not tapped by the main line will be reached by spurs built to connect with the trunk road. From Hankow to Canton alone 123,000,000 people live in a country contributing 50,000,000,000 of dollars, as many of the whole of the United States. The country is fertile, productive and the climate an agreeable mean between the extremities of heat and cold. Along the whole route, now covered by caravans and trading trade, is a chain of cities, towns and villages waiting to be awakened to commercial life. When completed, it is said, it is to be operated in connection with the Chinese Government.

Rest in Work and Work in Unrest.

About the tireddest man we ever saw was in son for life, without work. If he had been day-laborer he would have been less tired, yet a weary man because he had not a far conscience to rest him in his work. On the other hand the most rested, refreshed and refreshing persons we know are those who regularly at work, having a conscience of offence toward God and toward man. "Sabbath" was formerly called Rest-day, either by Hebrew or by Anglo-Saxon. But why may not the work-days be rest-days also? Why entering into work not an entering into rest? That depends on what spirit we are of. Any hard-working drudges can say, "We that have believed do enter into rest." While any who do not believe, work in unrest and rest in unrest.

He who labors faithfully under implicit confidence in God his Saviour, and doing whatever his hand finds to do heartily as unto the Lord, works with a restfulness of spirit, a divine composure which is a rest sent down from heaven, ever supplying refreshment of spirit. But working with a guilty conscience up-hill labor, and is not eased though one works with ferocity to divert his mind from the uneasiness of sin. Restless while at work, is more so when idle. He varies his mode of diversion from himself. Ardent spirits may be summoned to work him, or invite brief diversion; or other modes of intoxication, by mental excitements, dramatic indulgences—any of a thousand substitutes for peace.

However secret the inward unrest of unbelief, the discomposure is there; and however veiled by artificial diversions, there remains a "fearful looking for of judgment." This is a weary work, and secretly tiring out the duration of life. But "the work of righteousness is peace, and the effect of righteousness is quietness and assurance forever." The peace of God, which passes understanding, shall keep the mind and heart of the believer by Jesus Christ. They who keep the peace, shall be kept by it. In the most strenuous work they shall be rested by it. The body may be temporarily tired, but the rest of spirit which the believer enters into, recruits it speedily. Saving faith is a saving health. But it allows the body in the course of nature to subside, leaving the believer free to enter unhampered into the rest that remains for the people of God.

"And blessed is she that believed. For there shall be a performance of that which hath been told her of the Lord." This faith is confidence in what the Lord tells us. Faith is not credulity for everything man tells us, though he wear a mitre. Faith is evidence, not credulity—the felt evidence of things not seen, the witness for Truth of the invisible. How it keeps the head above the waters of worry, and the believer from making haste or hurry. "His heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord." Accordingly he that rightly believes enters into work as a form of rest, as a mode of renewing and keeping up the strength of the working powers. For work is a food which enhances the strength by using it, and over-rest wears it away as much as over-work tears it. Pursued in faith it is conducted in the repose of God, who "worketh hitherto," and we work in his partnership. As laborers together with God we receive his grace not in vain, and the word of his grace is able to build us up.

The true rest is obedience, and not inaction, obedience to the law of the Spirit of Life—conformity with the will of God. The Restmaster and the Workmaster are one, even Christ, whose rule of restfulness stands ever the same: "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light."

He is a constant rebuke to their unrighteousness. But wishing Him away does not send Him away. If He is not present as a Friend, He is present as a Judge. Jesus Christ is a factor in human society of which this world cannot rid itself.—The Examiner.

Groping Towards the Light.

We find some honest young minds that are confused or bewildered concerning all that pertains to the letter or statements of spiritual Truth, but are loyal in purpose and conduct to the spirit and sense of pure truth in their hearts. This latter state is the hopeful part. It relieves us of a sense of discouragement about their attitude towards the letter and creed.

We desire this loyalty to this inward witness for good and truth should be encouraged, dwelt in and made the most of. The sense of Truth's own spirit and secret authority in any soul, however unsettled as to the letter and tradition one may be, should have the first place in his observance. Afterwards the literal products of Truth will be translated by the same Spirit to his understanding, as he is able to bear them. But let the Spirit in all things have the preeminence, the Life precede the letter as the horse precedes the vehicle, and he that follows Christ the Word and the Leader, shall not walk in darkness of the mere letter. But where the letter is placed first, taking the place of the Spirit, it killeth; but where the spirit predominates "it maketh alive." "It is the Spirit that quickeneth."

Therefore let us encourage in those who are not yet settled in the faith every budding forth of virtuous, every scruple of conviction, every virtuous or noble emotion, every uprising of unselfish love, every enthusiasm of a high ideal, every honest standing by a sense of truth, however crude. It is God working in them a salvation which needs a working out. If its expression cannot yet be clearly formulated in words, let the words wait. A holding to the spirit of good without the letter is more important than holding the letter without the spirit. The life is more than its raiment. Yet such is the helpfulness of the letter to us who are in the body, that in our own groping state we could not believe our Father would be so unkind as to leave men without a tangible and legible Message embodying his revealed will and purpose concerning us.

Such is the course in which some of us came to accept the Scriptures of truth, as they appealed to our inward experience and yearning for settlement on a true foundation; and when we see those moral and spiritual beginnings in honest hearted youth, we are not discouraged when their faith is not embracing the letter of scripture prematurely. But we are encouraged when we see in the beginning of their days the Word, which is the surest guide to their words, wherever written.

We can best travel with our youth for their help by giving full credit to the faith which is in their honest doubt, knowing that while they are trying to be good their doubt is but honest; for doubt when it is dishonest is first a stolen and later an unwoven excuse for sin. Men wish the gospel to be untrue that they may indulge their vices, and then the indulgence darkens their minds to the light of its truth. But let us not offend, or stumble, one of these little ones, by scolding at them for not seeing truth on the authority of man; or taunt them with infidelity unless we wish to confirm them in it. But let us patiently lead them to overcome evil and doubt by the good that already visits them in the spirit of Truth.

A deeper and larger faith must be a development by inworking grace, rather than an arbitrary cramming and imposition of statements. Yet these stored up in the memory are useful receptacles for the formulation of the grace which shall afterwards be received, and no parent is excused from inculcating the faith which he most surely believes to be for the salvation of those under his charge. Only let us not be discouraged if the Author of our faith is seen working mere good in a youth's mind and character, for the Author will press on and do his part towards being the Finisher of the faith in an honest heart. "In his light they shall see light," and "the Life is the light of men." "He that wills to do the will of God, shall know the teaching (of Christ and of Scripture) whether it be of God."

A Stranger in a Friends' Meeting.

A Harvard student recently accompanied a Friend to a Philadelphia meeting, and afterwards wrote of his impressions as follows:—

"It gives me a peculiar and strong pleasure to reflect that a journey, devoted mainly and as much as the brief time permitted to a survey of the social work in churches, should have ended in the Twelfth Street Meeting. The quiet atmosphere of that unadorned room, the conscious presence of an invisible influence, the placid faces and bowed heads—all that made the meeting,—fell on me like a benediction. I was sitting beside the river of silent prayers, and the steady flow of the current and the signing of the ripples, made a great peace for me!

"All this was peculiarly pleasant, I say, because in a tender and profound way I found there that life of the Spirit which I must believe is the message we need so much in America. I wonder if you know what I mean? I am trying to say this: that what we must preach to-day is the Christ in us, the Christ of experience: that we must not simply copy the historical Christ, but we must live, experience Jesus within us. Our lives must be the visible resurrection."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In consequence of the betrayal of the interests of the Indians on the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservations by some of their chiefs, in signing the treaty of 1838, a strong disposition arose among them to limit the authority of their chiefs in questions in which the sale of their lands was concerned, and to place an efficient barrier to the future alienation of them. One proposition which was seriously considered was to place the title to their two remaining Reservations in those whom they considered their friends, another was to place it in the name of the Governor of New York, and in 1845 a resolution of their Council was passed that no treaty for the sale of their land should be binding in future, unless executed under the signatures of two-thirds of all the chiefs, and two-thirds of all other men of the nation over twenty one years of age, all done in open Council.

Considerable dissatisfaction found expression at this time with the conduct of the chiefs in retaining as their own property the money paid by white settlers upon their Reservation, as rents or lease money.

In 1845 certain laws were passed by the State of New York by which the Seneca Indians residing on the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservations were recognized as a distinct community under the name of "The Seneca Nation of Indians" and as such were empowered to prosecute and maintain in all courts of law or equity in this State any action, suit or proceeding which may be necessary or proper to protect the rights and interests of the said Indians, etc. These laws recognized the superior rights of the community as a body over the rights of individual Indians, and provided that when any sums of money were recovered for the benefit of the Nation they should be paid to the treasurer of the Nation, if there was one, or if not to such person as may be appointed to receive the same by a majority of the chiefs assembled in full council. The treasurer was to be elected annually. Other officers called peace-makers were also to be elected by the chiefs annually, who were to hear and determine all disputes among the Indians in regard to matters relating to their own affairs. A marshal was also to be appointed on each Reservation to execute the orders of the peace-makers, &c. These laws contain penalties against the sale of intoxicating drinks to Indians. The enactment of these laws caused much dissatisfaction among the Indians for a time, especially among those whose influence was somewhat lessened by their provisions.

Under date of Sixth Month 2nd, 1846 Ebenezer Worth remarks "They continue to be much divided in relation to the new law which has been the cause of a good deal of trouble and excitement. They held a council at Cattaraugus some time ago. I understood it was pretty largely attended, the conduct of those who were opposed to the law was such as to render it necessary to send after civil officers to keep order while the chiefs transacted their business."

Shortly afterwards other councils were held on the Allegheny Reservation of which he says,

"I thought I felt as if it would be right for me to go and meet with them, I attended the separate councils and I think was enabled sympathize with them in their trials, and to them plainly what I thought the sorrowful consequences would be, if they did not settle the matter soon, and be more united among themselves, that the whites were seeking opportunities to take advantage of the present state of things, and their troubles and trials would be likely to increase. The opportunity afforded relief to my mind, and what I saw appeared to be well received."

At this time when comparatively few white persons had intruded themselves upon the lands of the Indians, it was much more easy to enforce the laws requiring their removal, than was the case afterwards, yet even then considerable firmness on the part of the chiefs was necessary to induce the proper officers to take the needful action. Ebenezer Worth was frequently engaged in endeavoring to assist the Indians in thus preserving the use of their land for themselves, and their children.

It was the duty of the Agent appointed by the United States Government to remove the whites, when requested to do so by the official representatives of the Seneca Nation, who in 1847 were the chiefs. Yet owing to various reasons the Agent frequently neglected his duty, and at times even appeared to take part with the offenders against the Indians.

The seventh of Sixth Month, Ebenezer Worth writes "The whites that were removed from the Reservation last spring have nearly all turned; there is strong reason to believe there was an understanding between those that were removed and those who removed them, an encouragement given them to return. A person who has been legally removed and turns to reside on the Reservation without license is liable to imprisonment; those persons act as though they were not afraid of the law would be enforced. The chiefs appear quite dissatisfied with the Agent on account of the way this business has been managed there was a number whose names were forwarded to the Agent who were not removed."

On another occasion he named five prominent Indians whom he had reason to believe "used their influence in favor of the whites remaining on the Reservation," although a large majority of the Indians was strongly opposed to it. Similar difficulties were met with in attempts to prevent the sale of intoxicating drinks.

From these and other causes he was much discouraged, yet he remarked under date of Seventh Month 8th, 1847. "Even if I should never be able to get the whites' ardent spirits removed from the Reservation, I feel it right for me to move forward in Christian spirit in doing all I can to accomplish it."

The importance of united action on the part of the Indians in reference to the removal of the white people from their land, at this time, engaged the attention of the Committee, who in the First Month 1848 adopted an address to the Indians on the subject.

In this they remark "Brothers, we believe this to be a very serious disadvantage to you, that their influence and example tend to corrupt the morals and the habits of your people, that they encourage intemperance and other and keep you from advancing in those things which would be for your best interest and welfare.

"Brothers we appeal to you whether experience for many years past has not proved the truth of what we say, and we fear that unless we are united in endeavoring to remove those that are now on your land and prevent any more from coming to settle on it, they will do a lasting injury, which you may, by aid and see and lament, when it will be to late remedy the evil.

"Brothers; we are glad to learn that any you are sensible of the bad consequences which are likely to result from having the white people among you, and wish to have them removed. We earnestly desire that those who have not yet joined heartily in this work, may now come forward and be of mind with their brethren.

"Brothers, we entreat those of you who have disposed to favor the white people stay among you, to consider seriously the injury you are doing to your people, and the sorrowful consequences which may grow out of your conduct, and to be persuaded to join with your brethren in steadfast and persevering efforts to have them removed by peaceable and lawful means from the Reservation.

"Brothers, we desire affectionately to commend you to the guidance and protection of our Father who is in Heaven. May you endeavor to love and fear Him, and to do His will in all things, so that you may honor Him in all your words and actions while here on earth, and enjoy His favor and peace forever in the world to come. We are your friends and brethren." Signed by fourteen Friends.

This address was read and interpreted to the Indians, yet no very decided results appear to have followed. In their report to the Yearly Meeting in 1849, the Committee say their efforts that Friends have made to induce the natives to have the white people removed from the Reservation have not been successful. We believe many of them are aware of the evil and demoralizing influence which the presence of the whites who settle among them has over their young people, and the evils which must eventually result from it to the Indian Nation; and in their Councils held to deliberate on this subject, the majority have on different times come to the conclusion to have the white settlers removed, and in some instances it has been carried into effect, and in general they have soon returned, and it is reasonable to fear that this has been done out of and encouraged by some of the chiefs and other influential persons, who have been misled by sinister motives. This subject is one that has long been the occasion of much anxious concern to Friends, being apprehensive that the natives do not unite as a body in driving those lawless intruders expelled from their lands, their residence among them, and the advantages they gain over the Indians, will be one as powerful means of their being civilized, sooner or later, of the little which remains to them of the soil of their ancestors."

In 1848 a school was established near Cold Spring under a law passed by the Legislature of New York. This appears to have been the first State school opened on the Reservation, and has since been opened and there have lately been as many as six in operation at one time in different neighborhoods. These schools are open to white children as well as children of Indians. About the time that this school went into operation at Cold Spring the Indians were desirous that Ebenezer Worth should open a school near Tunesassa and on the same side of the river, and the Committee approving of the same agreed to pay one hundred dollars towards constructing a building and furnishing it with desks and books. This building was accordingly put up on the banks of the river about half a mile from Friends' property at Tunesassa in the autumn of 1848 and here Ebenezer Worth taught a school during the winter.

In the spring of 1849 this devoted friend of the Indians believed the time had come for him to return to his home from which he had been absent, except during occasional visits for several years. In expressing his mind in relation to the subject to the Committee he used the following language: "When I have felt my mind calm and free from excitement clothed with a degree of love to my Heavenly Father, I have believed my labors here have come pretty near to a close, the thoughts of leaving my dear red brothers and sisters (I can call them so from a sense of feeling when I feel of that love which proceeds from the Fountain of all good) has produced solemn feelings with a desire that I may be favored to know the will of my dear and Divine Master and with resignation to it, I also desire the sympathy of my friends. In order to attend the approaching Yearly Meeting I expect if spared with life, and favored with health to leave here early in next month."

The Tract Association of Friends was organized in Philadelphia in the year 1816, and throughout the eighty-eight years of its existence has been actively engaged in circulating the literature which it publishes.

While a number of persons who are not Friends, and whose co-operation we gratefully acknowledge, have aided in the distribution of our tracts, this work would seem to rest primarily with those who are members of our religious Society. The Board of Managers endeavor to keep a full supply of tracts on hand; to examine and publish matter for new tracts; and to embrace suitable opportunities for their distribution; but it will be apparent that without the aid of interested persons, especially at a distance from the Association, the work of distribution must necessarily be limited. Observation shows that the principal channels of distribution are in communities where Friends reside. Some years ago it was thought that the organization in distant localities, of associations auxiliary to the main body would be the means of increasing the distribution of our tracts. A number of these Auxiliaries, composed of members of our religious Society, have been formed according to the articles which govern the Auxiliary Associations, and where a lively concern and true zeal have been shown, they have been found helpful to the parent body.

In a number of communities where Friends are thickly settled no such auxiliaries exist, and we believe there may often be openings for the handing forth of a few tracts, either of those which briefly but clearly show the doctrines of the Society of Friends, or it may be one that narrates some striking incident, which through the Divine blessing, may awaken an indifferent soul to a sense of its responsibilities, and arouse desires for a better life.

A large collection of tracts on a variety of subjects — not only religious, but moral, social, reformatory, biographical and educational — as viewed from the standpoint of our religious Society, has been formed during the last seventy years, and recently revised and improved with new electrotype plates. These tracts will be furnished to any Auxiliary, as shown by Article IV of the Constitution for Auxiliaries, page 14 of the Annual Report, a copy of which will be mailed to any Friend upon application.

Readers of THE FRIEND who live in neighborhoods where no Auxiliaries are maintained, are encouraged to read carefully the entire Report, which is one of unusual interest, and then decide whether they are willing to aid us, by organizing and maintaining an Auxiliary Association in their several neighborhoods.

None need hesitate on account of financial obligations to be incurred, as the amount of the annual dues which each member pays is left entirely to the judgment of those who organize. The Association gratefully receives from each Auxiliary whatever sum it thus raises, and in return agrees to furnish the auxiliary with such tracts as it can use.

While the organization and maintenance of an Auxiliary will be cheering to the parent Association, the full object will be accomplished only as its members are willing to share in the duties and responsibilities attaching to it. The true object in distributing tracts, is not so much the numbers which may be handed out, as it is to follow these gentle impressions of duty, to which none of us are entire strangers. These impressions, as they are heeded, will bring us to ground that has been prepared by the Holy Spirit in advance of our coming, and which is receptive to the seed that we sow. The handing forth of a tract will often require more faith, and more willingness to bow our necks to the yoke, than engaging in a much larger matter, but the promise is to those who are faithful in little things.

While there is neither limit nor qualification in age, we believe that if more of our young and middle aged Friends who are now in the vigor and strength of their days, would pause and ask themselves the question, "Have I a duty in this direction?" there would be more laborers in this part of the vineyard, and both they as individuals, and we as an Association, would be mutual helpers in a work which we may reverently believe is to the honor and glory of our Father in Heaven.

Signed by direction and on behalf of the Board of Managers of the Tract Association of Friends.

HENRY C. ABBOTT, Clerk.

PHILA., First Month 23d, 1905.

A SKEPTICAL man once decided to read in the Bible one hour every day. After some time, he said to his wife: "If this book is right we are wrong." Some time later he said: "Wife if this book is right, we are lost." A few evenings later he said: "If this book is right, we may be saved."

Already there appears to have been a feeling of discontent with the government of Great Britain, for in 1753 a man stood in the pillory an hour with the words: "I stand here for saying seditious words against the King!" The records show that between the years 1734-1775 forty-two Friends came from England in the love of the Gospel to visit their brethren in this country.—(Bowden's History of Friends.)

In the journals and letters of many of these Friends an account is preserved of the condition of the times. Especial mention should be made of Samuel Fothergill, who spent two years in this country during the troublous days preceding the declaration of war with two Indian tribes. This act was the immediate cause of the withdrawal of many Friends from the Assembly of Pennsylvania. Of Samuel Fothergill it is recorded: "His ministry at times went forth as a flame, often piercing into the inmost recesses of darkness and obduracy, yet descending like dew upon the tender plants of our Heavenly Father's planting."

He traveled extensively, visiting Friends in the love of the Gospel. This love embraced even the brute creation, as the following incident will show. In his letters to his family he, several times, mentions his horse—"My faithful companion and servant who carried me over twenty-three hundred miles." Master and servant endured many hardships together and when in remote places, where no oats could be procured, the master shared his portion of corn bread with his "faithful companion." Finally, as the horse became unfit for travelling, he was left in Virginia, we may be sure under kind care.

Nearly a year later Samuel Fothergill wrote the horse was brought up to him in tolerably good condition. "The poor old creature knew my voice when I spoke to him, and gave all the signs of joy on meeting me that such a creature is capable of." "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast."

The question of negro slavery stirred Friends deeply, and claimed much attention in the different Yearly Meetings. This system had even found its way into Massachusetts, whilst Rhode Island had become a place of import and a mart for human beings. Thomas Hazard, a young man in one of the Monthly Meetings of Narragansett, was early exercised on this account, and refused to work his farm with slave labor. He relates the occasion that first turned his thoughts to this subject. In one of the hot summer days between his college terms, his father sent him into the field to oversee the haying. Finding the sun intolerable, he lay down under a tree and took a book from his pocket. But it was too hot to read, and he lay watching the negroes at work. The situation suddenly struck him. If it was too hot even to read in the shade, what right had he to keep men at work in the sun? From that moment his thoughts were turned toward the evils of slavery. . . . he gave up his worldly prospects and worked his farm with free labor. He lived a long and useful life.—(Narragansett Friends' Meetings.)

The purchase of slaves did not appear to be condemned at that time, but the "fetching or importing negro slaves from their own country." In 1743 the following Query was adopted by the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia, "Are Friends clear of importing or buying negroes: and do they use those well which they are possessed of by inheritance or otherwise; endeavoring to train them up in the principles of the Christian religion."

In 1774 the Yearly Meeting of "Pennsylvania and the Jerseys" appears to have been "clear of the sin of trafficking in men." (As the subject of slavery may receive treatment in other papers, it must receive only a passing notice here.)

As new Yearly Meetings were established, the need of a medium of communication with each other was felt. This need was increased at times by the cruel persecutions and sufferings to which the members were exposed, requiring vigilant care and prompt assistance. The following is recorded on the minutes of the Yearly Meeting held in Philadelphia from the twentieth of the Ninth Month to the twenty-sixth of the same inclusive, 1755: "As we have just cause to apprehend that various occasions of difficulty may present, which may make it necessary to request the assistance of our brethren in England, this meeting appoints:

Richard Jones,	Anthony Morris,
James Bartram,	William Logan,
James Thackray,	John Reynell,
Joshua Ely,	John Morris,
William Morris,	Thomas Rose,
Joseph Noble,	John Michener,
John Smith,	Aaron Ashbridge,
	William Foster.

as a standing committee of this meeting to correspond with London Yearly Meeting and the Meeting for Sufferings in London, and to appear in any case and manner they may think necessary wherein the reputation and interest of Truth, and the supporting our religious liberties may be concerned," &c.

(Signed) "ISRAEL PEMBERTON, Clerk."

This committee reported to the Yearly Meeting held in Burlington in the Ninth Month, 1756, and the Meeting for Sufferings was established. The provisions were that each Quarterly Meeting should be properly represented. Four Friends from each Quarterly Meeting, and twelve Friends living in or near Philadelphia, for the convenience of their getting promptly together, should compose the meeting. The Yearly Meeting approved this proposal, with the addition "that the Committee keep fair records of their proceedings, and produce the same to the Yearly Meeting."

The first Meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia was held in Friends' School House, the eleventh day of Twelfth Month, 1756, meetings to be held each month.

Friends from London came to visit their brethren in this country the same year, to inform themselves more particularly of the present state of affairs, and a frequent interchange of letters between the Meeting for Sufferings in London and the newly established body in Philadelphia ensued. This correspondence is very beautiful. On the one side it was the attitude of a respectful child seeking counsel from an experienced parent. On the other side a watchful tender parent ready to advise kindly in all difficult questions, and encouraging to faithfulness, with warm sympathy in the trials which threatened the younger body. And indeed, great questions soon came before the Meeting. 1757 Wilmington Monthly Meeting wrote that "Officers in the execution of the Militia have acted with rigor and injustice." The same year a communication from Exeter Monthly Meeting stated that some Friends had left their homes from apprehensions of danger from Indian enemies. Friends in New Jersey suffered by drafting under the militia law. Help was sent to relieve Friends in poverty even to the small amount of five pounds, showing watchful practical care in small as well as in great things. An appeal was sent to the Governor, remonstrating on account of the introduction of stage plays into the Province. The publishing of books, George Fox Journal, &c., was considered. And, early after the establishment of the meeting, an edition of Barclay's Apology in German was issued to the dwellers along the Rhine, who had left their native country, and settled in Pennsylvania.

A number of Irish Friends came to this country about that time. Many of them were young men starting in the world. Friends in Pennsylvania, especially in Philadelphia, extended a watchful care over them. When travelling Friends were visiting Ireland the conversation would turn naturally on William Penn, and glowing accounts would be given of that "Swiss Asylum on the Delaware," where the oppressions of all nations might find a home.

In 1760 a concern was felt in the Meeting for Sufferings on account of Friends who were representatives in the Assembly, lest it should be led into inconsistencies, on account of military matters, and a committee visited the Assembly to remonstrate on grants of money for military purposes. Also the meeting was concerned, lest the advantage of being places in Government might induce men to accept positions, and they be tempted to violate the testimony in regard to oaths.

An epistle to the Meeting for Sufferings in London stated the Assembly had lately addressed the King, requesting him to take the government of the Province into his own hands, but that Friends "will not appear to support this proposal." On the other hand when, in later years, the opposition of the people against the rigorous measures of Great Britain to the Colonies assumed a threatening aspect, a rebellion appeared imminent Friends, in maintaining the principles of non-resistance, were accused of disloyalty to the country.

The following appears on the Minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings: "Friends being desirous to give a public testimony of our grateful remembrance of the continuation of our civil and religious liberties under the mild administration of our late King George III, ceased, and our satisfaction in observing a peaceful succession of his grandson, George III, approve the proposal that a suitable address be prepared and sent forward as speed as may be."

The address, read at an adjourned session of the Meeting for Sufferings held the thirtieth of First Month, 1762, is as follows:

"ADDRESS TO KING GEORGE III.
The humble address of the people called Quakers.

"We, thy faithful servants, though situated at a remote distance from thy Royal person, are desirous to express the unfeigned pleasure we have derived in hearing thou had so happily succeeded to the throne of thy ancestors.

"At the same time we were deeply touched with grateful affection for the memory of the late King, thy worthy grandfather, whose mild government and paternal attention to the preservation of civil and religious liberties justly tried and obtained our sincere love and gratitude."

After alluding to his marriage with a princess of Germany, the address concludes: "May the mighty, through the Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ, which breathes peace on earth and good-will towards men, make thee a happy instrument to stop the effusion of blood among nations at war, furnish thee with wisdom to equate to the difficulties attending thy exalted station, and, under the Divine influence thereof, perpetuate the government of thy kingdom in thee and thy family to the latest generations."
(Signed),

JAMES PEMBERTON, Clerk.

(Printed at First Month, 1762.)

This address was sent to the correspondents in London to be forwarded to the King.

In the troublous times which followed the Revolution of Great Britain in imposing the Stamp Act on the Colonies, Friends were cautioned "to keep as much as possible from mixing with the people in their human contrivances." A great trial at this time was the defection of some of their members, who joined associations to learn military exercises, and afterwards formed themselves into a society called the Free Quakers. The number, however, was not large, only about one hundred in Philadelphia.

"Friends were also brought into much trial and perplexity with respect to the issue of paper notes of credit for the purpose of carrying on the war. Many felt themselves religiously restrained from countenancing this issue, devised expressly for warlike ends, and refused to receive the notes as money. Some also suffered severely through restraints for military purposes. A demand was made for supply of blankets for the army. Many Friends had all of these articles they possessed taken from them, and were obliged to pass the water without them. Some had their houses stripped of lead for the use of the army, . . .

whilst others for refusing to act in military service were committed to prison. And some for declining to accept public offices, to which they were nominated, were fined twenty pounds each and distrained upon for the same much larger amounts. One Friend was imprisoned for refusing to take the oath of allegiance required by a recent law; and, after a trial, was fined seventy-five pounds, to be levied on his estate. Another was arrested for refusing to take paper currency, was advertised in the newspapers as an enemy to his country, and declined to give assurance that he would not bear his course and all persons were warned against having any dealings with him. The next week, some millers declined to grind his grain, whilst the schoolmaster who taught his children sent them home.

The foregoing are a few of the cases selected from many, recorded by the Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia. They are, however, sufficient to illustrate the feeling entertained towards Friends by their excited neighbors in their determined resistance to British authority. But notwithstanding these trials of faith and patience in the spoiling of their goods, in the imprisonment of their persons, and in the aspersions of their characters, Friends were, in general, preserved in much union and harmony of spirit, and experienced Him, who is the all-sufficient helper and strength of his people to be their safe hiding-place in the day of trouble."—(Bowden's History of Friends).

These facts are not cited merely as tales of the times, but as instances of faithful adherence to those principles, which Friends believe are given to them to uphold for the advancement of Christ's kingdom on earth.

The correspondence of Friends in England with their brethren in this country shows the deep interest they took in preventing the hostile measures of the ministry and towards producing a reconciliation. One of the most active among them was Dr. John Fothergill, to whom allusion has several times been made in this paper. He was not a minister, but his whole life was a sermon upon a saying of his own: "The great business of man as a member of society, is to be as useful to it as possible in whatever department he may be stationed." At the time of the imposition of the Stamp Act, he published a pamphlet entitled, Considerations relative to the North American Colonies, in which this passage occurs: "Colonies sprung from Britain will bear much, but it is to be remembered that they are the sons of freedom, and what they have been early taught to look upon as virtues in their ancestors will not soon be forgotten by themselves: Nay, they will be the sooner apt to vindicate their wrongs."

When the struggle between Great Britain and the Colonies became imminent, and Benjamin Franklin went to England to attempt to avert it, he and Dr. Fothergill became intimately acquainted. It is related that Dr. Fothergill sat up all night drawing up a paper as a basis of agreement with the Colonies. Early next morning he conferred with his friend, David Barclay, grandson of Robert Barclay, the writer of the Apology, and the paper was accepted in the main points by Benjamin Franklin, who laid it before the Government. That this effort was fruitless we know well.

NOT BY BREAD ALONE.—Jesus said, "Man shall not live by bread alone." He said it with reference to His temptation to make bread by a miracle to satisfy His own hunger. He had no command from His Father to produce bread in this way. Until He had such a command, His duty was to endure the hunger. If He had accepted the suggestion, He would have been letting His body rule. The food of His higher nature was to obey the word of God. Self-indulgence is making bread more important than obedience. It is better always to go hungry than to do wrong to get food.

The turning of the soul Godward, as the meadow daisy turns its face toward the sun, is an act of true worship.

OF "THE FRIEND."

(In 1871 "many fluctuations in health" are noted, with the decision to discontinue the active pursuit of business, as a conveyancer. This gave increased opportunity, when physically able, to devote time and strength to the Master's service.)

Twelfth Month 10th, 1871—"For some time past, at intervals, I have been engaged with other members of our Quarterly Meeting, in visiting the Subordinate Meetings and some families, under an appointment for this service, in the Sixth Month last. I may say that Heavenly help has been present, to enable me to clear my mind from time to time of the deep sense of concern to our beloved fellow members, which has attended me in the prosecution of this weighty service. 'Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord.' All our attempts to advance His cause must be vain, unless He open the way and go before his servants. Yet I believe it is consistent with His will that those who are quickened by His love shed abroad in their hearts to crave the spread of His kingdom in the earth, should also pray, in the power of His Spirit, for laborers to be sent forth into the work, and that they themselves may be rightly led into it by Him."

Third Month 3d, 1872.—"The winter months have passed away and how much cause have I to acknowledge the loving kindness of the Lord, in upholding my physical powers through the cold season, beyond what I had reason to expect last autumn. It is true that I am rarely an hour without some sense of weakness or bodily discomfort, yet my ailments have been so endurable and mitigated in character, that I have on the whole passed quite a comfortable winter—'What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits towards me? I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord!'"

Sixth Month 30th.—"I have felt instructed to-day in reading a tract on detraction; and it has raised in my mind a renewed desire that I may be preserved from all unnecessary criticism of fault-finding with my fellow-beings, and be clothed with humility, so as to live in a just sense of my own failings, and have that charity toward others, which would rather seek their good, than rehearse their faults.

It is at times the duty of Christians to speak of the errors of each other, in order for their amendment. This is the case with officers and other concerned members in the Church; it is also necessary that parents should tell their children of their faults, and endeavor to correct them. But we are too apt to indulge in criticisms on the failings of others in common conversation, taking some secret satisfaction, it is to be feared, in finding that we are as good, if not better than they, in certain particulars. How self is exalted and evil often done, in exaggerating the weaknesses of others, when they are unable to defend themselves! 'Set a watch, oh Lord, before my mouth, keep the door of my lips,'

'All must be done in and by Christ,' as George Fox testifies. I am sensible of some progress in the way of holiness latterly, and that Divine grace has been mercifully vouchsafed to that end. What can poor man do of himself? Surely naught!

I think it a dangerous error to imagine that our voluntary humiliations, or self-imposed crosses (not springing from His Spirit operating in the heart), can effect the work of salvation; but we must co-operate when He works in us; we must be as passive clay in the hand of the Potter, not resisting or taking ourselves out of His hand; for we may grieve or resist His Holy Spirit of promise, whereby we are sealed unto the day of redemption. We are free agents to accept or reject, and I understand that Scripture in this sense, which says, 'work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh in you, both to will and to do of His good pleasure.'

Ninth Month 8th.—'I have been informed that the Select Preparative Meeting of Hadonfield concluded to recommend our Monthly Meeting to acknowledge the call to the ministry, which the members of the first mentioned meeting had agreed was committed to me, by the Head of the Church. It is now nearly seven years since I first felt an obligation laid upon me to speak, in the way of public ministry; during the intervening period of probation my spirit has at times almost fainted by the way, and I have been ready to exclaim, 'behold I cannot speak, for I am a child!' Yet I feel bound to acknowledge the condescending goodness of Israel's Shepherd, that He has renewed His covenant with so poor and halting a servant, from time to time; and has not utterly taken His word out of my mouth.

I desire to record my feelings of grateful adoration to Him, who has led me about and instructed me, through these years of probation, for this superadded proof of His unmerited kindness to me. Oh, if self is only quite subdued in us, how it gives room for the blessed Master to work in us—and then the end of all true ministry will be attained! Not self-exaltation, or the acquirement of a reputation among men for eloquence or logical acumen, but the building up of the true seed on the one foundation, and the conversion of sinners unto a new life, in Christ.

After the last official step had been taken in the recognition of his gift as a minister, he writes: 'This is no unimportant matter when we regard the language of our code of discipline, part of which, in relation to this subject, is as follows: "And until the approbation of the Quarterly Meeting of ministers and elders is obtained, no such Friend is to be received as a minister, nor permitted to sit in the meetings of ministers and elders, nor travel abroad as a minister." There is nothing to exalt the creaturely part, in the administration of that grace which is requisite to qualify poor mortals to preach the gospel of Christ. When His disciples disputed among themselves who should be greatest, He told them, "whoever will be the chiefest shall be the servant of all. For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many." Says the apostle, "we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord, and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake." It is a great work indeed to be thus transformed and to know self rooted out; but dare we distrust Him who has all power in heaven and in earth? 'Let that mind be in you which was in Christ.' This is the work which He came to perfect, and to destroy the works of the Devil. I desire that I may, through Divine grace, be more and more brought into the humble, loving state of mind toward my fellow disciples, which is so touchingly inculcated by the precepts quoted above. Oh my soul, may thou watch and pray for this end without ceasing!"

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Visit to Porto Rico.

[Whether as letters of travel or accounts of a religious visit, much of the family correspondence of our friends Wm. C. Allen and Wm. E. Harvey from the West Indies, will doubtless be interesting to our readers. We have obtained the use of portions of these letters for our columns. The present one gives more in detail the sketch lately presented among our "Items."—Ed.]

Sixth-day evening, Twelfth Mo. 23, 1904.—We got into San Juan harbor, and landed late Fourth-day evening—were met by Anesta S. Malin and one of her friends. We stayed on shipboard that night, and the next morning took quarters on land—we boarded one side of the street and have a room on the other. The street is just wide enough for two teams to pass, and has very narrow sidewalks. The houses are occupied with stores on the first floor, with marble or tiled stairways leading to the second story. All Spanish architecture.

I will describe our room, for we are favored with accommodations far beyond the average. We room with an American family. The room faces with two big doors or windows out upon the street, or rather upon a balcony, with fancy iron railing that overlooks the street. There we can sit and watch the lumbering oxcarts and slow moving people, or listen to the strange calls of boys and men offering their wares in sing-song voices.

Our room is about 17 by 17 feet with walls about eighteen feet high. These are painted with fancy scroll work in different colors. The ceiling is in varied colors over rafters, with rather pretty cross-pieces. The windows or doors out to the balcony have no glass, but heavy wooden blinds. We have two iron beds, each having a closely woven wire mattress, covered with a "comfortable" about one-half inch thick and a sheet—over all is the mosquito netting. "No carpet on the floor." A thermometer on the wall, keeps day and night about the same, ranging from eighty to eighty-four degrees, which is the regular, almost unvaried temperature during all this time of year.

Since we landed we have been very busy, except about two hours this afternoon, when we went down to the seaside to rest. We have been remarkably favored in meeting with, or obtaining introductions to the principal officials in the naval and civil service. I am keeping in a book an account of our work particularly, so here will not go into detail: except to say, that all listen most kindly to the presentation of our mission, and so far have opened, or promise to open, the way for meetings, or for the distribution of literature. Thus to-day, the officers of the U. S. Navy have unexpectedly responded to our request to hold meetings amongst the men; knowing as they do, our testimony about war. Indeed the Commandant here, went out of his way to extend courtesy to us; letting us know that he had friendships amongst some of our Society, etc. All these preparations take much time, red-tape and a good deal of inquiry, in order eventually to see the proper officials who have authority in the case.

Seventh-day we were invited to attend exercises at the Congregational Mission School, at San Turce. We accepted, as it seemed a way to become acquainted with some of the workers in the field hereabouts. 'Twas it seemed an odd Christmas season. The open doors and windows, the rich green of enormous palm leaves, fourteen feet high, around the walls of the room, the graceful coco and mango trees, with gay shrubbery and brilliant flowers outside, all were vastly different from the ice-bound and snowy scenes I have heretofore witnessed at this season.

The children had simple exercises, part in English and part in Spanish. They had a dialogue, sang some and quoted scripture in reference to the birth of our Saviour. The about one hundred presents were distributed. All the children were nicely dressed, except very few. Practically all are being educated in the elements of the Protestant faith, and of morality, and have been rescued from the superstitions and errors of catholicism, within a few years.

First-day was "Christmas day." How different our surroundings from yours! At ten o'clock we went to the U. S. Marine Barrack and held a Friends' Meeting—truly a strange place for such an occasion. A much larger number of the men attended than often go to the infrequent services held amongst them, and we were told. All behaved with reverence and attention, and some exhibited tenderness as they were pleaded with to be more faithful to the Saviour who died for us all, and whose birth is celebrated to-day. The meeting concluded in prayer. I would love to be at home to-day, but I am glad we may have a service for Christ here in San Juan, where his law is not much followed, and to men of war, who he but little about his peaceable Kingdom.

Third-day, Twelfth Mo. 27, 1904. Yesterday we were busy except for a while before dinner. Our boarding-place would amuse or—at table when we want anything or a waite we clap hands. There is only one doorway into the place, which accommodates about thirty persons. When we go to breakfast we pass the garbage can in the front door. As we eat, colored people pass to and fro in the dining-room, carrying provisions or other supplies. The kitchen is right in the middle of the house, surrounded by bed-room. The servants' quarters are, as it were, boxed off against the wall, right in the centre of the general mess. When I tell of this house, speak of all we have so far been in, as to general plan.

Our books did not come on our ship. They may prove a blessing some way or other; but has caused us a good deal of disarrangement of plans. Meanwhile we plod ahead with them. To-night I expect to meet the soldiers of native Porto Rican regiment at the Infant Barracks. I feel the weight of this great or the Colonel, who granted permission, cannot and should not seem to influence the belief of his soldiers, and they are, if anything, mostly Roman Catholics. Treading, as we do, amongst so many diverse interests and prejudices, makes us realize the need of continual guidance, lest our way be closed on the one hand, or we be too faithful to our testimony on the other.

Twelfth Month 28th, 1904. Fourth-day.—Well, last night we had our meeting with the Porto Rico regiment. In some details it was an extraordinary occasion. Gracious help was given to preach the need of preparation for judgment, and a changed life, and of dedicating thought to the interests of the immortal soul. What had been a shouting, singing throng of men, left the meeting with awe-struck countenances, I may truly say. How the Divine Master can make the way and help us! And how little we can accomplish without Him! We had a most sympathetic interpreter.

San Juan, Twelfth Mo. 29th, 1904.—Fourth-day afternoon we went out to Rio Piedras, a town a few miles away, took dinner with the Baptist missionary there, and then went to his place of worship. It was a very interesting one. He has a sober membership of about three hundred, redeemed from Catholicism, within the past six years. The young folks looked bright and happy. Their simple Christian faith and love for Christ was delightful, so different it all seems, from those who conventionally have heard preaching all their lives, and who don't seem to abound in the love of the Gospel, so manifested in these recent Porto Rico converts.

This morning we went to the San Juan penitentiary, where there are 625 convicts, of whom about 200 are in for homicide. All live and sleep in two large rooms, but there are also a school-room, and some other apartments, where they work at some trades.

With warden and guard, we went through the whole place, talking to some of the prisoners. Some are quite intelligent. All are dressed in white. The place is very clean.

In the afternoon, we visited the Charity school for girls, accompanied by the Island Superintendent of Charities, who has shown us such courtesy. The little girls were very pretty, and manifested much love for the maçons as we inspected the institution. All were dressed in blue. The dormitories and all the rooms are immaculate. The children sang beautifully in both languages, and it was charming to see them amid their tropical surroundings hear their rich voices; and, for awhile, gave a vacation amidst the exercise that is seen on our daily portion since teaching here. "God bless the children of every color and age!" says my soul.

They devoutly listened to our message as all stood in a little meeting in the great courtyard of the big building under the blue sky. As the Holy Spirit was spoken of as down in their own hearts, I saw some of the younger girls nod assent.

William is already quite used to speaking through an interpreter, having daily practice therein, sometimes twice a day.

Sixth-day, Twelfth Month 30th, 1904.—This day we passed in the jail and the Boys' Charity school. Truly our experiences have been remarkable. In all these places that we visit, practically no religious labor is ever extended,

Many of the prisoners know nothing about the Bible or the Saviour. We have been amongst and talked to or preached to men, women and children, who are violators of all the laws of morality to an awful extent. The depravity of some of these poor creatures is beyond all supposition. Yet, sometimes, tears and signs of repentance have accompanied our efforts, in a simple way, to help them, as we have asked them to seek God in their own hearts and forsake sin. Some of the jail sights have been very sad. I cannot detail; but, for instance, think of a boy eight and a half years old serving three months for offering a chicken for sale that had been stolen by someone else! Yet we find such to be the admitted facts. There are plenty other cases of mal-administration of justice beside the cruelty and suffering out of the jails everywhere amongst this people. How unfortunate they are—but enough!

Seventh-day, Twelfth Month 31st, 1904.—Our room has looked like a ware-house with our re-packing and with books and literature all around. We have been getting off a great deal to-day—or rather W. B. H. has,—he is the book-man of the combination. We really feel we have had a busy week—seven visits and meetings and much literature, besides getting information about future possibilities.

The other day we were in a gentleman's house; and, with a grand flourish, he exclaimed: "The house is yours;" which is the Spanish way of saying "you are welcome" and they are inviting you to stay longer.

New Year's, First Month 1st, 1905.—Last night was a unique New Year's Eve for us. We sat out on the plaza, underneath the stars and electric lights, and watched the people parade up and down. Everyone was dressed in the thinnest materials, and it was good to sit without any head covering. But all night long was horrible with the noise—bells, horns, shouting and whistling. The streets were alive all night in honor of the New Year.

This morning had another meeting in the Marine Barracks. We had to go around amongst the men inviting them in. When collected, we had a good, tender meeting. At close of meeting, they sat around with us talking of spiritual things, and of their temptations, and telling how their life had been stirred by our message. Some asked for testaments; and all gave us a warm parting. I think the talk was of more value than the meeting. How delightful to devote the New Year to such work as helping these soldier boys into better living!

CHRIST SUFFERED MUCH MORE.—Thomas Chalkley, an eminent minister of the Society of Friends, who lived in the early part of the Eighteenth Century, was possessed of a considerable estate but having met with many losses both on sea and land he seemed forced to lead a sea-faring occupation much of his time in order to pay his just debts; this necessarily kept him much away from his family and friends which was a great trial to him.

He made not a few trips to the Island of Barbadoes with consignments of goods and in his journal appears the following entry written while enroute to that distant place: "Of late times and also in this voyage meeting with many losses and crosses and much affliction and various exercises I was ready to say in my heart 'Lord why am I thus afflicted now in my declining years, since Thou knowest I love Thee above all things and that I would not willingly or knowingly offend Thee, my great and dear Lord?'"

"It was answered as though vocally spoken, 'My only begotten and beloved Son who never offended me suffered much more.' This word being such an evident truth I begged patience to go through all my sufferings and afflictions so that at last I might live with Christ in the glorious kingdom of God forever where I might always bless and praise His holy name."

A MAN'S character may fairly be judged from what he laughs at. If he laughs at the pain, injury, or disappointment of others, he is not one to be trusted. If he laughs at high or sacred things, his heart cannot be noble. A good, hearty laugh at anything truly amusing is one of the wholesome things on earth. But to laugh at the wrong objects stamps the wrong minded man or woman.—Forward.

Notes in General.

The running expenses of the Church of Rome call for about $1,500,000 every year. The pope himself, it is known, requires no more than $2000 annually for his household expenses.

Jane Addams has the honor of being the first woman invited to give the convocation address before the graduates of the University of Chicago. Her subject was "Modern Immigration: A Field Neglected by the Scholars."

The Bishop of Durham, of the Church of England, in writing of the Welsh revival, says: "I appeal to my brethren in the ministry, and not least to those who call themselves Evangelical (that great, that searching word) to observe this movement with a reverent greeting and a sacred hope."

A New England paper asks: "Has not the pulpit a mission in preaching to immortal souls of the immortal life quite as important as preaching 'practical sermons' on the business or political complexities of the day, about which, the chances are, the minister does not know enough to be an authority?"

The Unitarian Sunday School Society has decided to recognize the prevalent fondness for the King James' version of the Bible in its ordinary use, but with regard to lessons and studies which depend greatly upon the accuracy of the translation, the American Standard Revision has been selected as the authority.

George Smith, in a recent letter, states that the whole of South America, except the republics of Bolivia and Peru, have thrown open their doors to the missionary. Disestablishment in Brazil and perfect freedom in Argentina have opened the way. The facilities for travelling through the country are now such as to allow colporters to reach all the provinces and most of the large cities and towns readily.

The pope says of the Scriptures: "No matter how many prayer-books and books of devotion there may be for the priests, none is better than the Gospels. This is an unsurpassed book of devotion, the true bread of life. I grant a special apostolic blessing upon all those who preach the gospel, who hear and read it, whether on a Sunday or a week day." The pope has bestowed his blessing upon the St. Jerome Association.

The 1900 counties of China are every one now open to Christian teaching. The progress of mission work in China since the Boxer uprising is wonderful.

Edward C. Rice states that in places where every missionary was driven out and all the mission property destroyed, the missionaries to-day are preaching to throngs of attentive Chinese every day. In the Canton field, long known for its anti-foreign feeling, 1100 Chinese were baptized last year by Presbyterians alone.

A STEEPLE-HOUSE INDEED.—The scaffolding now being used in the repair of the spire of Holy Trinity Church edifice in Brooklyn, rises 337 feet above the ground. The material required to build it would be sufficient to build a row of four-story frame houses the length of an average city block. Twenty-one stone cutters are removing from the spire the stones that have become loosened in the course of years, and placing new ones. But though the tower reach as high as Babel's, what service does it perform for true worship?

CRITICAL PERIOD FOR COLORED PEOPLE.—A. F. Beard, editor of the American Missionary, says: "Perhaps there never was a more critical period for the colored people, than that which they are passing through now. The chief opposition which they get in the South is not because of the failure of the race to respond to the missionary efforts in their behalf, but largely because of their unexpected progress and development. The Bourbon element, which is crying out against the Negro as a failure, is doing this really because of his success. They quote the millions who have not been reached as an indictment against the millions who have been uplifted and saved. This demanding part of our work appeals for a much larger degree of Christian benevolence than it receives."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The impeachment trial of Charles Swaine, U. S. Judge for the district of Northern Florida for high crimes and misdemeanors has begun, Senator Pratt of Colorado was the last proceeding of a similar character took place in 1876.

The U. S. Government has recently become a party to an agreement signed at Santo Domingo of the island of Haiti, by which the financial administration of the Dominican government is taken charge of by the United States, to the end that the claims of all persons against it shall be equitably met. A treaty with San Domingo, it is stated, may be sent to the Senate during the present session. Until that is done and ratified it is believed that the President cannot lawfully accept the reversion of San Domingo, impose the customs revenues of that Government and undertake to satisfy foreign creditors. Such a course would meet the establishment of a protectorate which might be extended to other countries in the West Indies, &c.

A memorable snow storm with high wind, followed by a very low temperature, occurred on the 24th ult., resembling the severe blizzard of 1888. Traffic on all railroads in Eastern and Middle Pennsylvania was seriously crippled by it. The snow was out of service, and country roads were so badly drifted that farmers could not get through with milk and produce. Nearly a foot of snow fell. The storm was very severe along the New Jersey coast.

The use of bacteria contained in the nodules found on the roots of leguminous plants to absorb nitrogen from the air, and thus increase the yield of certain crops, it is said has been employed by over 12,000 farmers in every part of the United States during the past year, and with invariable success. The greater proportion employed them on alfalfa, but cultures were sent out for red clover, garden peas, beans, cow peas, soy beans, crimson clover, & like. The sweet peas, vetch beans and common field peas. The discovery of the means of using these cultures, it is estimated, will add many millions to the yield of crops annually, and especially in the Eastern States, where there is a great demand for the development of alfalfa, the great forage crop of the West. It was announced by Dr. George T. Moore, of the Department of Agriculture at Washington that there is but one species of bacteria found on all the leguminous plants. It is believed that the same bacteria that lived on the roots of alfalfa would live on common sweet clover, and that the regions where sweet clover grew commonly would accept alfalfa readily.

In a recent interview with a committee who had called upon him in reference to questions relating to marriage and divorce President Roosevelt said: "Questions of this kind are the currency of an literally no consequence whatsoever compared with the vital position of having the unit of our social life, the home, preserved. If the average husband and wife fulfil their duties toward one another and toward their children as Christianity teaches them, then we may rest assured that the other problems will solve themselves. If we have solved every other problem in the wisest possible way it shall profit us nothing if we have lost our own national soul; and we will have lost it if we do not have the question of the relations of the family put upon a proper basis. While I do not know exactly what it is that you wish me to do, I can say in advance that we far as we live we will be done to co-operate with you toward the end that you have in view."

A despatch from Harrisburg says: Governor Pennypacker has had more success in ridding his orchard of San Jose scale than any other fruit grower in the State. In 1903 Professor Surface saw the trees thickly covered with scale, and the currency of the Governor himself applied a remedy with a spraying apparatus. The spray was a solution of whale oil soap, the sovereign remedy for San Jose scale. The results were speedy and most gratifying.

The number of members of the Roman Catholic body in this country is estimated by 12,462,793. The total of the fund created by George Peabody in 1867 for the promotion of education, particularly in the Southern States, have agreed to dissolve the trust, and to distribute the balance of money remaining in their hands, after appropriating one million of dollars for the George Peabody School for teachers in Nashville, Tenn. The balance of about $1,200,000 is to be probably be distributed among Southern institutions. This trust, is believed to have effected much in fostering the intellectual development of the Southern people, both white and colored.

It is stated that 71 per cent. of all the institutions for higher education in this country are now co-educational. The attention to the czar which the Russian working people desired to present to him personally on the 22nd ult. in St. Petersburg, it is said, demanded:

"The immediate cessation of the war.

"The summoning of a constituent assembly of representatives of the people elected by universal and equal suffrage and of about $1,200,000 is to be probably be distributed among Southern institutions. This trust, is believed to have effected much in fostering the intellectual development of the Southern people, both white and colored.

"The removal of class and race privileges and restrictions.

"The invariability of the person and domicile.

"Freedom of conscience, speech, the press, meetings, strikes and political associations."

The refusal of the czar to receive the people it is said was not known to them until the last moment. In the mean time steps had been taken by the military to occupy important positions throughout the city. It is believed that the czar will not now receive a deputation or have any communication with the strikers, and any attempt of this kind is likely to be followed by severe measures. A Government Commission appointed to maintain order in St. Petersburg. The proclamation has been made that the czar has ordered the framing of certain laws for the benefit of the working people, and by promising to yield the question of the hours of labor, which are now legally eleven in Russia, the authorities hope to make peace. The granting of the police and strikers who are indifferent to political demands, to resume work.

Troops have patrolled the streets of St. Petersburg, Moscow, Liban, Odessa, Kiev and other industrial centres of Russia.

In reference to the separation of the church and State, the policy of the new ministry in France under Rouvier has been made public. In the policy of the late ministry, the main features being an income tax, the separation of Church and State, workmen's pensions and a reduction of the term of military service. It condemns the system of secret reports of the lives of army officers, which caused the downfall of the Combes Cabinet.

The Premier Rouvier, said during a debate: "Separation was not a part of the original programme of the Combes Cabinet, but only arose through special circumstances. If separation is made in the sense of liberty, it is well we should understand it thus. While reserving the rights of the State and respecting liberty of conscience of Catholics, we should like to accomplish it reform with unanimity. The Government will not open discussion of separation, but thinks it better further discuss the income tax."

It is reported that fighting between the Japanese and Russians along the Shakhe River has been resumed.

The employees of the coal mines in Germany have agreed to inform the Government that they would accept any judgment a Parliamentary commission might render in view of the grievances of the miners, and that the miners would immediately remove the grievance believing so fully in the soundness of their position.

It is announced that the largest diamond ever discovered has been found near Pretoria, in South Africa. It stone weighs about twenty-six ounces, and is said to be pure white of good quality. It is locally valued at $500,000 to $4,000,000.

Great destitution and suffering are reported from Eastern Turkey.

From Mosul, Dr. H. L. Underwood, a missionary physician, writes in part as follows:

"There are some 7500 persons so destitute of food clothing that it is a problem how they are to survive winter. Typhoid is rampant. The barracks are full of it, and the dwellings of the citizens also. The death in this year from typhoid reaches four figures among soldiers alone."

Dr. G. C. Keynolds, reporting the situation at Van, says: "The people here will soon be perishing from human assistance is sent them. There is doubtless great ground in the province to keep the whole population alive, were it evenly distributed.

"Business is at a standstill. Work cannot be found and those who would gladly labor remain in idleness and hunger. In the city very many families are without fuel and multitudes more have food enough to last a very few weeks."

It is said that in Berlin, by means of electric on buses deriving their power from an overhead trolley, necessity for a special railroad track has been done away with, and a speed of ten miles a hour is obtained. If wire equipment and a special type of wheels proper stoppage by snow, there is secured rapid, noiseless travel.

More Russian "Quakers."

We could comfortably pardon the public for not knowing what Quakers are, in so many who now bear the name are in a state of uncertainty.

The Molokany sect called "Russian Quakers" is said to have been expelled from Russia more than ten years ago. "They believe in non-resistance to evil, and refuse to take up arms." They are, and continue in the faith, of the same kind as the Molokans, whom Stephen Grellet and William Allen visited in 1819, they have decidedly more in common with those of the Friends in America than the Doukhobors have. But at present we cannot give place to the statement that their religion is identical with that of the American and English Quakers," except to do it in reserve till happily proven.

But to proceed to the information already published:

The first instalment of two hundred thousand Russian Quakers who are coming to this country, according to P. A. Deamens, an ex-captain of the Russian Imperial guard, to form a permanent colony near Los Angeles, have left Ellis Island for the Pacific coast. They were seventy-two in number. The party arrived here on the Blucher. P. A. Deamens met them, and convinced the Ellis Island officials that they would make good colonists. Deamens is a Molokany and was banished from Russia. He came here and settled in Los Angeles. The immigrants were well supplied with money, many having $1,875, which they explained only for traveling expenses. The entire party numbered nearly $10,000. They were dressed in the ordinary peasant costume peculiar to the sect. Owing to their wealth and numbers the Russian Government did not dare to send the Quakers to Siberia, but banished them to the other side of the Caspian Mountains, near Persia. Here they formed a colony near the city of Kars, where they prospered and grew in numbers. At present there are more than 200,000 of the sect. All will naturally come to America. Their religion is identical (?) with that of American and English Quakers. They believe in raising large families. A family of twelve children is considered a small one. As a people they are all well educated. For generations they have been farmers and are considered expert agriculturists. In Los Angeles they will pursue fruit culture and general farming. "Another band will arrive next week, and go at once to California. The exodus in detachments of about 300 will keep on during the coming year each week."

William Allen as companion to Stephen Grellet in his journey to Russia in 1819, writes under date of Sixth Month 9th:

"In the afternoon we had an important conference with the Malakans, improperly called the Duhobortsi." And Stephen Grellet says: "They pointed out to us the great distinction there is between them and the Duhobortzi. The latter deny the authority of the Scriptures; they deny the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ; the offering up of himself a sacrifice for sin on Calvary, and salvation by faith in him." [We understand that our friends who have visited the Canadian Doukhobors would give a clearer report of the soundness of some or many of them in evangelical faith.] But Wm. Allen proceeds to say of the Malakans: "They believe in the Holy Scriptures and in the divinity of our Lord and Saviour as fully as we do ourselves; they also believe in the influence of the Holy Spirit, and that saving grace is universal, and not withheld from any, that it leads to all that is good, and, as we yield to it, assists us to avoid all that is evil. They believe that the only true baptism is that of Christ with the Spirit, and reject water baptism as unnecessary; they believe that spiritual baptism only produces regeneration; they consider that the communion with Christ is wholly spiritual, and make use of no outward ceremony. In conversing upon this subject, they were evidently effected at finding that our sentiments so exactly coincided with theirs. But few residing here were born in their society, they were convinced by reading the Scriptures, and by what they felt in their own minds; this, of course, endeared them still more to us, and was a precious and confirming evidence of those truths which we believe. These poor people had never heard of such a Society as ours, and yet, by attending to the influence of the Divine Spirit, were in great measure brought to support the same testimonies in the midst of the darkness that surrounded them. They have suffered nobly for the Truth."

A document sent to William Allen in the year 1830, gave the following information: "Between the German colonies of Mennonites and the Nogay Tartars, lies the county of the Malakans, a sect so named on account of their non-observance of fasts, and their use of milk diet on week-days. The Malakans also call themselves 'true spiritual Christians.'

"In 1825 their number consisted of about eight hundred; now it is increased. They have suffered persecution in consequence of their separation from the Greek Church, and many particularly the Cossacks, languished for a long time in prison; they, however, firmly maintained their ground, and could not be compelled to give up those opinions which they had formed in consequence of reading and searching the Bible, with the contents of which they were very well acquainted. They prefer the Holy Scriptures to all other writings, considering them as the rule of their faith, and as containing the revealed will of God to man. Though not rich, they have paid as many as seventy roubles for a copy of the sacred volume. They acknowledge Christ as God manifest in the flesh, who died on the cross for the sins of the world. Like the Duhobortzi, they give an entirely spiritual significance to baptism and the supper, which are not kept by them in external signs and symbols. They reject pictures or images, and the adoration of saints, in their worship, as well as other ceremonies of the Greek Church. They generally lead a good moral life, and there are among them many seeking souls who love God, and are searching after truth."

Stephen Grellet, in writing of the Malakans, — who, he says, call themselves "Spiritual Christians" — relates: "We were soon all gathered into solemn, silent waiting, and prostration of soul before the Lord: this is the manner in which these people meet together for Divine worship, in silence, which is not interrupted, unless some one present apprehends, under the sensible influences of the Divine Spirit, that he is required to speak as a minister among them, or to offer vocal prayer. The meeting was a solemn scene."

Stephen Grellet's account of their doctrines is substantially the same as William Allen's: "Respecting war, however, their views are not entirely clear, and yet many among us may learn from them; they said, 'War is a subject that we have not yet been able fully to understand, so as to reconcile Scripture with Scripture; we are commanded to obey our rulers, magistrates, &c., for conscience's sake; and again we are enjoined to love our enemies, not to avenge ourselves, to render good for evil; therefore we cannot see fully how we can refuse obedience to the laws that require our young people to join the army; but in all matters respecting ourselves, we endeavor to act faithfully as the Gospel requires; we never have any law-suits; for if anybody smites us on the one cheek, we turn to him the other, etc. . . . Though several of our young men have been taken to the army, not one of them has actually borne arms; for, our principles being known, they have very soon been placed in offices of trust, such as attending to the provisions of the army, or something of that sort." Their ministers are acknowledged much in the same manner as ours, and like us, they consider that their only and best reward is their Saviour's approbation; therefore they receive no kind of salary. Understanding that they have among them some in the station of Elders, we queried how these were appointed. "We do not appoint them," said they, "but when any one among us grows up to the state of a father or a mother in the church, we acknowledge them in the office for which the Lord has qualified them; they do the work of fathers and mothers; their works proclaim what the Lord has made them." They use the Slavonian Bible; few of them, however, can read; but those who can, read to the others, and these from memory teach the children, so that their young people are very ready in quoting the Scriptures correctly. They have some kind of discipline, and they watch over one another for good; but have not been under the necessity for disowning any one for misconduct."

These extracts are enough to show how well the Malakans deserved eighty-five years ago the name of Russian Quakers. But lest they have degenerated from that character, and become since as changed as some bodies of the American type have consented to become, we will not at present venture to apply to them the name. Let us hope they have remained so steadfast to their former principles as indicated by Stephen Grellet and William Allen, that they will be found a reinforcement of the ranks of genuine Friends in California.

THE NEW BIRTH. — There are some who confound the new birth and baptism, claiming that when one is baptized he is born again. But that were to shut the door in the face of the thief on the cross. Opportunity for baptism was denied him by the very circumstances of his position. Yet he must have been born again, for did not our Lord assure him a place in his kingdom although he had said, "Except a man be born again he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven?" That one may be baptized yet not be born again is proved by the case of Simon Magus, who professing conversion, was baptized by Philip, but to whom Peter said, "I perceive thou art in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity."

Having seen what it is not, it remains to say, the new birth is that act of God in which he comes into our soul with his life-giving power. It is no act of mine, but only the act of God.

In promising a new heart God promises to make man a new creature whose whole manner of life and thought shall be different from what it once was, so that the apostle Paul can speak of the believer as a new creature in Christ Jesus. — Christian Instructor.

If Jesus has been a new moral force in the world, I ask the men who know it, who see it, who feel it, who believe it, to confess it and to act upon it.

THEY HAD BEEN WITH JESUS.

BY SARAH D. SEARS.

One of the sweetest lessons,
The Bible teaches me,
Is that where Christ's disciples
From fear of man were free;
And with such power and boldness Proclaimed his given word,
The listening people wondered
And marvelled as they heard.

They knew them to be ignorant,
Untaught in worldly lore,
And, as they listened longer,
They wondered more and more.

So they of them took knowledge
Whence they received such power;
Mark ye the lesson taught them
Outreaching to this hour:

That they had been with Jesus;
Oh what a blessing sweet,
To learn the Master's teachings
Low sitting at his feet.

This was the happy secret:—
On all the paths they trod,
That "they had been with Jesus;"
Like Enoch, "walked with God."

The same pure fount is flowing
For all of us to-day;
The same unerring Wisdom
Will guide us on our way.

"Twill help for daily duties Whatever those duties be If at the same pure Fountain,
Unfailing, full and free,

We go, like them, in meekness
For every day's supply
Of love and power and wisdom
Each need to satisfy.

"Twill soothe our every sorrow
Along the path of life;
Twill comfort in its trials
And strengthen for its strife.

Then what a crowning blessing
When all earth's paths are trod,
That we "have been with Jesus,"
Have daily "walked with God."

BARNESVILLE, O., First Month 18th, 1905.

If we stand idly by and use the past achievements of our forefathers as a boast and excuse ourselves from effort because of their great deeds, then we show that we are not worthy of the sires of the people who went before us in the history of our land. What we as a people need more than anything else is the steadfast performance of every-day duties of life, not to be prompted by reward, but because they are our duties. I think that one of the primary thoughts that should come to you when the names of our two great national heroes are mentioned, is that they did what they did not for glory, but for duty; not for what it meant for themselves, but for their fellow-citizens. They set a commendable example and they also lived up to it. They were practical, and a man to do anything must be practical. He must do things, accomplish things; not by talk, but by earnest, good work. — President Roosevelt.

Third Month 27th, 1873—"On last Friday week, in company with my dear sis Deborah, I performed a little act of duty, which as I apprehended, had been called for at hands for some months past.

This was holding a religious meeting with the inmates of Camden County Almshouse. They were assembled in the women's dining room, and numbered about ninety.

The spirit of supplication for Divine grace to open their hearts, and give vitality to the word of exhortation covered me, on sitting down with them, and I gave way to its pressure. They were commended to Him who was anointed of old to preach the gospel to the poor, and to bind up the broken heart, and it seemed right to urge upon them the verity and awfulness of the day of Judgment. Christ truly came to set open a fountain of purification from sin and uncleanness, but would avail nothing, to those who will not submit to be washed, and break off from the lusts and pollutions—"The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ." This truth was presented and enforced by some illustration. Some of the poor creatures seemed tendered, and contrast between their physical wretchedness and the unsullied joys of Heaven was held to encourage them to press after them. Some knelt in prayer with much fervor."

Fifth Month 19th, 1873—"I laid before the Monthly Meeting an impression of duty which has rested with me for several years to hold some meetings with the inhabitants of Camden and Burlington Counties, principally those in membership with Friends. The subject received the calm and interested consideration of the Meeting, and was very generally united with by those who usually express a sentiment on such affairs, and a Minute was granted in passing through this part of the count, have often been clothed with feelings of solicitude on behalf of a class of persons, who seem to disregard the obligations of religion, rarely attending any place of worship, and apparently living without God in the world. (Four meetings are noted in the journal, can much exercise of spirit, and the following closes the account of them):—

"Not unto us, not unto us, Oh Lord, but unto Thy Name give glory!" May Thy gracious Spirit be near to keep me humble and safe the time of favor, as well as in the prostrations that I have passed through!

"Oh thou of little faith, wherefore dost thou doubt?"

Second Month, 17th, 1874—"The several Quarterly Meetings occurring this month, have attended that at Germantown and then at Concord. At the former a deep engagement of mind was prevalent with me, that members may be baptized into the same Spirit and become more truly members of that living body, of which Christ is the head. Thus should walk by the same rule and mind of the same thing, and the prayer of our great Incessor be realized, 'that they all may be as Thou Father art in Me and I in Thee,' and they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me.' In the Quarterly Meeting at Concord 'I felt drawn ng before the view of the young and middle-the parable of the talents, and to utter note of warning, lest any should fall perhaps ensively into the state of the servant, who ged in the earth and hid his Lord's money, at we may thus wrap ourselves up in a state cold morality, and yet be really barren of ve to God."

Ninth Month, 20th, 1874—"About the open-y of the last Spring I felt my mind sensibly own, as I was riding between Haddonfield Camden, into a concern for the spread of the Gospel among the people of Philadelphia, ch such force, and an apprehension that the e was near at hand for me to engage in e labor there, that I have ever since been ply solicitous to be instructed by the Sheprd concerning my duty in so weighty a sub-t. I have for years, at times, had my feel-gs much engaged, in gospel love, towards a great mass of humanity in that city, as I e mingled among them in my business avo-ions, and walks to and fro.

I opened the subject in the Monthly Meeting a month, when Friends quite cordially exressed their unity with it and gave me a nute to that effect. My feelings are chiefly ned toward the business men, with a pro-ct of endeavoring to get them together in ils and meeting-places, in different parts of e city. To-day in our meeting, after much ifflict of soul during the morning, from a ad of the prospect before me, I was mercily avored to get into a sweet calm, in which lessed assurance was afforded me, that the n of the Lord would be underneath to susain me, and that the Saviour's grace would sufficient for me."

Tenth Month, 6th, 1874—"I held the first eting with Conveyancers, some thirty-five forty came. The occasion was a relieving a to me, several of those present greeted very cordially after the meeting, and exressed their satisfaction with the opportunity.
e young man in particular, who had been a fessor of religion, seemed to be comforted at an open confession of Christ, and our ligations to Him, should have been thus de among a body of business men, and by e of their number.

A meeting was also held First-day evening, 27th ult., at the Meeting-House at Fourth nd Arch Streets. There were about seven ndred persons estimated to be present, their duct was quiet and orderly. On the 4th Tenth Month, another meeting was called, Friends' new Meeting House, in West iladelphia. This was the first meeting ever ld in that house, which was built this year.
There were some two hundred and fifty pers present, more than could be seated. Tracts re circulated among the people at the close of the meeting, explaining Friends' views."

Tenth Month, 18th, 1874—"Yesterday I had religious meeting with the hands in Bromley's rpet Factory. James Bromley made way for opportunity with much heartiness, having e mill stopped at 2 P. M., a half hour earlier an usual, and the people gathered in the le-room, comfortably seated on rolls of rpet. There were about two hundred present men, girls and boys. To-day I held another eting in the Hall of a building in the Nine-nth Ward, there were probably one hundred d fifty persons present.

Eleventh Month, 30th, 1874—"Since the last entry in this book I have had an appointed meeting with the inhabitants of Germantown, in Friends' Meeting House on First-day afternoon. The occasion was satisfactory and the house well filled. I have also attended three religious meetings at the Philadelphia Almshouse, among the poor and afflicted ones."

First Month 21st, 1875,—"I had an opportunity with the inmates of the House of Correction since last entry: and gave up the Minute for public Meetings in Philadelphia, at our last Monthly Meeting. A sweet sense of quiet peace attended the winding up of this service."

(To be continued.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Dictum of a Doctor and Declaration of a Governor on Worldly Pastimes.

There appeared several months ago in the school paper of an educational institution having an attendance of rather more than one thousand pupils of both sexes, a short article entitled "Judge —'s Habits." Reference was made therein to the judge's habit of early rising. The explanation was given, that, early in his professional career, he had found himself at night not resting well, "dreaming over the cases he had tried during the preceding day," and that, upon consulting a doctor, the latter had advised his patient to drop all work in the evening, to go out with his wife, "attend the theatre, play cards or go to parties, but forget the law."

This statement, simply recounting the doctor's advice, does not say that it was followed in manner and form given. Indeed, knowing of Judge —'s interest in the young people, in directing their minds to the lessons of Scripture, I cannot believe that he, in turn, would advise them to turn their minds toward the theatre and card-playing. As to parties, if these included the dance, they would be attended with the same elements of moral danger as the others just named—with the peril of the punch bowl very likely added thereto.

Hence, whatever the doctor might advise, the theatre, the card party and the dance could never give quiet to one who sought the Lord's favor and salvation, but, on the contrary, unrest and anguish of spirit would follow sooner or later. It is only the "Physician of Value" who can give us satisfying peace.
Pursuing His heavenly counsel we are ready to say with the Psalmist—"Give me understanding and I shall keep thy law: yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart." Such ought to be, and I prefer to believe that it is, the real attitude of soul of that able man of the law who has just been quoted.

It was safe counsel such as that contained in the above Scripture sentence, that made Sir Matthew Hale the great and shining light of the English judiciary that he came to be. In his younger days, after leaving Oxford University, he had been guilty of the folly of following a company of stage-players, and giving way to a good deal of dissipation. Mercifully saved from further pursuing this line of life, he turned aside from gay and foolish company, and entered upon an honorable and godly career. A happy change that, from dissipation to well-doing as in the Lord's sight. A change in our way of living may often be found highly desirable for our health's sake—of mind and body, but we have the best of reasons to beware of that kind of relief which is found in the theatre, the card-table and the dance!

When John H. Mickey was elected governor of Nebraska in 1902, he refused to allow an inaugural ball to be given "in his honor," because an entertainment of that light and sensual character was contrary to his religious principles. Afterward, at a meeting of Methodists in Chicago, about five hundred being present, he said, in part: "If we neglect to teach our children the word of God, if we set them a bad example in wicked things, like balls, and cards and theatres, we will have to meet those thoughts on the day of judgment."

... My sympathy goes out to those poor women whose husbands do not belong to any church, and who have the responsibility all on themselves. We men must wake up and help them. All my life I have taught my children that it is wrong to dance and play cards and go to theatres. How could I then, when I became governor of Nebraska, and they wanted to give an inaugural ball, go back on those principles which I had taught my children, and over which I had prayed with them many a night?"

This Puritan declaration, it is pleasant to add, did not defeat the re-election of J. H.
Mickey to the governorship in the autumn of last year. Whether it may have favored or disfavored him in the general view of his constituents, his position was safe and sound beyond cavil; it was of and for the truth. Said One higher than any State executive or court judge of this world,—"To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth."

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

We seldom realize from how many sources comes the power to live our daily lives—the fresh courage the hopefulness, the new view, the awakened ambition that make our days really alive. We arise to our morning task listless and dispirited. Old promises seem to have lost their hold, old duties look threadbare and uninteresting, our skies are gray, and we have no heart to put into anything. Then, in at the window floats a bird-song as jubilant as if the little throat were bursting with joy; the postman brings a letter full of loving messages from a friend afar; or a neighbor runs in with bright words of thanks for favors rendered. Straightaway our mood has changed; we are ready for work again in God's good world.
The countless influences that revive and cheer are as if his voice had called as of old: "Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live."

There is another side to this thought: All round us are the slain ones, gone down in the battle, and it may be our breath that is needed to put life into them again—our words of hope and cheer. Wherever one within our reach can be helped or strengthened we may be very sure it is God's call to us: "Come, O breath."—Forward.

"CHRIST'S cross is the sweetest burden that I ever bore," said the holy Lutherford; "it is such a burden as wings are to a bird, or sails to a ship, to carry me forward to my harbor."

We should not bear malice in memory or in speech.

TEMPERANCE.

The matter under this heading is furnished to THE FRIEND on behalf of the "Temperance Association of Friends of Philadelphia," by Benjamin F. Whitson, 401 Chestnut St., Phila.

"New occasions teach new duties."

Then to side with Truth is noble when we share her wretched crust, Ere her cause bring fame and profit, and 'tis prosperous to be just;
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside, Doubting in his abject spirit, till his Lord is crucified. —Lowell.

Within fifty years the temperance movement has radically changed its character. Then it was looked upon as almost entirely religious, and the aim was to secure signatures to total abstinence pledges. To-day it is largely treated in its social and political aspects. The regulation of the traffic in intoxicants has become the outstanding feature of the movement. While the total amount of liquor consumed in this country has increased, yet the habit of social drinking has decreased, and the number of total abstainers appear to have grown larger. —Editorial in Philadelphia Press.

George Warren, chaplain of the Missouri penitentiary, says that out of 2,279 convicts in the prison at the time he made an investigation, 85 per cent. of the entire number came there directly through the influence of liquor, and that 5 per cent. of the remainder came there indirectly from the same cause. That is, 2,000 of the convicts in the Missouri penitentiary is the result of the licensed liquor traffic in that State. —St. Louis Christian Advocate.

Of the 22,152 persons arrested in New York for disorderly conduct 18,770 admitted being intoxicated.

In Denmark there is a law that all drunken persons shall be taken to their homes in carriages provided at the expense of the saloon-keeper who sold them the last drink.

A resolution barring membership to all saloon-keepers, owners of saloons, or bar-keepers was adopted at the convention of the United Mine Workers at Indianapolis First Month 20th, 1905.

Saloons in the United States have been instrumental in destroying more human life in the last five years than hundreds of thousands of men did during the four years of civil war. —Secretary Windom.

There is not a drunkard in the land but intended to be a temperate man.

LOCAL OPTION.—The effort to secure the passage of a Local Option law by the Legislature of Pennsylvania is being pressed as earnestly and as wisely as the advocates of the measure are enabled to proceed. Political leaders of the State have promised that the political machinery of the State shall not be used in an effort to thwart the measure.

Many thousands of requests have been sent out urging that all who desire the passage of the bill shall aid by writing personal letters to representatives and by signing and circulating the formal "petitions" prepared for the purpose.

The bill, if passed, will not annul any existing statutes. It will merely open the way for communities to eliminate the saloon in any given district when a majority of the voters so express themselves. Whatever action the reader may feel called upon to perform in this matter should be done at once.

I am impressed with the large part sustained by the liquor traffic in recruiting the poor-house, the insane hospital, the jail and the penitentiary. The saloon has not hesitated, however, to inject itself with increasing aggressiveness into political affairs, and the growing participation of the saloon and the evident results of this activity in primaries and elections is a feature of our politics which challenges attention. —Governor Winfield T. Durbin, of Indiana.

CANTEEN QUESTION.—Before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, First Month 19th, Josephine Kelton, widow of the late Adjutant General J. C. Kelton, presented a petition signed by three hundred women in favor of the re-establishment of the beer canteen. The signers are members of the Woman's Army and Navy League. Josephine Kelton made a vigorous plea for the resumption of the sale of beer in the canteen. Chairman Hull remarked after she had concluded that there would be no legislation on that subject at this session.

THE BATTLE WITH THE SALOON.—The following is believed to be a reliable summary of the status of temperance legislation in most of the States at the present time:

Alabama.—Large majority of counties "dry," and the laws generally enforced.

Arizona.—Local Option by towns. Several towns have abolished saloons already.

Arkansas.—About three-fourths the counties "dry" and portions of the remaining territory also "dry."

California.—Fourteen counties have right of local option and have more or less completely banished the saloon.

Connecticut.—Towns dry, 93; wet, 75. State police to enforce liquor laws.

District of Columbia.—Anti-Saloon League has reduced licenses from 1,100 to 639.

Florida.—Under local option. Most of the counties have voted out the saloon.

Georgia.—Under local option; 115 counties out of 137 are dry, and only 33 cities and towns have saloons.

Illinois.—Has local option for small units of territory. Many towns dry.

Indiana.—About 60 per cent. of the territory has no saloons; 190 townships have voted dry since Sixth Month, 1902.

Iowa.—Under statutory prohibition, but under the working of a recent law a saloon may be allowed under certain conditions. Most of the State dry.

Kansas.—Under statutory prohibition. In only five counties out of 105 is the law ignored.

Kentucky.—Under local option; 63 counties no saloon; 29 have saloons at one place each; 15 at 2 places in each, and 12 at more than 2 places.

Louisiana.—Local option by towns, cities and parishes. Nine-tenths of the area of the State is without saloons.

Maine.—Under constitutional prohibitive. Less violation of law since 1901. Illicit vending confined to a few cities.

Maryland.—Some dry territory in every county. Eight counties have no saloons.

Massachusetts.—Majority of cities a towns are without saloons, including Cambridge, with population, 100,000.

Mississippi.—Local option; 63 out of counties have no saloons.

Nebraska.—Two-fifths of the cities a towns are dry. The Governor a trustee of the Anti-Saloon League.

New Hampshire.—Increasing number towns voting dry.

New Jersey.—Under a modified form local option. A small percentage of towns dry.

New York.—About one-third of the towns of the State have no saloon. Increasing demand for local option.

North Carolina.—Large portion of the State has no saloon. Several cities have voted dry this year, 1904.

North Dakota.—Largely under prohibitive. Ohio.—Four-sevenths of the towns and nine-fourteenths of the townships without saloons, beside many residence districts in cities.

Oregon.—Adopted local option, 1904. 4 ready 8 counties and 75 other precincts have voted dry.

Pennsylvania.—Under high license. League working for local option. Very little territory at present.

Rhode Island.—Fifteen out of twenty-three towns are dry.

South Carolina.—Under Dispensary system. Results not encouraging to cause of temperance.

Tennessee.—Eighty-four counties have saloon. Remaining counties partly dry.

Texas.—One hundred and thirty-three counties entirely dry; 15 others under prohibitive 52 partly dry; 43 wet.

Vermont.—Under local option. In 19 the license majority was 5,000. In 1904 the no-license majority was 7000.

Virginia.—Saloons practically prohibited by law in territory without police protection. Also some dry towns.

Washington.—Governor who vetoed local option bill in 1902 was defeated for re-election by his party in 1904.

West Va.—Under local option. Two-thirds of the State is without saloons.

A SOCIETY in England has started a school for native children in West Africa. One of them in that school a little girl struck her schoolmate. The teacher found it out, and asked the child who was struck "Did you strike her back again?"

"No, ma'am," said the child.

"What did you do?" asked the teacher.

"I left her to God," said she.

A beautiful and most efficient way to settle all difficulties and prevent all fights among children and among men. We shall never be struck by others when they know that we will not return the blow, but "leave them to God."

A Visit to Porto Rico.

Ponce, First Month 4th, 1905.—The mail out-lets, like the other departments of the United States Government, denote strength. There heavy wagons, and four fine mules on a mule trot, and other teams must give them track. This refers to the line or military road from Ponce via Coamo, Abonito, Cayey, Aguas, etc., to San Juan. The Porto Rican people have great fear of the strength of the United States.

Words can give but a very vague description of the wild prodigality of Nature's wonderful growth; a vast conservatory of wonderful tropical-isms, and coupled with it a setting of mountains and ravines, with a cloud-effect very thrilling. Our Heavenly Father has blessed this land in many ways, and how He does it seem to be appreciated!

This is not the season for blossoms, many trees are shedding,—though we did see many others, quite a variety in the flora of different studies. The cocoa palm flourishes near the bananas apparently almost everywhere, especially in high ground,—the coffee shrubs die by higher growth. It is the season for gathering this bean. Some people have a bushel in front of their shacks, others have many bushels, out to dry. In the thirty one-storied little villages, still with the dirty men and women, and oftentimes the children and ragged little horses clogged the street, to scurry out of the way as our party recklessly pushed among them.

Aguas is perhaps the most opposed of the Porto Rican towns to American ideas, and it is mainly was not inviting. On getting a horse we went out for a walk and found the Episcopalian Humphreys. He opened the door for a meeting in the evening. There was to be an executive meeting of their members, and we were to withdraw when through our services, and did so. W. C. A. spoke to the assemblage, the missionary interpreting. While we were at his house, a colporteur of the American Bible Society came in. He wanted to go to Ponce, and there were but two of us in the carriage, but we had two trunks and a lot of other material. We were to pay fifteen dollars for the trip, and consented to give the driver a ride if he was willing, though it would crowd us. It was arranged that night I should be objected to by him in the morning, in a lively flurry. But we finally got away, three passengers and the driver. But the horses, tired at the start were scarcely whipped through. Afterwards, on another relay, the little ponies were better.

This great military road is surely a wonder-piece of engineering, passing from two levels to an altitude of 2500 feet, very engineering difficulties to be mastered, and to be spanned, rocky mountain sides, the cleft, great valleys and canyons to be bridged. There are some very sharp curves or turns, making a radius of as little as sixty-five feet; and such a good road, I doubt if Fairmount Park roads are so well kept. Abonito (beautiful view) is the highest point—but it is raining, we were enclosed by curtains on the sides and could take no pictures. The view was not much, but the landscape was something grand. I don't wonder that some people claim that this is the most beautiful drive in the world. Many people make the trip from San Juan to Ponce in a day (fourteen hours or thereabouts). I thought it would be too much for W. C. A. and it seemed proper that we should be at Cayey over night.

Think of 23,000 people in a district and one protestant missionary or Christian leader working according to the ability given him for their souls' welfare. He did seem to appreciate the visit and a gift of Dymond's Essays. He seemed a good, tender man.

We passed through Coamo in the rain. As we neared the towns many odd outfits presented,—mostly men and boys with a big bag of plantains and bananas and yams on each side of a pony, and a big bunch lengthwise on top and between the others. I pitied the poor little things; some of these ponies would hardly weigh 400 pounds. They are started to work at eighteen months old.

Our room here at Ponce opens out upon the balcony on the front street. The door has slats. The walls do not go higher than within three feet of the ceiling, above that is lattice-work, connecting with three other rooms. Consequently we know pretty well when some of our talkative go to bed late, and others get up from four o'clock on. It makes short nights, with their lights glaring into our room. This lack of privacy is a result of the effort to get air into the inside rooms,—the only way, indeed. It is said that but few houses in all the island contain a pane of window-glass.

We are surely indebted to Annette Malin, who came down here to spend her vacation. She engaged a room for us at this hotel, (Inglaterra). The conference makes accommodations scarce. We had been invited to dinner at the house of A. S. Malin's friends, George and Frances Buckley, and had a pleasant evening, including an excellent American dinner. Our two midday meals on the route had cost six cents, aside from W. C. A.'s bread.

Thus far, and not much reference to the kind of work to which we feel drawn. Our coming at this time does seem opportune. The conferences of the Superintendents of Education from all the school districts in the island are being held to-day and to-morrow. The superintendents are all here too. We could not have reached them otherwise without heavy outlay of cash and effort. Not only this, but the very subject of morality, which is a great issue, was presented in a paper at this morning's session, and Commissioner Lord with whom we had conversed in San Juan, spoke of our presence on the island. He opened the way for us in the forenoon session, and took us around to the school building and introduced us to nearly all the superintendents; and though these sessions are with "closed doors," each of us had an opportunity to speak. It is our intention to send to each superintendent a copy of Dymond's Essays in Spanish when we return to San Juan, and we have recommended to them, after perusal, to request of our Book Store copies for teachers under them where they are likely to be beneficial.

Another weighty matter is at hand. W. C. A. feels that we should have a meeting here in Ponce for thinking people of the better class, represented by Dr. Racendon-Matienzo (Cintro, who is politically one of the leaders on the island, a member of the Executive Council of Eleven (or Senate). Two years ago W. C. A. had much talk with him on religious matters, and found him sympathetic and a strong minded man. It was evident in his greeting to us this morning. If we had been a few days later we should have missed his assistance, which is far-reaching in this city, as he offered his personal sanction and introduction. He has secured the Mayor's Salon for us, and helped us in getting a Spanish advertisement in the newspaper. We are to have a good interpreter. We are informed that a religious gathering has never been permitted in the town hall, owing to political and similar reasons. We also find that Catholics, Spiritualists, Protestants and others expect to be at the meeting. So there seems a weighty time ahead. Yet the incidents connected with arranging our proposed meetings have in detail been so remarkable that I have faith to believe that the Master who has opened the way will not fail to be in the midst of us when we get together.

The Roman Catholic Church is fighting hard for its old-time power, and many people are tired of the priests with their deception and greed. So there is a great ferment about here just now regarding religion. The state of morality is horrible. We truly feel as if we were in some respects among wolves. Yet there is a little native heaven and a few love Christ; and the missionaries are letting in rays of light into dark places; and in the sin and sorrow of Porto Rico a few are yearning after more light and purer things.

First Month 8th.—Well, the meeting came off in the town hall, and was rather larger than we expected. It was a great mixture, but largely composed of people who do not go to any services; including a good many of the principal people of the city. We felt the opening presence of the dear Master, in presenting important gospel truths, interpreted well in brief sentences by C. A. Teller, who is a minister. Jesus Christ was preached.

People were shown the falsity of externals as religion, and the uselessness and unscriptural usurpation of priestcraft, a priestly mediation other than that of Christ the one Mediator being not necessary in order for the salvation of the soul, that the only satisfactory religion was found in the work of the Holy Spirit in our hearts, and of a measure of that all present had been witnesses, access to the throne of grace by prayer was necessary, and all were invited to come directly to the throne of grace and find rest for their souls.

It was a solemn meeting, and the attention of the people was very marked. It has created much comment in this town of 35,000 persons. Not a few have expressed their appreciation of doctrine heard, and are glad their Saviour is pointed out to them, and where they can find Him. I don't know how many times we were asked if we expected to establish missions. People said they would go to that kind of meeting. We, of course, said that we did not expect to establish missions. This is a seed-sowing mission, we trust. The people are a little stirred, and are not satisfied with the Catholics, and the priests lead very improper lives, as is well known. On festive days and special occasions a great many will show up as Catholics, but we understand the lishup claims only 6,800 faithful Catholics on the island. Some of that faith will even admit that it is a good time for Protestants to spread their views.

To Young Friends.

Having visited several of the subordinate meetings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, I have taken special notice of young Friends with feelings of much interest and sympathy; and it has been my earnest desire that we may grow up young men and young women, prepared to take the places of those who have finished their work here below, and gained an entrance into eternal rest. It is our Christian duty, I believe, so to live that we will be fit subjects to fill their places. Many have gone, and doubtless many more who are now "bearing the burden and heat of the day" will soon follow. And someone must take one of their places if our Society is still to exist.

So let us, dear young Friends, prepare ourselves, not in any outward school, as some belonging to our beloved Society are doing, but let us learn in the school of Christ. May we earnestly seek to have our hearts washed in his precious blood, making us pure and clean; let there be nothing lurking deep down in our souls, that will hinder our progress in his blessed work.

May our "lights so shine before men, that they may see our good works, and glorify our Father which is in heaven."

We can do nothing of ourselves, but let us look unto our Good Shepherd for help and counsel, that we may know just what he would have us do, for we each have a work to do, a duty to perform, if peace is ours at the end.

If we are filled with the love of God, and are truly his children, ready to do anything He would have us do and leave undone that which would grieve Him, then we shall be prepared to take the places of the older Friends, and we shall "grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." B.

First Month 16th, 1905.

PERSONAL INFLUENCE.—On a cold winter evening, said T. L. Cuyler, recently, I made my first call on a rich merchant in New York. As I left the door, and the piercing gale swept in, I said:

"What an awful night for the poor!"

He went back, and bringing to me a roll of bank bills, he said:

"Please hand these for me to the poorest people you know."

After a few days I wrote him the graceful thanks of the poor whom his bounty had relieved, and added:

"How is it that a man so kind to his fellow creatures has always been so unkind to his Saviour as to refuse Him his heart?"

The sentence touched him to the core. He sent for me to come and talk to him. He has been a most useful Christian ever since. But he told me I was the first person who had talked to him about his soul in twenty years. One hour of work did more for that man than the pulpit effort of a lifetime.

CHRIST THE WORD.

The outward word is good and true,
But inward power alone makes new.
Not even Christ does cleanse from sin,
Unless His work is wrought within.

Christ in the heart, if absent there,
Thou canst not find Him anywhere.
Christ in the heart, O Friends begin,
To build the throne of Christ within.

And know from this that He is thine,
And that thy life is made divine.
When holy love shall have control,
And rule supremely in thy soul.

—From an Old Paper.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In the Sixth Month, 1849, Solomon and Susan Lukens, members of London Grove Monthly Meeting, Chester County, Pa., offered their services to the Committee, which were accepted. Sarah Eastlack a member of Hadonfield Monthly Meeting, with the concurrence of the Committee, accompanied them, and they arrived at Tunesassa early in the Tenth Month of that year. Ebenezer Worth, at the request of the Committee, had previously gone out and made arrangements for their accommodation with the tenant occupying the property there. Sarah Eastlack soon afterward commenced teaching school in the building erected for this purpose near the river.

For several months previous to this date, the Indians had been very much unsettled, in the prospect of changing their form of Government, from that of the chiefs who held office, generally for life, to that of officers who should be elected annually by the people. The conduct of the chiefs in some particulars had given dissatisfaction, and there was a growing disposition among a number of the Indians to adopt a form of Government modeled after that of the whites. A Convention of the people was held on the Cattaraugus Reservation by general agreement on the fourth of Twelfth Month, 1848, in which a new form of Government was resolved upon. In the Declaration which stated the reasons for this change, the following charges are made against their ancient form of Government by chiefs, "It affords no security in the enjoyment of property, it provides no laws regulating the institution of marriage, but tolerates polygamy. It makes no provision for the poor, but leaves the destitute to perish. It leaves the people dependent on foreign aid for the means of education. It has no judiciary executive departments. It is an irresponsible, self-constituted aristocracy. Its powers are absolute and unlimited in assigning away the people's rights; but indefinite and not exercised, in making municipal regulations for their benefit or protection. We cannot enumerate the evils growing out of a system so defective, nor calculate its overpowering weight on the progress of improvement."

The Constitution of the Seneca Nation then adopted provided for the election annually of a council of eighteen members in which the legislative power should reside; of a president who should see that all laws are faithfully executed; and of three peacemakers on each Reservation, whose duties are similar to that of justices of the peace among whites. I, with power to take action in the probate wills and the settlements of decedents estate. A clerk, a treasurer, and two marshals (for each Reservation) were also provided for the latter officers to execute all process issued by the courts, and do such other duty as shall be prescribed by law.

The power of making treaties was vested the council but no treaty was to be bind until submitted to the people and approved three-fourths of all the legal voters, and three-fourths of all the mothers of the Nation. Officers were then appointed to serve others were duly elected. Other provisions of importance were also included in this Constitution; and Philip E. Thomas of Baltimore was appointed to represent their Nation at Washington, as an agent empowered to act in their behalf.

The action of this convention was considered revolutionary by many of the chiefs, who refused to attend it, and who opposed the recognition of the new Government by the legislature of New York, and by the authorities at Washington; some of their number were sent to Albany and to Washington in order to test against it. In remonstrating against recognition of the new Government, it was urged by the chiefs that the proceedings of the convention were unknown to the majority of the people, that the pretended representatives of the Seneca Nation who adopted the Constitution were generally men of inferior reputation, ignorant and uneducated and that the signatures attached to the Constitution, seventy-two in number, were, with the exception of four names those of what was called the pagan party, and were possessed with but little or no property, and the agents of bad and designing men.

In a document addressed to the President of the United States signed by thirty chiefs of the Cattaraugus and Allegheny Reservations, they appeal for the rights guaranteed to them by former treaties, in which chiefs were always recognized as the representatives of their people and say "We do not understand why our internal concerns shall be interfered with by our great father, who has so often promised to leave us alone, long as we maintained peace and asked no interposition, nor why our great father shall keep his word with great nations, and break it with the little one that nestled under his broad wings.

"We are improving in agriculture, in government, in everything. We have taken steps, leaning upon the strong arm of our father. We must move very slow, for we are weak and the path is a new one, one of our fathers never trod.

"If our father leads us gently and kindly with us, we will go on, but if he pushes us away to go alone, we must lose the way and perish. We have our old customs to lean upon as a staff. New laws such as the white man has are not good for the Indian. They are big staff, so big that his small fingers cannot grasp it, when we have grown to be big men we may lay aside our little stick, but if we snatch away now, we must fall and die. We do not think it good to burn the court house, before we can build the court house

The Indians must be governed by their old laws until they can live under the laws of white men. We fear our great father lets how young his Seneca children are, commands them to run when they can stand in this new path."

They also complain of a change made in 1847 which the annuities heretofore paid to the Indians to be distributed among the people at the discretion were then paid to the heads of the different families according to the number of each family, and use this energetic language—"Listen Father, had people may it is wrong to pay these annuities to us, we know that it is right. Have we cheated people? Our hands are clean, why then interfere between us and them? If we do not give our customs will reach and punish us, our father break his word, for fear we will do wrong our people.

Listen, Father, to the truth! Say that you are so great and we so little that you may do as you ever you please, and see which mode of government is best for the Indians. Your Agents send and pays each head of the family a few dollars and a little cloth and so empties his hands, and goes away; in a few days all is gone.

Bye and bye our poor Indians come to the agents and ask for food, but there is nothing for them; sick Indians want medicine, and old Indians want clothes, but the chiefs will give no medicine nor clothes. They go to the agent-keeper and ask to be trusted, but the agent-keeper tells them, I can't trust you, but the chiefs promise to pay, I will give you a few little things you need, and wait until next summer. But how can the chiefs pass their hands for money which will not be paid to them. Then comes trouble to the nation, and the agents want a little money to ward it off. But we have none, and white men can cut down trees, and steal their land, and abuse the Indians as they please, while the chiefs can only talk, and talk; and so your annuity comes like water in a thunder storm, in a few minutes the land is covered, but in a little while it all runs off and leaves it dry as ever.

But they pay the money to the chiefs, and it is like a soaking rain that goes deep into the ground, and makes all good things grow. They take a little part and put it by for the chiefs, and for the nation, and divide the rest among the people. When sick and poor people come to them in the winter they can help them, and they can pass their word to the agent-keepers for the honest and industrious men and all things go well. But now our great father who is so far off, and who is never here, but for a day or two in summer, cut down the chiefs, who are the fathers of their people in the year round.

He takes away all their power to do good, and teaches the young men to despise them. Soon a chief will be nobody. But when the chiefs are nobodies, what will the people do? When the influence of the chiefs is destroyed the people will be without law; when the councils are without power, our people are ruined. We are Indians, and not white men. Take these things into consideration, and destroy this unjust order.

Live up to your treaties though they be broken with poor Indians and be truly kind and just to us and to our people."

In signing the resolutions accompanying the new form of Government one Indian only appears to have written his name, the remaining seventy-one having made their mark as a signature. Of the thirty-eight chiefs who signed a remonstrance against it eight wrote their names and thirty made their mark.

Notwithstanding the protests of the chiefs the Commissioner of Indian affairs at Washington announced on the second of Second Month 1849 that the new form of Government "having been adopted by a majority will be recognized by the Government of the United States, and so far as may be necessary the relations of the Government will be made to conform thereto." The legislature of New York after investigating the claims of the respective parties adopted the same course.

Notwithstanding this decision the chiefs did not relinquish their efforts to regain their supremacy for several years, but their appeals to the United States and state authorities to reverse their decision and restore the ancient system of Government were unavailing.

The friends living at Tunesassa, and the members of the Committee believed it would not be proper for them to be drawn into the controversies which existed amongst the Indians in consequence of this condition of their affairs, and to refrain from giving any advice which might be construed into giving active support to either party, but to endeavor to promote the welfare of the nation as a whole, and to recommend such measures as would tend to bring about a harmony of feeling and an united effort among them to put down evils which threatened their prosperity as individuals and as a people.

Mary Berry.

Mary Berry was a minister of our religious Society, belonging to Third Haven Monthly Meeting, Talbot County, Maryland.

In the year 1788 she visited Friends in the counties of Philadelphia and Chester, in the exercise of her gift as a minister of the gospel. In the year following, she performed a visit of love to those not professing with Friends in Dorchester and Carolina counties.

With a number of concurrence from her Monthly Meeting, in the year 1792, she visited some of the meetings of Friends on the western shore of Maryland and Virginia, most of those in North Carolina, and all in South Carolina and Georgia, which afforded peace and satisfaction of mind, on her return home, "and," said she, "demands acknowledgments of gratitude to the arm of Divine sufficiency, who has strengthened and sustained in the various difficulties attending."

In the year following she made a visit to the families of Friends at Motherkill and Three Runs.

In 1795 her Monthly Meeting granted her a minute for service to some of the West India Islands, particularly to Barbadoes. This minute states that she was, "A minister of the gospel, well esteemed among the brethren, and of an exemplary and pious life and conversation." This certificate and concern obtained the concurrence of the Quarterly Meeting; also, that of the meeting of Ministers and Elders in Philadelphia, but a suitable passage not occurring, it being a time of war, and she in advanced age, this minute was returned to Third Haven Monthly Meeting.

In the winter of 1790 she accompanied Job Scott to a number of meetings on the eastern shore of Maryland, and in Delaware State, and Job writes thus: "Dear Mary Berry is one of the most skillful laborers I have ever known. She bows to the root, keeps down to the life, thereby works through wonderfully, and mostly in the end reigns triumphantly."

At a meeting at Motherkill he says, "Dear Mary Berry lifted up her voice like one of the sweetest singers in Israel. She is not only advanced in years; but I think, as thoroughly 'redeemed from the earth, and from amongst men,' and her affections as much set on things above, as any one I ever saw, and she shines accordingly. May every such illustrious example animate the minds of all that behold their beauty, and engage them to press forward through all the crowds of opposition, to the mark, for the prize of the high calling! I think she is the most bowed in prayer, lies the lowest, and rises the most in the purity, with the least of creaturely animation, and most of Divine life, of almost any I have known. Oh! that this may become more and more the case in our Society, as well as throughout the earth."

For several of the last years of her life she was mostly confined to her own room, except going to meeting. Such was her bodily infirmity that when apparently unable to stand alone, she would frequently rise in meeting, and speak with life and power for a considerable time, without appearing to be fatigued.

She was diligent in the attendance of meetings, although residing about three miles distant; even when her bodily strength had so far failed that she had to be carried from her carriage, to her seat in the gallery and back. Thus supported by the Divine life, her zeal for truth, and love to her friends, continued to the close of her useful and exemplary life, and she departed in peace.

Notes in General.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.—The London letter of the Church Standard says: "The remarkable correspondence which for the last three months has appeared in the Daily Telegraph, under the title 'Do We Believe,' has been brought to a close. If all the letters had been printed on this subject which were received, they would have occupied 2500 columns of the paper. The vast majority of the letters were from men—doctors, students of every description, naval and military officers, clerks in public offices, police magistrates, detective officers and clergymen. The whole is said to form one of the most significant human documents which have ever appeared in the public press."

Robert College, Constantinople, of which Dr. George Washburn was for many years the president, recently completed its forty-first year, and has shown a growth of which any educational institution might be proud. Starting with but a few pupils and in the face of intense local opposition, it has acquired a fine plant on the west bank of the Bosphorus in the suburbs of Constantinople, and permission has recently been given by the Turkish Government for the erection of a gymnasium, a science hall, and two additional residences for instructors. During the past year the students numbered 320 young men, of whom one-half were Greeks, and most of the others Armenians and Bulgarians. In all, there were fourteen races represented in the student body. While the institution is maintained under Christian auspices, no profession of faith is asked of its pupils on entrance, but morality according to the standards of Christianity is insisted upon, and breaches of it are punished by expulsion. The expenses of the institution are ordinarily about $60,000 annually, and effort is now being made in this country by Dr. Washburn to secure for the college such endowment as will place it on a firm financial basis. The new president is Dr. C. F. Gates.—Boston Transcript.

A GAZETTEER ON INDIAN TERRITORY.—With the exception of the small reservations in the northeast corner, the entire area of the Indian Territory has been surveyed and mapped on the scale of 1:125,000 by the United States Geological Survey. The atlas sheets made from these surveys have served as a guide in the preparation of a recent bulletin published by the Survey, which is entitled "A Gazetteer of Indian Territory." In it is given the location of every station, village, town, creek, river, high road, and road in the territory, with the name of the atlas sheet on which it may be found. Henry Cannett, the author of the bulletin, has also written an introductory chapter to the gazetteer proper, in which he relates many interesting facts concerning the Territory.

The great body of the Territory is divided among five Indian tribes. They are the Cherokee, whose reservation is in the northern part of the Territory; the Creek, in the central part; the Seminole, just west of them; the Choctaw, in the southeast; and the Chickasaw, in the southwest. Besides these there are a number of small tribes that have reservations grouped in the northeast corner of the Territory. On these reservations the people have developed a considerable degree of civilization and have been long known as the Five Civilized Tribes. Each tribe has its own system of government, which is patterned in many ways after our State governments; with a governor, a legislature, and a judiciary of its own, and, that recently, a land was held in common, and occupation gave all the title that was needed. There was an abundance of good land for all and no occasion for the clashing of interests. Their cupidity having been aroused by this condition of things, many white men settled in the Territory, married Indian wives, and thereby acquired tribal rights. Many squaw-men thus obtained valuable coal lands, timber lands, and farm lands. Others followed in their wake, and settled without permission, until the whites in Indian Territory in 1900, as shown by the Census returns, outnumbered the Indians many times. This situation is a perilous one for the Indians, as it is not credible that white men in such overwhelming numbers would long remain subject to Indian laws and without title to the lands which they were occupying. The lands have therefore been sub-divided into townships and sections preparatory to allotting them to the Indians in severalty and breaking up their tribal governments. The allotment has been completed, and it is probable that a Territorial form of government will be substituted in the near future for the Indian governments.

The total population of the Territory in 1900 was 392,000, of which not less than 302,680 were white, 52,500 were Indians, and 36,853 were negroes, either former slaves of the Indians or their descendants.

The chief industries of the Indian Territory are farming and cattle raising. The rainfall is ample and the soil rich, and nearly every crop produced within the limits of the United States can be raised in the Territory. The prairies of the Cherokee Nation have been in large part leased to cattlemen and enormous herds range over them.

In 1900 the number of farms in the Territory was 45,505, and 15.4 per cent. of the Territory was under cultivation. The average size of the farms was 100 acres, considerably larger than the average in the United States.

This bulletin, which is scheduled as No. 248 on the Survey's list of publications, is published for free distribution, and may be obtained on application to the Director of the United States Geological Survey, Washington, D. C.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The subject of additional legislation by Congress to prevent unjust discrimination by railroads, and the effect of the freight rates on the great interest in various centers. The president of the Pennsylvania Railroad is quoted as stating that the amount of money invested in railway property was about twelve thousand millions, represented by securities mostly held in this country and very widely distributed among the people. He also said that the number of employees of the railroads was about twelve hundred thousand. Though legislation is not expected during the present session, President Roosevelt is taking steps to avow public sentiment in its favor.

Appalling statistics lately made by The Public Ledger on the prevalence of vice in this city and its protection by the police department have been confirmed by official investigations. A late presentation by the Grand Jury says that testimony in connection with the bills formally brought before it reveals a condition of affairs which would bring the blush of shame to any respectable citizen and make him feel that the fair name of Philadelphia is being brought into disrepute by those who allow the continuance of such conditions of affairs. The Grand Jury cannot but believe from evidence it has heard that vice flourishes and increases because it is protected or countenanced by those high in authority and leaders in certain wards and political clubs.

The U. S. Supreme Court has rendered a decision in the case brought by the Government against the beef trust, which sustains in all respects the contentions of the Government. This decision, it is said, prohibits the continuation of a combination to suppress competition in the purchase of cattle for slaughter, forbids combinations to maintain uniform prices in selling meats, and forbids combinations to obtain discriminatory rates from the railroad companies.

On the 1st and 2nd instants the temperature in some parts of Montana fell to 44° below zero, and by far the coldest weather of the season prevailed throughout the Northwest. The cold wave has been very severe in Ohio, Wisconsin, and the Great Southern States. The Mississippi River was frozen above Memphis. It has also been very severe in Texas.

The importation of reindeer into Alaska is reported to have been followed with very satisfactory results. So successfully has the plan worked, that not only does it furnish the natives with food, clothing and means of transportation, but holds out the prospect of putting Alaska in a few years in the position to supply deer meat to outside markets. An excellent cheese is made of their milk. As carriers they have already supplanted dogs for the United States mail, and may be ridden, or will carry easily a pack of 150 pounds in weight.

Statistics show that during the last year the reasons why negroes favored the cities are, first, the facilities for public school instruction; and, secondly, on account of police protection, and also that "I think I do not overstate the matter when I say that for every lynching, or attempted lynching that takes place in the country, a score of colored people leave the vicinity for the city."

Statistics also show that during the last six months of the present fiscal year the immigration from Russia was the heaviest in the history of the Immigration Bureau, aggregating 86,191, against 57,189 and 69,683 for the corresponding periods in 1902 and 1903.

The President has sent a message to Congress calling attention to the statistics on marriage and divorce laws that have been collected since 1886, and recommending legislation. In it, he says: "The institution of marriage is, of course, at the very foundation of our social organization, and all influences that affect that institution are of vital concern to the people of the whole country. There is a widespread conviction that the divorce laws are dangerous safeguards for the security of the family of the State, resulting in a diminishing regard for the sanctity of the marriage relation. The hope is entertained that co-operation among the several States can be secured to the end that there may be enacted, upon the subject of marriage and divorce uniform laws containing all possible safeguards for the security of the family. Intelligent and prudent action in this direction will be greatly promoted by securing reliable and trustworthy statistics upon marriage and divorce."

A despatch from Oil City of the 31st ult. says: The second well ever known to produce refined oil has been discovered on the George Farm, near Bradyhead, a strong County. The oil is said to be as clear as the commercially refined, burning as clear flame and mal as good an illumination. The production is estimated twenty-five barrels a day. The original refined oil was from a new process, but the first was from a well. A sun spot, believed to be one of the largest and I defined ever observed, has been discovered by Prof. H. Cole, of Chicago. Mathematical calculations prove that the spot on the surface of the sun was one-tenth its total diameter, or more than 80,000 miles in its width. Other large spots have since been discovered, and changes in their size have taken place, which changes is believed are closely connected with electrical effects observed on the earth's surface.

George A. Lowry, of Albany, Ga., the inventor of round cotton bales, has developed a mechanical picker which is expected to make an enormous saving in the cotton industry. For its operation five men or six are required. It is claimed that the machine will do work of twenty pickers.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 1st, says:—

Personal assurances of his intention to ameliorate conditions and remove the causes, in so far as they were possible, which led to the recent strike were delivered by Emperor Nicholas yesterday to workmen representing all the leading factories of St. Petersburg, who all invitation journeyed to Tsarskoe Selo, and were received in audience in the hall of the Alexander Palace, where he has his winter residence.

It is believed that the Emperor is about to have had a far greater more reassuring effect than proclamations by Ministers and Governor Generals. $25,000 has been given by Emperor, Empress and Dowager Empress for the relief of the families of those who were killed or badly wounded on the 22nd ult.

The manufacturers of St. Petersburg have made concessions to the strikers and contributed to the fund.

A despatch from St. Petersburg says, the report of committee of Ministers appointed to devise the means of giving effect to the Emperor's reform a makes many important recommendations, especially regard to increasing the powers of the Senate over the provinces, which would give it independence, and the right already belonging to the Senate of legislative initiative should be enlarged, and favors the establishment of lower administrative tribunals connected with the Senate. It is understood the Czar has approved these changes.

During the different parts of Poland is reported martial law has been declared in some of its provinces. Desperate battles between Russians and Japanese recently taken place near the Hun River, lasting days; in which the former admit the loss of 10,000 killed and wounded. The weather has been intense cold.

A despatch from San Francisco says: Awakening a sleep of fifteen years, the great volcano of Momoto on the northwest shore of Lake Managua, in Nicaragua suddenly burst into tremendous fury at 2:30 o'clock the afternoon of the 16th ult.

It is said that at Savinorska, in Kossia, is a palace built of blocks of soap made even the foundations and roof being made from that material. So are the chimneys, although the paper used in their construction was first mingled with a fire-proof material. The house, which is of considerable extent, and will, its architect, outlast such as are built of stone and cost over $40,000.

In certain towns of Russia, too, the experiment is being made of utilizing paper for paving the roads and streets. In this case also blocks compressed to solidity are employed, and are said to stand excellently the wear and tear of traffic. The cost, however, is present too great to permit of anything like their usual adoption.

A CERTAIN religious Society (no matter of what name) contains a man who says, "If our members are not more intelligent men, more enlightened citizens and better neighbors to who fall among all sorts of thieves than the generality of people, then the gospel is not the power and wisdom of God. For we must be nearer the sources than others." So: "Practical forgetting of men and our relation to them is the virtual denial of God. The way to our Father's house is often over our brother's ground."

Nor only they who militate against Christ, crucify Him, still part his garments among them and exhibit an external clothing of his robes; but also they are enjoying a better country and a higher civilization for his having lived and died. The sandal tree seems to us as with its own fragrance those who cruelly trample it down. In some such sense of making more worth living both for the just and the unjust, we may receive the recent remark that "Religion blesses the irreligious who neglect it quite as much as it does the religious people who cherish it." But it blesses those who neglect it with outward advantages, while blessing their inward being. Their own personal religion, not other people's must bless us here. In the midst of abounding things their hearts grow harder by withstand- ing it, till the things that belong to their vision are hid from their eyes because they are neglected to know the day of their vision, and become past feeling or knowing when good cometh." Thus in the immortal religion far from blesses those who neglect it.

THE APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.—In a recent book entitled "Religious Persecution, A Study in Political Psychology," E. S. P. Haynes writes: "There is much vain talk of ecclesiasical continuity, but the Nazarene carpenter would hardly have understood the ideas of any Christian sect after the fourth century, but the Quakers. They have made religion a strictly individual matter; they have, at all times stood out for peace, and they have never tainted religious ideals with political subtterfuges. Even when politically supreme, they have never violated spiritual freedom. Yet we are asked to believe that the mediæval inquisitor and the ritualistic priest are, in some mysterious way, more closely connected with the Christian tradition than Dissenters like George Fox or William Penn."

A Momentary Victory and Lifelong Defeat.

A young man out of employment, a stranger to the city, asks for means of sustenance over a holiday, that he may get work when work again begins. He is taken to a house where meals are offered at a fixed rate, and the proprietor is requested to furnish them to the stranger up to a certain day. On calling to pay for the meals, the benefactor finds that the youth has asked for and was readily granted excessive fare at extra prices; and the proprietor makes all he can out of him at the citizen's expense. Both gainers congratulate themselves on the proceeds of an "eye to business." That two days' success is followed by one party missing ever after the patronage of his heretofore good customer; while the other, returning in a month, again short of means, finds that the clever advantage which he before took of his benefactor is the last assistance that he can have opportunity to get from him. How much better for both short-sighted victories to have been abstained from, rather than that a continued patronage should be thrown away for the future.

A common-looking man, simply clad, makes his way in a bank in a line of depositors waiting for their turn to be served at the paying teller's window. When the old man's turn comes the teller calls out to him to get into motion, applying to him a disrespectful epithet. The depositor passes on without handing in his check, but having joined the rear of the line appears again at the window with a check calling for the whole amount of his deposit in that bank. His signature revealed him as one of New York's richest manufacturers, and the withdrawal of his large deposit would sorely cripple the bank. Entreaties from the principal officers were in vain. The momentary smartness of the clerk became a long-felt blow to him and to that institution.

A young couple start out in married life to form a home for themselves. A juncture comes when there is a consultation which of two ways to turn. One of them soon settles it by a pert remark or an impatient tone which "gets the case" his or her way. But the victorious partner little suspects what a long silent defeat to mutual happiness is to follow, or what is the cause of the future loss of confidence felt by the wounded heart.

Life is full of such brief successes that fix a permanent failure. It were better to have been less smart and more wise. The unprincipled victory of a moment blasts the brightness of a lifetime. A little more gold to-day, and moral bankruptcy of durable riches forever. A little more stimulant just now, eating out a void that craves with increasing intensity a refilling, soon prepares a wrecked body to be dragged to the grave by its miserable existence. A life, character, and standing of noble possibilities for time and for eternity, bartered for one sensual indulgence. A high birthright sold for one mess of pottage. So goes "the world, the flesh, and the devil." So, for one forbidden bait, went the first Adam.

But now comes the second Adam to make alive such as are dead in the first. He trod under foot the temporary for the permanent. He brushed aside the allurements and ambitions of the moment for lasting good to man for whose life he would die. He abjured a victory over carnal hunger, that he might live by his Father's word; a triumph over the law of falling bodies that he might be innocent of appropriating Divine powers for selfish uses. He renounced the imperialism of the world that he might simply and purely worship God and Him only serve. And now behold, for foregoing the short-lived advantages so tempting to a son of man, the endless spiritual victory of the Son of God! For "therefore God highly exalted Him, and gave unto Him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things on earth, and things under the earth. And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father."

The secret of the long victory over the short and momentary, is found in our preference of the Spirit to the flesh and mere self. The crown is by the Cross; the defeat is by fleshly success, or self-life irrespective of permanent principles of truth, good and love.

What a telescopic sight is given to goodness, what near-sightedness to unscrupulous desire! Having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust, the way is cleared for us also to be partakers of the Divine nature. Such partakers are led in the school of Christ through this, their addition table: "Add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, love. But he that lacketh these things is blind, seeing only what is near" (2 Peter 1: 5-9).

The shortsightedness of those who are without the gospel virtues prevents them from seeing farther than their own bodily members, or imagined self-interest. Distant rewards and distant punishments seem too invisible to have any present influence. "He that hateth his brother is in darkness and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whether he goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes."

But the far-look of the prophet is because of a union with the Divine nature and spirit, a communion with the All-seeing Eye. Ability to see afar off, in one purged from his old sins, looks over the heads of present temptations of time and sense, and sees in the light and life of eternal and far-reaching principles of Truth. To the Witness for Truth he attaches himself, and with the eye of truth he sees; and his heart is so fixed, serving the Lord, that he will not fear what man can do unto him. He whose eye is upon the success of the day, may give his wagon a move, while it lasts, by hitching it to a tree away by the passing wind. But he who looks for the eternal progress above earth, time and sense, will, figuratively speaking, "hitch his wagon to a star;"—he will attach his course to eternal and heavenly principle, made most clear in the Spirit of Christ. Well he knows, in his larger vision by the light of Christ, that ungodliness seizes but a vanishing triumph, in place of that godliness which is "profitable for all things, having promise of the life that now is, as well as that which is to come."

WHOEVER speaks of an "ungovernable temper" speaks wrongly. There are many un-governed tempers, but no un-governable ones. Whoever does not govern his temper fails not because it can't be done, but because he will not do it. Christ came to govern tempers, and to help men to do so. Failure is the fault of our own weakness or of our want of faith in Christ.—Extract.

Seventh Month 2nd, 1876.—"To-day in our Meeting at H. I found my mind engaged in some concern for a skeptical state, which doubted the reality of the unseen world, or that of future rewards or punishments, because unable to discern these truths through the outward senses.—I felt drawn to rise with the remark that one born blind could not conceive of the beauties of the outward creation, nor a person devoid of hearing enjoy the harmony of sweet sounds; that the Scriptures inform us that 'eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him, but God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit, for the Spirit teacheth all things, yea, the deep things of God;' that it would be no proof of the want of reality of (form or sound) in the created world, that the blind and deaf should deny their existence, because they could not discern them,—neither had the unregenerate any ground to doubt the truth of spiritual things, because they could not appreciate them.

The eye of faith must first be opened by Divine power, and a new sense be conferred by the Holy Spirit, ere man can penetrate the mysteries of Heavenly things,—as declared by the Apostle—"the natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned," and our Saviour declared that He came into this world, that they that see not, might see,—but that those who see, might be made blind,—these mysteries being hid from the wise and prudent, but revealed to the babes and simple hearted, teachable ones in Christ."

Twelfth Month 27th, 1877.—"I consider it a precious privilege to retire alone, as I am favored to do this afternoon, and wait upon and pour out my soul to my Heavenly Father. 'My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord, my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God! I believe it is the will of our Divine Redeemer that we should walk by faith, and not by sight, in our Christian path to a glorious inheritance; and that the withholding of those extraordinary manifestations of His immediate intervention in their behalf, which were the experiences of His Apostles, when Christ was personally upon earth, through the miraculous pouring out of His Holy Spirit soon after His ascension, is for the trial of our faith. Now the Apostle Peter says that the trial of your faith is more precious than that of gold which perisheth, and if we are willing to abide in Christ by naked faith, though now we see Him not, surely He will add the blessing spoken of to Thomas:—'Because thou hast seen Me thou hast believed, blessed are they that have not seen Me, and yet have believed.' The human heart naturally longs for external, sensible evidence that our Heavenly Parent regards us personally.

It would be so easy for Him, who has all power in heaven and in earth, to speak by an audible voice to His poor finite creatures and give us peace and assurance in our longings after Him.

My adorable Redeemer, give me undoubting faith in Thy mercy, to trust in that Strong Arm which has been raised and stretched forth to lift me out of the horrible pit and the mire and set my feet on the Rock! Thou hast opened enough of thy mysteries to me to see as monuments of Thy faithfulness to the seeing, contrite ones, although I have no miracle to boast of,—unless, indeed, the redemption of any soul from the deadness of sin be a miracle, which I think it may be justly accounted

First Month 21st, 1878.—"This day completes my fiftieth year. The past century long period in some aspects. 'What glorious hopes, what gloomy fears, have sunk beneath that noiseless tide! Yet I can rejoice in thy unmerited mercy and blessings of a loving Father. The hope and assurance of a rich free redemption from the thralldom of evil through the atoning blood of Christ, is at the climax of them all. 'Thanks be to God I am His unspeakable Gift!'"

Third Month 3rd, 1878.—"Nearer my G to Thee! Some access in prayer, in my rest this afternoon. Oh! how precious are the communications, when the veil seems lifted, a way into the holiest opened by Him, Who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life.

The living sap flows into the dependent branch, from the Root of Life. The livid water is felt to spring up into everlasting life. May my soul, in humble thankfulness, adore and worship Thee, who sittest upon the Throne and who in mere mercy leads me to the living Fountain of waters!"

Eleventh Month 25th, 1879.—"During walk this afternoon, in the bright sunlight a temperate air, I passed a field of young wheat whose verdure refreshed the eye in contrast with the brown and dying grass which lay beneath it. As I mused and sauntered on, the peace which passeth all understanding, and a sweet season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord covered my spirit, so that I could inwardly rejoice in God my Saviour, who so lovingly condescends to refresh His unworthy creature."

The green wheat fields seemed a type of the pastures of life, where the Heavenly Shepherd leads His flock, and a clear flowing brook whose banks I meandered, called up thoughts of the 'still waters,' and the healing stream which winds through the vales of Paradise. I saw within my heart, it is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto Thy name, O, Most High—for Thou Lord, hast made me glad through Thy work. I see Thy triumph in the works of Thy hands! Thou believe we are qualified from day to day, as in secret places, as well as in the public congregation, to worship and adore Him, in spirit. Who made heaven and earth, the sea, and the fountain of waters."

"YES, she is hard to live with," admitted one who was placed amid uncongenial surroundings. "Jealousy and selfishness are hard to overcome, but if our relationship is not what I would like to have it, I am trying not to fret over it any more. After all I am only responsible for one side of it. I cannot manage it all, but I can take care that my side of it shall be only patience, kindness, and consideration. There are many hard things that grow easier when we learn to concern ourselves with just our own part, and drop the rest."

THE WASHERWOMAN'S SONG.

In a very humble cot,
 In a rather quiet spot,
 In the suds and in the soap,
 Worked a woman full of hope;
 Working, singing, all alone,
 In a sort of undertone,
 "With a Saviour for a friend,
 He will keep me to the end."
 Sometimes happening along,
 I had heard the semi-song,
 And I often used to smile,
 More in sympathy than guile;
 But I never said a word
 In regard to what I heard,
 As she sang about her friend
 Who would keep her to the end.
 Not in sorrow nor in glee Working all day long was she,
 As her children, three or four,
 Played around her on the floor;
 But in monotonous song
 She was humming all day long,
 "With the Saviour for a friend,
 He will keep me to the end."
 Just a trifle lonesome she,
 Just as poor as poor could be;
 But her spirits always rose,
 Like the bubbles in the clothes.
 And though widowed and alone,
 Cheered her with the monotonous,
 Of a Saviour and a friend
 Who would keep her to the end.
 I have seen her rub and scrub,
 On the washboard in the tub,
 While the baby sopped in suds,
 Rolled and tumbled in the duds;
 Or was paddling in the pools,
 With old scissors stuck in spoons!
 She still humming of her friend
 Who would keep her to the end.
 Human hopes and human needs
 Have their root in human needs,
 And I would not wish to strip
 From that washerwoman's lip
 Any song that she can sing,
 Any hope that songs can bring;
 For the woman has a friend
 Who will keep her to the end.

Reflections by a Young Female, at the Age of Seventeen Years.

(Found among her papers, at her decease).

About a twelve month ago, I remember feeling a great resignation and sweetness. I think then knew what is meant by the "silence of flesh;" a feeling very difficult to attain, which, I am convinced, every true Christian must strive for, till it is attained. For any months past, I have believed it my duty to do so; to endeavor to feel a mental stillness, or a total resignation of feeling and sensation from thinking; and in this state to sit for the influences and teachings of Divine Grace and Truth on the heart. When we attain this stillness, the Holy Spirit directs us what to do, what to pray for, and how to pray, and shows us when vocal supplication is required of us, and when secret, mental prayer, is most acceptable to the Father of Spirits. I have often felt anxious to know what is the religion; I have entreated my Heavenly Father to lead me into it, however painful a surrender of heart and life may be; for, without that, there is no true and lasting peace to be found, and no preparation for the enjoyment of the Divine presence, in a State of perfect holiness, hereafter.

I have, at different times, been desirous to know whether that profession in which I have been educated, is the right one for me to retain, or whether any other form of worship would be more acceptable to God, from me. I never made use of vocal supplication on the subject; but I believe my secret prayers were accepted by Him who knew the sincerity in which they were addressed.

After waiting to be instructed, my desires are at length fully answered; for inward revelation assures me, that mine must be a religion of stillness, and total resignation of self; that whether the feeling of devotion excited be that of prayer, praise, gratitude, or adoration, I must be immediately influenced by the spirit of Christ, before I can feel union and communion with my Heavenly Father, which, (whether in words or not) constitutes alone the essence of worship. I feel convinced that whatever the outward form of worship may be, the only true and acceptable offering, is a sacrifice of the heart; and the more I feel of a devotional spirit, the more I am led to be still, and not to look for instrumental aid; for I feel that Christ, the inward Teacher and Comforter, is all sufficient, and that He is waiting to do me good. In these precious moments, I feel my ministry a burden, that is not prompted by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, for any but such ministry must break that inward stillness, in which the Divine will is shown to us, and heavenly consolations are administered. I often keep silence, (mentally), that I may renew my strength; then I mount, as on "eagle's wings." Till within the last year I knew but little, if anything, of this stillness, and my devotions consisted chiefly of supplication and praise, and sometimes of gratitude to the Supreme Being. Now on a bed of sickness, perhaps of Death, (being in a very precarious state), I feel confirmed in the assurance, that in mental stillness only, is to be felt that peace, and joy, and union with our Maker, which is, and ever will be, the Christian's only hope and confidence in the solemn and certain hour of dissolution.

How often God uses children to lead parents to him! The widow of Clinton B. Fisk gives the following account of the conversion of her husband.

"We were blessed in our home with a son and a daughter. It was our joy each to take a child and prepare him or her for retiring, always hearing these dear little people say their evening prayers before us. One evening the general had got our 'wee girlie' nearly ready for bed. She knelt at his knee, asked God to bless papa and mamma and brother, and then looking up sweetly into her papa's face, said: 'Papa, why don't 'oo pray?' These words spoken by the child who was dearer to him than his own life, led the general to give his heart to Him who died for us all. God bless the children in all our homes."

THERE is a power that rules, even as there is a voice that directs.

The Virtue of Omission.

We believe it is not a special branch taught separately in our schools and colleges, says the Christian Instructor, but it is far more important than many things that are considered indispensable to finished education for young ladies. There is no end of things that we would like to have and think we need. If we put them all down upon our lists of things to be secured we will find the task impossible. Then what shall we do? sit down and cry about it? or fret and complain and make all our friends wish they had one friend less? No. Take the list and think over it. Scratch off the things we can best do without. Run carefully over the list again and again, striking off items until the number of things wanted is within our means.

Emily Tolman in the Interior treats of this "Art of Omitting." She says: "'To omit,' says Stevenson, 'is the one art in literature. If I knew how to omit, I would ask no other knowledge.' This is an art which may be practiced with advantage in other departments of life as well. No doubt we should all agree on the importance of omitting, so far as may be, the positively unpleasant and harmful; but there are also things perfectly innocent and even admirable that it is better to omit, to leave out of our possession, or to give up if we have already acquired them.

"Father Rodriguez, a mediæval monk, after describing the conditions of living in the order to which he belonged—his unadorned cell, having neither carpet nor curtain nor picture, only a bed, a table, a bench and a candlestick—adds this significant statement: 'One cannot deny that we are in great poverty; but this poverty is at the same time a great repose and a great perfection. For it would be inevitable in case a religious person were allowed to own superfluous possessions, that these things would greatly occupy his mind, be it to acquire them, to preserve them, or to increase them; so that in not permitting us all to own them, all these inconveniences are remedied.'

"To the modern man or woman surrounded by the luxury of the twentieth century, such poverty and asceticism will seem the extreme of hardship. Most of us are willing to sacrifice this repose, and accept the inconvenience incident to acquiring, preserving or increasing our worldly possessions. Few of us are sufficiently heroic to follow the example of Thoreau who is said to have thrown away a shell which had for a long time stood upon his mantel, because he found that it took too much of his attention. And yet I have no doubt that more than one woman reading these lines and glancing around her lavishly adorned home, will sigh for the 'great repose' of the old monk's cell.

"It is by no means for the religious life alone that the art of omitting is useful. 'There is a great secret,' says Emerson, 'in learning what to keep out of the mind, as well as what to put in it.' A noted French philosopher omitted the reading of newspapers altogether, for fear the practice would weaken his power of abstract thought. It would be foolish for us to go to the extreme of the mediæval monk in material things, or to that of the great philosopher in the matter of reading, but would not our repose and growth in a higher life be promoted by divesting ourselves of some of the things which we have considered admirable and even necessary. One advantage of camping out a few weeks in the summer season is that it teaches us the difference between mere luxuries and necessities. The soldier on a campaign or the mountaineer climbing some Alpine peak, learns the art of omitting. A college professor in talking with a young student, complained of the luxurious furnishing of most of the students' rooms, saying, "I do not like it. It is not masculine." "Very fine, but you will never make a scholar in that room," said another professor to a fond father who was showing his son's newly-furnished apartment. The distinguished psychologist, William James, asks: "Does not the worship of material luxury and wealth, which constitute a large portion of the spirit of our age, make somewhat for effeminacy and unmanliness?" In the same Varieties of Religious Experience, he calls the "prevalent fear of poverty among the educated classes, the worse moral disease from which our civilization suffers."

"Let us soberly consider how many of our material possessions really contribute to our comfort or to our esthetic nature, and how many are merely a concession to fickle fashion or to a desire to impress others with our ability to possess these superfluities. We fear that our homes will look 'poverty-stricken,' and so we deplete our purses and encumber our houses or our persons with superfluous things, and waste our time and vex our souls 'waiting upon them,' to the serious detriment of our higher life and the total loss of the repose which Father Rodriguez rightly valued.

"Among the various good reasons," said this monk, "why the company forbids secular persons to enter our cells, the principle one is that we may the easier be kept in poverty. After all, we are all men, and if we were to receive people of the world into our rooms we should not have the strength to remain within the bounds prescribed, but should at least wish to adorn them with some books to give the visitor a better opinion of our scholarship."

"Let us honestly tell ourselves how many of our possessions are for a similar purpose, to give our friends and neighbors a better opinion of our scholarship, our taste or our wealth; and let us heroically dispense with all such, knowing that if they do not help, they certainly hinder our higher life. Says Prof. James: "The claims which things make are corruptions of manhood, mortgages on the soul, and a drag anchor on our progress toward the empyrean."

THE "INSPIRING ROOM."—Every ideal Japanese home contains a special room called the "inspiring room." This room is fitted up with the best furniture and surroundings that are helpful and restful to tensioned nerves and a dejected mind, and is used as a place for recuperation.

Every life should have an inspiring room. "Enter into thy inner chamber, and when thou hast shut to the door, pray to thy Father who is in secret. And thy Father who seeth in secret shall reward thee openly."

"THE poor in spirit are those who renounce all things for the sake of the Kingdom of God."

Diversion, Wholesome and Unwholesome.

BY MARTHA H. GARRETT.

I am a lover of "plainness of speech:" that is, speech that is simple, clear and direct, and conveys the meaning intended. It has therefore been cause of regret that one of our Meeting Queries advises vaguely to avoid "places of diversion."

I take it that the intention of Friends was to warn against theatres and amusement halls; but the indefiniteness of expression may give the idea of objecting to diversion itself.

We have some reason to think also that our Society has in time past, too much discounted amusement, mirth and joy, and thereby endangered mental health. In their profound sense of the abuse of music, even simple singing, a natural expression of joyfulness was condemned by some.

Now, there is a swing of sentiment in the opposite direction, admitting much license in public amusements.

Diversion means a turning aside: but from what?—we do not want to be turned aside from a readiness to hear and obey the Divine Voice speaking to our hearts. I trust that this is true of all of us, even those who hardly know that Voice yet.

But we do need, most of us, to be helped to turn aside frequently from our special cares, and to have energies refreshed by some cheerful change. Some may say that they cannot imagine the Lord Jesus and His Apostles—or George Fox and his companions, seeking diversion. No: they probably did not seek it; but may they not have enjoyed it in its purest forms, in their long rides or tramps through fields and orchards? delighting in the grandeur of sea and mountains, the glories of sunrise and sunset, the constant miracle of growth, the frolics of children in innocent play?

I believe, however, that there are rare persons called apart into a peculiarly spiritual life, involving great sacrifice. The intensity of feeling wears on their physical frame, and with most of them earthly life is short. There are others who just as much seek above all things to do their Lord's will, who yet can enjoy many things in this life with a merry heart and it is such that we would emulate.

Different conditions require different helps in the way of diversion:

The student or clerk who sits at a desk and uses his brain through working hours, wants physical exercise of an exhilarating kind—a long tramp, a spin on his wheel, a turn at tennis, or gymnastics in cheerful company, for instance; the merchant who is in continual intercourse with many men of many minds, and, possibly, many women of uncertain tastes—may find nothing so refreshing as his own quiet fireside with a few dear ones. Those whose work is monotonous want mental stimulus.

Since the continuance of our lives is uncertain, it is wise, besides preparing for a summons from this world at any time, to prepare also for a possible long life, and its usual periods of weakness through disease or age.

While one is vigorous, there is a positive exhilaration and uplift in physical activity. But there come times when this stimulus is lost. What do you expect to enjoy and to do if you live to be eighty or ninety?

From my point of view, just between active life and age, I suggest to my younger friend to cultivate aptitude for quiet pleasures: watching the growth of plants; enjoying such children play and listening sympathetically their curious imaginings; treasuring memories of all things beautiful, to sight or hearing, thought; learning to do with ease different kinds of handwork, especially knitting, which holds on even when sight fails; and keeping a "merry heart that does good like a medicine, making matter of amusement of the various mishaps, misfits and mistakes of daily life, instead of being depressed by them. Much wholesome diversion comes to us naturally, we just hold our minds and hearts ready to assimilate the beauty and harmony and joy that are about us.

But we do need also to make diversions of ourselves and others; to give play its season as well as work—meaning by play those occupations which have as their main end, our refreshment after toil, or for future duties.

Amusement laboriously planned just for pleasure is unsatisfying; usefulness rather than pleasure should be our aim; but we need cheer to carry us through our cares healthily.

If we sincerely pray to be guided in all our ways, we surely shall be in the choice of diversions. When doubt is suggested, either from within or without—that is, either by the Divine voice speaking to conscience, or by Christian friends, I propose two tests:—

1. I should not take pleasure in what I believe puts any other in a position of more danger.

This, to my perception, rules out the theatre because I believe the life of a professional actor or actress to be one of great danger to the spiritual life. Did you ever know of an earnest Christian choosing that life? Or, what Christian father would like his daughter to be in it?

As an illustration of this I have copied Fanny Kemble's comments on her introduction to the Stage. Fanny Kemble was grandmother to Owen Wister, the author. She belonged to a family of great dramatic gifts, and went to the stage to help her father when he was financially embarrassed.

Late in life, in a record of her girlhood she wrote the following about her entrance on the life of an actress:

"And so my life was determined, and I devoted myself to an avocation which I never liked or honored, and about the very nature of which I have never been able to come to any decided opinion. It is in vain that the undoubted specific gifts of great actors and actresses suggest that all gifts are given for rightful exercise and not suppression; in what Shakespeare's plays urge their imperativeness claim to the most perfect illustration they receive from histrionic interpretation: a business which is incessant excitement and factitious emotion seems to me unworthy of a man; a business which is public exhibition, unworthy of a woman.

"At four different periods of my life I have been constrained by circumstances to maintain myself by the exercise of my dramatic faculty; latterly, it is true, in a less painful and distasteful manner, by reading instead of acting. But though I have never, I trust, been ungrateful for the power of thus helping myself and others; . . . yet neither have I ever presented myself before an audience without inking feeling of reluctance, or withdrawn in their presence without thinking the excitement I had undergone unhealthy, and the personal exhibition odious."

In a letter written to a friend soon after she came to act, she wrote:—

"When I reflect that although hitherto my profession has not appeared to me attractive enough to engross my mind, yet that admiration and applause, and the excitement springing therefrom may become necessary to me, I have not only to watch but to pray against a result. I have no desire to sell my soul for anything, least of all sham fame, mere popularity."

"Now, for ourselves, I think this a safe test of wholesome diversion:—

Wholesome diversion should leave us, or make us stronger and more ready for our duties. And especially, it should not leave us ready for that fellowship with the Father and the Son, whereby we may, in our small share, share in the redemption of the world. It is a most inspiring thought that each of us may share in this, if only by unconsciousness; and a very solemn one, that if our excuse does not draw to good, it repels from us. For our Saviour said "He that gathereth with me, scattereth."

Each one must apply this rule for himself or herself. Different persons will come to different conclusions as to what is wholesome in their particular cases.

One of the great temptations to unwholesome diversions in this day, is found in resorting to the fashionable club-houses.

We can see that people with very tiny and small homes may need to club together to get on for social pleasures. But think what a blessing in this favored community, can have in homes,—the very best places of all for our fellowship:—

Home games, home talks and sympathies, amusement over the droll mistakes occur in almost every family; reading to, the exercise of taste in many forms, living friends.

cannot see that we need to go out much for pleasure, beyond the homes of our circle; but for out-door exercise and travel.

Our recreations are to make us stronger workers, they must not exhaust energy. His thought will regulate hospitalities;—which should be, as Charles Wagner says of expressive of personality.

In other words, a hostess should fit her hospitality to the size of her house, the depth of purse, her strength, her aptitudes, the conditions of her family.

Some of us in this problem was lately predicted: How are we to obey the commandment when thou makest a feast, call not thy neighbors, nor thy kinsfolk, nor thy rich neighbors,—lest they ask thee again, and a recompense be made thee?"

The very least meaning we can give to this at Christian hospitality is not to be a center of exchange and worldly gain; we are to invite people because they entertain us, and we desire to be invited to their parties.

Whether we are to give ourselves freely, to those who need us, or those with whom we may be a mutual interchange of mind and heart to profit.

We do not invite our friends to our homes merely to feast them on fine foods. If that is what we wish to give, we are commanded to invite the needy ones, who cannot recompense in kind.

Let each home be valued by its visitors for its own proper characteristics: one for completeness, another for taste, another for originality; one for intellectual conversation, another for hearty fellowship, another for simple, quaint home-y-ness. And let no one wrongly believe she cannot entertain like somebody else.

I recall, with much pleasure an evening of last Spring, when I was away from home, spent with four other earnest women, talking over the subject we are considering to-night.

We were of four different denominations, none "Friends" but myself.

Two were young. Four of the five were united in believing it right to abstain from the favorite amusements of the fashionable world—cards, dancing, the theatre: the fifth listened, with earnest face, and then said she could truly feel devout when dancing.

Now, in dancing itself, as rhythmic motion, I see no harm; we like to see little children dancing about in natural glee. But with dancing as commonly used, much evil is connected:—late hours, extravagant dressing, undue liberty between the sexes, jealousies. And so it is a strength to a young Christian, to be able to say "I do not attend dancing parties," as well as "I do not play cards." All of those women with whom I talked that evening approved of music. . . . Our early Friends found it debased to so much evil, that some of them denounced it entirely. We can here only refer to individual conscience the question of its wholesomeness for each. Let us, however, resolve like Paul, "I will not be brought under the power of any" [indulgence], and beware lest any of these pleasant things become our masters instead of servants.

One of that evening group, the brightest and most interesting converser, has since been called away from earth. She told us an experience of her youth. When about seventeen years old, soon after she had made up her mind to renounce worldly amusements, having in her heart a purer pleasure, she was away from home with an uncle, who proposed taking her with other young people to see a famous actor. When she declined, he urged it upon her, as being an education. But she steadily refused for herself, while she did not advise others. Then another girl became uneasy and besought my friend to tell her whether she thought it would do her any harm to go. At first she refused, but at length replied, "Well I'll say this much: Will it do you harm not to go?" The stand thus taken at the outset of her Christian life, led this valuable woman to be a welcome adviser to many.

I think Christian parents act kindly in restraining children, while their own character and purposes are undeveloped, from forming habits that lead to worldly conformity.

Let us not judge one another, but each be watchful lest we put a stumbling block in a brother's way.

Twelfth Month, 1904.

I OFTEN think it a favor that we are not obliged to tell all we think; for strange is the motley throng of human thoughts!—Mary Capper.

A Visit to Porto Rico.

BY WM. C. ALLEN AND WM. B. HARVEY.

First Month Sth.—This morning we were offered the use of the Methodist place of worship at the regular hour, by A. H. Leo, their minister, who comes from Frankford, and knows several of our Friends. So we had only a small general audience—most of them all young—fine young men and women. The pick of the American colony here in Ponce. It delighted me to face them, with their strong or sweet faces, and to speak of the personal dealings of God with His people.

The vast majority of the American colony in Porto Rico are no credit to the States; and having come here for adventure or business are led into participation in things they might have largely avoided at home.

First Month 10th, 1905.—On First day evening we were at the Baptist Mission about two hundred and fifty present. Strength was given to preach against fleshly lusts which war against the soul. After the opportunity, some one hundred adults and young people came up to shake our hands. The pastor told us many of his people have come out of the most sinful lives. He was most kind in expressing his pleasure at having had us with his people.

We are getting used to table ways in these hotels. Some things are amusing. At San Juan we had canned cream. Here we have only boiled milk. The butter is from Denmark, in little round tin cans, and best dishes out with a spoon. Bananas and rice are served up in all sorts of ways. Strange fruits and jellies are only tasted or looked at, by me. Beef is killed a few hours before it is eaten. Turkeys gobble, and roosters crow almost up to the time they adorn the table. The oranges are very fine. Eggs and chickens are always to be had.

First Month 14th.—We had a satisfactory meeting in the theatre building at Ponce, Fourth-day night. It seemed a strange place for a Friends' meeting. But there we met with many who will not be reached in any place of worship—some of the better class, who never attend services. The very elements of the Christian faith, and the proofs thereof, were dealt in. At times of silence you could hear a pin drop, as the saying is: a new experience for these people, as well as for us. It seemed as if we were indeed baptized with the Holy Spirit, at times.

Mayaguez, First Month 14th.—Sixth day we came on narrow gauge railroad to this city. Ever since, we have been contending with the disadvantages connected with a foreign language, and the prejudices of those who do not wish to help us. All the obstacles possible have been arrayed, so it seems. But we go ahead; are now in touch with Protestants; and I think will get a suitable and willing interpreter before long. Our friends at home can little even imagine the trials connected with this work. The detail of it all, is very wearing. We need much faith and patience—hitherto The Lord has helped us! and He will continue so to do.

Our rooms here are clean. That means much;—if we are sure of clean sheets, and a well-swept floor, and only a few cock-roaches as big as a silver dollar,—then we are doing well. The cooking here is American. Many things in these hotels or boarding-houses, would be deemed impossible near Philadelphia: but are all right in Porto Rico.

The sun rises and sets, about 6.15 a. m., and P. M. Mayaguez is a nicer town than others we have been in:—no bad smells. The houses are mostly detached, and people don't swarm in them, like rats in a hole. The residences are very attractive,—Spanish Architecture, bright colors, large balconies, while the tree tops behind the high walls, indicate pleasant gardens. It is not much Americanized yet. Down this street run the funniest little horse-cars I have ever seen:—They are open platforms, with seats for about ten people, and curtains, if it rains. Fare, 3 cents. The route is from the plaza to the port, at the sea-side.

We may leave San Juan Second Month 6th, for Barbadoes, due there in five or six days. What gratitude will well up within my heart, when I feel released from work in Porto Rico!

First Month 15th.—It is now about 10 o'clock. We expect to go to the Presbyterian place of worship in an hour. Meanwhile I am sitting on the balcony. There has been a constant stream of men, boys and girls going by, carrying and calling their wares. First one with fruits, then vegetables, charcoal, laces, notions, eggs, shoes, candies, and so on indefinitely. A few minutes ago a man passed, saw us, and returned muttering to himself in Spanish, "There are two new American teachers, I will sell them something." Then he offered his stock of segars, and sweets. These people, if they can not talk to one another, just have to talk out their thoughts, so talk to themselves. The way we knew what the above mentioned man said, was, that a boarder here who knows Spanish overheard him, and told us.

The girls and women powder their faces to a degree—nearly all do so, including many little girls—you see them so decorated all around, when dressed up; sometimes the darker the skin, the more fearlessly has the white powder been distributed, over the face and neck. One thing is also noticeable:—even the poor little girls with rags and dirt:—with scant of the former and much of the latter, dress their hair well. All kinks are carefully brushed out, and their little black heads glisten and shine.

I apprehend we have a full week ahead. We are finding that the Apostolic suggestion is daily realized—viz: That God supplies bread for the eater, and seed for the sower: so we plough ahead, day by day, in this harvest field so ripe, yet so mixed with briars and thorns, and where the laborers are so few. How full, and easy, and rich, seem the lives of our Philadelphia Friends!

Mayaguez, First Month 18th.—First day we were twice at the Presbyterian place of worship,—in the morning with the American, and in the evening with the native congregation—about three hundred constituting the latter. The pastor interpreted for us at the latter. He has seemed very grateful for our visit and work with his people.

We have attended the school this week, and have various engagements ahead—yesterday afternoon we hired bicycles, and for two hours pushed around the town, and a little distance into the country—Indeed it was good and necessary, for we have many things in daily detail to wear us.

The difficulties connected with securing an interpreter here have been great, but we now think we have a good man; young and on the school staff, and who seems interested, not afraid to act, or likely to misconstrue. He did finely for me at the Industrial School yesterday morning.

Everything we hear told of is Spanish, except the San Juan news, which has a column or so that we can put little confidence in—when we can buy it. Never in Europe have I been so absolutely cut off from home ways and information, as amongst these interesting, and to a large extent, crude people.

First Month 20th.—We drove out to San German, fifteen miles, yesterday, to hold a meeting there, and when we got back about ten o'clock, it was delightful to find mail awaiting us.

Well, this week has been, so to speak, a school week. We have visited a number of schools around this city, and talked to the young people. The hope of the Island, is in Christianizing them. Many of them are keen as a whip. Often, when I have been speaking, their heads nod a good deal, for they are quick to take a thought, if simply expressed.

We have been amongst the Spiritualists—I could tell some strange experiences—but must defer this time. At San German, we had a trying time, but our meeting finally got through satisfactorily. The catholic element is very strong hereabouts; no violence is suggested, but everything possible is done to baffle us at every turn.

Second-day, First Month 23rd.—Seventh-day night I was quite sick, but gradually improved, and was just able for a meeting in the theatre. It was a time to remember, with thanksgiving to the Father who giveth all good gifts. After the meeting, I had practically an informal meeting with others, regarding the divinity of, and atonement by Christ. Their objections were silenced. Some leading people at Mayaguez, as in other places, think our "religion"—as they call it,—is better than any thing they have heard, and anxiously desire to know, if we will not send preachers here permanently to teach their people. My own mission has largely been, to teach in simple language, the central truths of doctrine held by Friends: viz—The need of a cure for sin and its effects; redemption through the blood of Christ, the Holy Spirit as God's way of teaching us Himself, the uselessness of priests, prayers to the virgin, or saints, with the unscripturalness thereof.

We expect to leave here to-morrow for the north, hoping to reach San Juan about First Month 28th. I am so glad, although I do not desire to shirk. This city has been the scene of much labor, and many trials; but has there not been some victory? And we are glad in Him.

The man who fails to hear the voice of God for himself is without religion. Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth," is the only form in which a religious life is possible.—Harnack.

BUT for this sweet consolatory word mercy as a distinguishing attribute of our Creator and Redeemer, surely my heart would faint within me!—Mary Capper.

THE INDIAN COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA YEAS MEETING.

In the Eleventh Month 1849, Joseph Ellison, Joel Evans and Thomas Wistar, Jr., visit Tunesassa under appointment by the Committee, and were the bearers of an address from it to the Indians; which served to introduce Solomon Lukens and wife and S. Eastlack to their acquaintance. In their report they thus allude to the effects of the agitation which had taken place among them:—"The unsettled state in which the natives have been for some time past we have no doubt has had a tendency to retard their progress; improvement; the evidence of which was justly portrayed to us in riding over the reservation. We are nevertheless satisfied that their condition has been much improved by labors of Friends among them."

In the course of a council which the Friends held with the Indians, among whom was a number who were in favor of the form of Government, one of the ex-chiefs, Is Jamerson, explained at considerable length causes of the dissatisfaction which in his view had led to the abolition of the Government chiefs. After the conclusion of his remarks which were continued for nearly three hours our Friends were told that the company present was ready to hear anything that they might have to say. After consulting among themselves the latter informed them that they represent their difficulties and grievances their old friends the Quakers of Philadelphia after deliberating thereon, would proceed forward in writing their conclusions respecting them. This answer appeared to give general satisfaction, and the Friends took leave of them with feelings of gratitude that they had been enabled to accomplish their visit and service delegated to them by the Committee at this time of disquiet, as much to the satisfaction of the natives as appeared to be the case.

Shortly after their return a communication was received by one of them signed by President of the Seneca Nation setting forth some complaints against the chiefs and the administration of the government under them in favor of the new form of government recently established. After consideration of the situation and the opposing elements among the Committee addressed a letter to the Indians as a body, reciting the disadvantages and injuries which resulted from the jealous and divisions among them, the opportunity afforded for the accomplishment of their purposes by designing white men, to dispossess them of their lands, and pointing out that they were disqualified them for opposing wrong done among themselves. It contained the following paragraphs:

Brothers: "We have never meddled with your government, nor taken sides with either party which have arisen among you, and are not disposed to do it now. It is our province to settle among yourselves the form of government under which you will live. We have never sought either to put down or to set up any new form, but to persuade you peaceably and orderly as good citizens."

"Brothers: We wish to know no distinction of party among you. Our good will reaches to all our Indian brothers, whatever opimay hold. We desire to be kind to them and to do good to them all. Our advice is to lay aside all your disputes and divisions, to bury them in the earth, to join your forces strong together and all labor to promote education of your children, the preservation of your lands and timber, the improvement of your farms and buildings, the comfort of your families and the general welfare of your people, to discourage drinking whiskey, the kind of white people upon your lands, and kinds of immorality. How much better is it to contend and petitioning the Government against each other.

Brothers: We think experience must have convinced you that our advice to you in years ago is gone, has been for your good, and when you have followed it, you have prospered. We now earnestly entreat you to endeavor to live in peace and harmony as brethren, to cultivate kindness and good toward each other and to strengthen one another's hands in doing well which will promote your happiness and be acceptable in the sight of our Father who is in Heaven."

This letter was signed by twelve members of the Committee and was dated First Month 18, 1850, and was read and interpreted to the Indians at a council attended by members of both parties. Solomon Lukens observes in reference to it "The chief's party were evidently discouraged if not disappointed, they were not entirely given up the hope that Friends would intercede for them with the United States Government, still those who spoke about it acknowledged it was the course always pursued by Friends and admitted that it was best."

The Seventh Month 1850 the farm being sold to Friends at Cattaraugus being the price of the original tract was sold to John Bartlett for fifteen dollars per acre. It contained about three-hundred and thirty three acres.

The unwillingness of those who had occupied the position of chiefs and their adherents to relinquish their old form of government, led to further efforts to regain their lost power, the Friends at Tunesassa were at times embarrassed by the demands made upon them for their aid by the opposing parties. The following interesting letter addressed to them at this time, by Thomas Evans on behalf of the Committee expresses the feelings of sympathy and concern for them under these circumstances.

Dear Friends:

The difficulties and dissensions in which the Indians are at present involved, and the consequent delicacy of the position which you occupy among them, have awakened feelings of sympathy with you in the minds of the Committee, who have desired us to write you on their behalf. Long accustomed to look to Friends for counsel in their affairs, and to be influenced by the opinions they may express, those Indians are in favor of the old, as well as those who advocate the new form of government, naturally are watching to gather from your conversation some expression which will strengthen them in their respective positions and promote their cause. Habituated to observation, and inclined to be suspicious of white men, they are often powerfully affected by words or actions which would make but little impression upon persons less sensitive in their feelings. They are now evidently agitated to an unusual degree by the controversy respecting the form of their government, and we are sensible that many trials will be likely to attend your intercourse with them, calling for the exercise of a measure of that wisdom which cometh from above, and of much patience, gentleness and long forbearance toward them.

A PRAYER

Grant us, O Lord, the grace to bear
The little pricking thorn;
The hasty word that seems unfair;
The twang of truths well worn;
The jest that makes our weakness plain;
The darling plan o'erturned;
The careless touch upon our pain;
The slight we have not earned;
The rasp of care, dear Lord, to-day,
Lest all these fretting things
Make needless grief, oh, give us, pray,
The heart that trusts and sings.

THE MIRACLE WITH JOHN.—Dr. Edward Thring, next to Arnold of Rugby, was considered to be the most successful teacher of boys in England. The duller the lad the more eager was Dr. Thring to take him in hand and develop him. On one occasion a despairing father brought his son to him. "John must do everything his own way," he said. "He opposes his teachers, his school-fellows, me, in everything. He will not take it for granted that twice two are four until he has counted it for himself."

"John is in far more hopeful condition than the amiable boy who always goes with the crowd," said the shrewd teacher, "provided he has common sense enough to find out some time that he is not infallible."

After two years the father went again to Dr. Thring.

"What miracle have you worked upon John?" he asked. "He is happy, affectionate, and sensible."

"I taught him how to lead, and suffered him to be a leader," was the reply. "Boys are like sheep. One finds a path; the others follow. The masterful, strong boy can be trained into a wise captain. It is the weak lad who always copies his fellows that is not worth drilling."

"The theory of this famous teacher," says "The Evening Lamp," which tells the story, "is more worthy of attention because education too often treats boys and girls in the mass, neglecting individual development. Dr. Thring, by careful attention to boys of peculiar character, has given to the England of to-day some of its most useful men."

The lives of some of us are very different from what we mapped out; but if the good Master's purposes be accomplished, it will be well with us in the end.—Correspondent.

Items Concerning the Society.

Joseph Elkinton, son of Joseph S. Elkinton, expects to start on the 25th instant for Japan, for purposes of travel and a visit to relatives.

In the past week or more John B. Garrett, with a minute from Haverford Monthly Meeting, has been on a religious visit to meetings and families of Muncy Monthly Meeting, Pa., and was accompanied for a part of the time by Joel Cadbury.

Doubtless the application of the word priest (a mere variant of presbyter), as equivalent to "sacerdos" was not absent from early Friends' minds, though in this sense it was an absurd designation for most of those to whom they applied it; for in their case presbyter, as the wits well said, might have been written "priest-biter." — Journal of Friends' Historical Society.

The idea of seeing to the end, a fine thought which we come upon elsewhere in early Quaker literature, is to be found in the report of Ross meetings—certain persons did see "to ye End of ye Priests Teachings." George Fox tells of a soldier who saw "to the end of fighting" and laid down his arms; the dying James Naylor speaks of that spirit which "sees to the end of all temptation." — A. Neave Brayshaw, in Journal Historical Society.

We have received the Journal of the Friends' Historical Society (of London) for First Month. It contains the usual weekly, which has been making it so valuable, of curious and historical information concerning Friends and their interests. A fac simile of a cipher writing found on a letter from Francis Howgill to George Fox accompanies this number, that readers may assist the editor in deciphering it. Then come pages of "Notes and Queries," and important articles named as follows:—"The First Publishers of Truth.—H. By A. Neave Brayshaw; Deborah Logan and her Contributions to History, by Amelia Mott Gummere, Church Affairs in Gael; John William's Recollections of the Irish Rebellion of 1798; Guleima Maria Springett and her Tenant; Letter of Margaret Fox, 1677 (edited by Isaac Sharp); Inscriptions in old Friends' Burying Ground, Leiston; "Old Style" and "New Style;" Thomas Hancock, author of "The Peculium;" The Life of John Swinton; Letter of William Penn; Meetings in Yorkshire, 1688; The Daughters of John Archdale; Friends in Current Literature, by Norman Penney; Friends' Reference Library, Devonshire House; Editorial Forecast.

FRIENDS' HISTORICAL SOCIETY.—At the annual meeting of Friends' Historical Society, of Philadelphia, held at Friends' Institute, First Month 30th, 1905, twenty-three of the eighty-four enrolled members responded to their names.

The following were elected as officers for the Friends' Historical Society: Isaac Sharpless, president; Jonathan Evans, Amelia Mott Gummere, vice presidents; James Emlen, secretary; J. Snowden Rhoads, treasurer; William H. Jenks, Frances Tatam Rhoads, John J. Thompson, Frances B. G. Branson, Albert T. Bell, Sarah E. Moore, counselors for two years; William F. Wickersham, Lucy E. Roberts, Joshua L. Bailly, Susanna S. Kite, Anna S. Lippincott, Abby Newhall, counselors for one year.

Helen Hopkins Jones felt she could not be depended upon for the secretary's work this winter, owing to illness in her family, and therefore declined the acceptance of her nomination. James Emlen was proposed in her place, and as one of the counselors in his stead Anna S. Lippincott was suggested. Approval of all these nominations was expressed, and they were elected to the various offices.

A vote of thanks was extended by the meeting for the past services of Helen Hopkins Jones, now resigning as secretary.

The following report was accepted and requested to be placed on the minutes of the Society:

"The Committee appointed to arrange for a public meeting, report that they fulfilled their instructions, with the result that such a meeting was held on the thirteenth of Twelfth Month last, at which Amelia Mott Gummere clearly and acceptably explained the purposes for organization. The address for the evening was delivered by President Isaac Sharpless, entitled 'A Peace Controversy of Colonial Times,' and the gratitude of the meeting was extended for his able production. The Committee feel that the high order of both papers has, together with the interest manifested, placed beyond question the value of such meetings and successfully launched this our initial effort."

The treasurer's report showed dues and donations received, $98.00; expenses, $52.60; balance on hand, $45.40.

Under the head of new business, George Vaux called the attention of the Society to two errors in his paper, entitled "Early Friends' Meeting-houses and Their Relation to the Building at Arch and Fourth Streets," as published in the account of the recent Centennial Anniversary of the erection of that building. The errors are on pages 19 and 37, and consist in the introduction of the middle letter R in the name of Isaac Davis, which is printed Isaac F. Davis. George Vaux requests that Friends who have copies of the book should cross out the letter R, so as to have the text to stand in both places as Isaac F. Davis, instead of Isaac R. Davis, and that they should call the attention of other Friends to the errors and request them also to make the correction.

On page 89 of the same book is this mistake: The statement is made that John Smith was made clerk of the Yearly Meeting at the age of nineteen. He acted as clerk for one year only, in 1760, when he was about thirty-seven years old.

"The Friends' Meeting-house, Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, The Centennial Celebration, Sixth Month, 1904," is the first publication offered by the Friends' Historical Society.

Some revision of the Constitution and By-laws was thought desirable, and, after a full discussion of the several points, it was moved and seconded that a committee of six should be appointed to consider the whole subject of these changes, with the amendment that this committee report to the "Council" and that they be authorized to call a meeting of the Association at its discretion.

The following Friends named, to revise the Constitution and By-laws, and report to the Council, who shall call a meeting at its discretion, viz: Austin C. Leeds, Jonathan Evans, George Vaux, Amelia M. Gummere, Sarah Ellen Moore, Frances B. G. Branson. Two gifts were presented to the Society at this time:—

A printed copy of the "Genealogy of the Lamborn Family," by Samuel Lamborn, and "A Travelling Map of Great Britain and Ireland," prepared by Joseph Pease, Jr., of Darlington, and donated to us by John Ingham Burt.

Both of these gifts were officially acknowledged by the secretary to the respective donors.

Upon motion the meeting adjourned.

HELEN HOPKINS JONES, Secretary.

The councillors met at the close of the above meeting and appointed as the Committee on Finance: Albert T. Bell, Jonathan Evans, James Emlen.

As a Committee on Historical Research, to suggest lines of research, to bring forward matters of interest, to have charge of all collections of historical matter; and to make such investigations as are necessary in regard to proposed deposits: Sarah Emlen Moore, Abby Newhall, Amelia Mott Gummere, William Wickersham, James Emlen were appointed and given authority to add to its number, if desired, and to bring forward such names, if any, to our next meeting. From their annual they may elect their own chairman.

It having been determined that the annual meeting proceed to appoint a committee to make nominations to the next Annual Meeting for Officers and Councillors, according to Article 4th in By-laws, Frances B. G. Branson, George Vaux and Emma Cadbury were now named to serve in that capacity.

All the members of the Society were earnestly urged to advance the interest of the Society by interesting persons to become contributing members; to collect material to be deposited with us and in every way in their power.

All gifts and donations are to be sent to the councillors, who are authorized to pass judgment upon them, and, if deemed suitable, to place in the hands of our custodian, George Vaux.

Meeting adjourned.

HELEN HOPKINS JONES, Secretary.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A bill has been passed by the House of Representatives to regulate railroad rates, by a vote of 227 to 77. It now goes to the Senate. Arbitration treaties lately negotiated by the President with Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, Norway and Sweden have been finally acted upon by the Senate, which has amended them so as to require that questions in contention between this and a foreign government before being referred to the Hague tribunal for determination shall be first submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent. Since these treaties have been amended, the President has declined to have them ratified.

A bill has passed the Senate creating two new States, one of the Indian Territory and Oklahoma combined, and another of the Federal Territory and the Oklahoma Territory is given as something over 400,000, and the population of the Indian Territory is about the same. The area of each is about 40,000 square miles, and the consolidated State, with an area of about 80,000 square miles, will be about the size of Kansas, or nearly as large as Pennsylvania and Ohio combined. New Mexico has only about 200,000 population. The population of New Mexico contains a large infusion of the Mexican element, and a mixed Spanish language is largely spoken by the people. A section provides that prohibition shall prevail for twenty-one years and is designed to prevent the Indian tribes and nations in Indian Territory, now protected by Federal legislation, from becoming the prey of the unrestricted liquor traffic in a new State. The concurrence of the House is required.

Of 612 deaths in this city last week 117 are stated to have been due to pneumonia. Bronchitis, congestion of the lungs and kindred diseases are more prevalent this winter than for many years, and not until the streets are dry again do physicians anticipate a diminution in the death rate from these diseases.

The managers of the Burlington railroad have been educating farmers in Illinois, Iowa and Nebraska upon the subject of increasing their yield of corn by seeding among them a special train containing lecturers accompanied by Federal inspectors, from accompanying the train as illustrations. From ten to thirteen stags were made each day, during which lectures were delivered from the cars to crowds who assembled to hear them, in which the results of many years' experience gained in agricultural colleges and experimental stations was given to eager listeners, who were notified in advance of the time that the special train was to arrive. The business of this railroad is largely dependent upon the carrying of corn as freight, and its efforts in this direction, it is expected will be rewarded by a large increase in the yield of corn to be carried.

During the late storms and severely cold weather, great interruptions to traveling have been experienced. It was reported that all along the Atlantic seaboard, from Maine to North Carolina, ice seriously hampers navigation. Many harbors are completely blocked by drifts and floes coming in from seaward; others are frozen up, while from every haven and bay come reports of vessels unable to get in or out.

Through the South and middle West much damage and delay seem to have been caused by the storm and cold weather. The Tennessee fruit belt reports losses amounting to $100,000, the "frees" having nipped the young trees. The Ohio River is ice-bound from Pittsburgh to its mouth. The extreme cold in northern Texas shows no sign of abatement.

Extreme cold also prevailed on the 12th instant, in the West and Southwest, the temperature in the Indian Territory falling to five degrees below zero.

The new Cornell Dam, near Croton-on-Hudson, in Westchester county, N. Y., is said to be the largest piece of masonry in the world, with the exception of the Pyramids of Egypt. It will cost about $10,000,000, and will have an expenditure of $9,000,000. It is estimated that it will require about two years for the dam to fill and that it will make a lake about seventy miles in circumference. The dam will hold thirty billion gallons of water. It has been estimated that the capacity of the lake is so great that should New York City get its water from it at the present rate of consuming, the supply would cover at city's needs for about 276 days.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 15th says: The present current of press and public opinion in Russia appears to be setting toward peace. The newspapers no longer proclaim the necessity of continuing war at all costs.

The war never has been, in the fullest sense of the word, popular. The present distress of the work class, and the general desire for reform evinced by upper class, may develop a strong peace movement, which the Government may have to reckon.

Rioting in Poland has continued, and bloodshed resulted from collisions between the strikers and a soldier.

The Emperor of the 12th from St. Petersburg says: Emperor's creation of a joint commission of masters workmen, chosen by themselves, to investigate the cause of discontent among the laborers has made an exceedingly good impression.

The Rouvier Ministry has lately introduced to Chamber of Deputies a new bill for the reformed Church and State. This bill contains the following article:

"The State henceforth neither recognizes nor recognizes any religious denomination. Public establishments of religion now existing are suppressed. All religious budgets of appropriation of the Government department are suppressed. The exercise of the exercise of religion is hereafter free, under the sole restriction exercise must accord with public order."

The article abolishing the Concordat, says: "All laws and orders relative to the public organization or recognition of a religious denomination are abrogated particularly the law ratifying the convention made between the Pope and the French Government."

It is expected that this bill will be urged to its pass without delay. A declaration of the Chamber of Deputies has been passed by a majority of 275 to the effect the attitude of the Vatican had rendered separatist Church and State in France inevitable. The British public has been published, which shows that Young had disobeyed instructions in his dealings with Tibetan authorities, and that England insisted merely keeping all nations out of Tibet.

NOTICES.

Westtown Boarding School.—For convening of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage meets trains leaving Philadelphia 7.16 and 8.18 A. M. 2.48 and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when request Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the School by telephone, West Chester, Phone 114a. EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Secy.

Friends' Freedmen's Association of Philadelphia is preparing to send contributions of clothing to Christiansburg Industrial Institute. Any new repairs will be made in the Sewing School and all materials used to good advantage. Either winter clothing or present use or summer clothing to prepare for the coming season will be welcome. Shoes are always desired. Books and magazines will be put to good use.

The Sewing School is in need of an additional sewing machine and the gift of one, even though partly worn, will be gratefully appreciated.

Contributions of clothing to be at Friends' Institute, Twelfth Street, Philadelphia by the 23rd inst., marked for Christiansburg Industrial Institute.

DIED, at Grant Hospital, Columbus, Ohio, after a long and painful illness, on 31st of First Mo., 1905, MA. HIATT, wife of James Hiatt, in the forty-eight year of her age. A beloved member of the Christiansburg Industrial Institute. Her husband was a most devoted wife and mother; and while interested in any work, to rightly benefit humanity, she felt the field for her labor was mostly in the quiet of her home. "Her children arise up, and call her blessed husband also, and he praiseth her."

She was the widow of Second Mo., 1905, of her home of her nephew, N. Howland Brown, in Norristown, PA. ELIZABETH RICHARDSON REEVE, in the seventy-year of her age. She was an overseer of the Monthly Meeting, having the welfare of her meetings much at heart that she attended conscientiously the storm and ill health. Her husband, a Long Islander, was a most devoted wife and mother; and while interested in any work, to rightly benefit humanity, she felt the field for her labor was mostly in the quiet of her home. "Her children arise up, and call her blessed husband also, and he praiseth her."

Friends, the cardinal principle of our ship is that we enter on it without any conceived plan as to the form it shall take on the occasion, but we leave this to be defined under the immediate guidance of the Spirit acting upon the hearts of the congregation there gathered. Thus we acknowledge to the fullest degree possible the actual lordship of Christ in His worshipping Church. M. F. H. Alexander, in the Australian Ad.

HENCE does a generally peace-keeping nation get its superior heroic virtues; and hence does a military nation get its weaknesses?

COMBINATIONS for Divine service without the aid of the Divine Spirit are practically, though not intentionally, strikes.

EVERY particular in the organization of the Society of Friends, from the Preparative Meeting, up, has for its object that men may live according to the Holy Spirit.

THE mistake of men of all religions is in their thinking to be saved by saving things, rather than by a saving Life.

CITY party founded on ideals of righteousness, cannot be expected, at least in its early undertaking, outwardly to outmatch the hordes of unscrupulousness, because they cannot make use of the outward weapons of unscrupulousness. This is well known by the princes of power of the corruption which is in the land through lust. Satan has said of this world of worldliness, "to whomsoever I will give it." Our religious Society, organized for the object that men may walk according to the Holy Spirit, is constituted for the precise use of weapons not carnal but spiritual, and its outward forms as high ideals of the Spirit shall move them and wield them. Herein we look for city-foundations, and the world-order to become Christ's.

Denominational Tones.

In the old pagan and classical literatures the word sing was often made to mean to deliver prophecy. The voice of the oracle so responded to a sense of the sublimity of the source of the message, that it would run into a rhythmical intonation. And to suit the convenience of a rhythm in delivery, the messages given forth as prophetic became cast in verse and metre, and chanted like hymns. In the prophecies of the Old Testament also, the Revised Version's manner of printing the lines will show where the Hebrew originals appeared in verse. And it is not strange that in all public delivery ever since, language conceived as inspired should take on a rhythmical cadence and chanting intonations.

Rhetoricians say, that when we talk or write about any subject that appeals to deep or earnest feeling we gratify a natural instinct by falling into a certain regularity. "Both the voice and the arrangement of the words fall under this regular influence; the voice is modulated, and the words are regulated in a kind of flow called rhythm."

A recent publication, James M. Buckley's "Extemporaneous Oratory," continues this subject in a manner interesting to religious denominations, by showing how noticeable the tones of some of them are to others. He says:

In ordinary conversation there is usually no perceptible "tone." But rhythm carried too far becomes a tone, and this, when characteristic of a leader, may be intentionally or unconsciously imitated by his followers.

Theodore Watts, an English writer, affirms that "the rhythm of language is the rhythm of life itself, and it is deeper than all the rhythms of art. It can be taught by prose as well as by poetry, such prose, for instance, as that of the English Bible. It is nothing more and nothing less than the metre of that energy of the spirit, which surges within the bosom of him who speaks, whether he speak in verse or in impassioned prose."

Such was the origin, no doubt, of the early rhythms of all religious movements that began in deep emotion. The imitation of them by the successors of the prophets and the preachers, after the emotion has subsided or freedom of utterance has been affected by conventional rules, is but a monotonous and powerless caricature.

Each denomination has its peculiar tone, and sometimes a special branch of a denomination has a special rhythm. That employed by what are called the Hard-shell Baptists, in the South and West, has been variously popularized. The Friends have a peculiar tone; this originated in awe inspired by a belief that they were receiving special spiritual aid. A recurring "ah" at the end of words, characteristic of many of the early Methodists—which John Wesley abominated and did all in his power to suppress—sprang from vehemence and loss of self control, accompanied by exhaustion of breath, producing a positive gasp at the end of a sentence or when pauses were necessary to prevent convulsions.

Liturgical churches do not escape. I do not refer to intentional intoning, which belongs to the sphere of music, but to the rendition of the service. While reading an elaborate ritual with others, in a limited time, unconscious imitation has produced an easily recognized tone, which as is the case with the characteristic tones of other denominations, some deliberately affect.

Imitation is at the basis of modern denominational canting. Speaking of the influence of imitation, Dr. Milburn says: "Educated people have been accustomed to sneer and laugh at the holy tone of the Hard-shell Baptist, old-fashioned Methodist, and Quaker preachers. But you may blindfold a man of quick ear, whose habits of close observation have been trained, and take him on a tour to visit the various churches in any of our cities, and in a few minutes he will tell you without fail, from the voice, its tones and mannerism in the giving out and reading of the hymns and of the Scripture lessons, and the utterance of the prayer, to what branch of the church the person belongs, the part of the country from which he comes, the theological school in which he was trained, and even that where his earlier studies were pursued. Andover, Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Union, the General Theological Seminary, and all the rest have their shibboleth; their speech betrayeth them. They have forsaken nature and become the copyists of a man or a school."

"Severe as this seems," says Dr. Buckley, "it is not extravagant."

Our own Discipline directs ministers and elders to advise ministers "against affectation of tones and gestures, and everything that would hurt their service." Imitation is affectation, even when unconscious; yet it is ushered into one's fixed habit by conscious beginnings. Some may be not unwilling that the singing tone should creep over them as a supposed sign of unction; but that, as a savor deliberately assumed, is inconsistent with the true anointing, or is, as it has been called, "a fly in the ointment." Whatever tones are the spontaneous product of the spirit of prophecy, let them come, and let them baptize. But from that and no carnal fountain must vocal notes derive their savor, if they are to mark with the elocution of the Spirit a preaching which keeps to the apostle's limitation, "I will sing with the Spirit, and with the understanding also."

The Doctrinal Soundness of the Doukhobors.

The doubts which the extracts from William Allen's and Stephen Grellet's Journals in our last number may seem to have left behind concerning the evangelical soundness of the Doukhobors, are declared by our Friends who have most visited them in Canada not justified by their own personal acquaintance with them.

Allen and Grellet eighty-five years ago paid to some of the Doukhobors in Russia a cursory visit. They were unprepared in language to converse with them or get at their true inwardness. The frail dependence on an interpreter, unqualified, as many of that class are, to render spiritual truths either to their own minds or those of others; and the lack of training of the Doukhobors themselves in doctrinal expression, it is believed left their visitors' minds to a large degree uninformed.

In Canada, however, our Philadelphia Friends in their several visits got more closely to them. In interchanges of religious views between them, nothing was expressed bordering on Unitarianism. On the contrary, undoubting assent was given to the expressions which our Friends gave concerning Jesus Christ, his sacrificial offering for sin, and his title to be received as our Divine Saviour. No disownment of the Bible on the part of any appeared, but its known contents were accepted as of Divine revelation to men, and their vocal religious exercises were as a rule, in Bible language. The feeling in the meetings for Divine worship held with them was one of true Christian baptism of spirit, in as evident a recognition of the presence of Christ on their part, as had been witnessed anywhere.

As a result of the several visits of our Friends, the sense of Christian fellowship on all vital points was left not only unmarred but confirmed; and they deprecate the going forth of an impression that the Doukhobors are in that imperfect or unsound state as to Christian doctrine that the two visitors of eighty-five years ago left us to suspect. Of course, some specimens of inferior illumination and of crudeness or absence of doctrinal grasp are to be found among them as among other denominations. But to characterize them as a people unorthodox, is not found to have a basis in fact.

EVERY good life is a veritable inspiration. It tells of the triumph of the spiritual and the living over the natural and the dead. Real character belongs only to him that overcometh.—Exchange.

Third Month 1st, 1888.—"In the annual revolution of the seasons, Spring begins her reign to-day. In common with most, I suppose, its return is always welcome to me.

How assuring of stability in the purposes of the Creator, that He has said, 'while earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease,' also that He will not again destroy every living thing upon the earth, as He did by the flood.

It is naturally a dejecting thought, that our individual, physical existence here tends towards decay and dissolution, as life advances;—but the annual revival of vegetable life that occurs each Spring, appears to me a pledge, that with man too fresh life grows out of the decay of the ripened past, and that Death, who seems as an irresistible and mighty conqueror, is surmounted and o'ertopped by Life Eternal. 'For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.'—Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in Victory! It was our Preparative Meeting to-day.

I felt in the meeting for worship, as I have frequently on such occasions, a fervent desire that some preparation of heart might be realized by all present to answer the eight annual questions, which we read at this season respecting the attendance of our Meetings for Divine worship, and other Christian duties. The morning and evening sacrifice, required under the Mosaic law, was brought to mind. It was said to be for a sweet savor unto the Lord, a continual burnt offering. I felt it right to bring these considerations to the view of the Meeting. That a preparation of heart is necessary in coming to a place of worship, an offering, of an acceptable nature, put up by each worshiper to Him, who has said:—'in every place incense shall be offered unto My Name, and a pure offering.' The due attendance of our religious assemblies asked for by our rules, not only consists in punctuality in going, but also requires an adoring spirit while there. The fire must be kept always burning on the altar of the heart. Mere formality will not please God, who looks upon the heart. If fervent in spirit, seeking the aid and guidance of the High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus, He will give us boldness to enter into the holiest, by the blood of Jesus; and we shall realize strength to follow Him in the new and living way. These will not forsake the assembling of themselves together, but will be led to stimulate one another into love and good works; to them the tabernacle of God shall be men, and He shall dwell with them and be with their God. He will make all things new."

First Month, 20th, 1889—"Since our last Yearly Meeting, I have been occupied from time to time, in the services of the Committee then appointed, in visits to the several congregations within our territory. In the course of this effort many public or general meetings have been appointed, mostly in the afternoons of First-day. My service in these has been to endeavor to point out the distinctive principles, for which the Society of Friends was first organized, and its present reason for existing as a Christian Society. Allusion was made to declaration of Paul to the Romans, ii: 28—'For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outwardly in the flesh, but he is a Jew which is inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart in the spirit and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men but of God.' There has always been a tendency in man to clothe his ideas the Deity and worship in some material visible form, hence the first revelations of the Israelites were by outward evidences of His miraculous power, and His laws were communicated to them through Moses, as a mediator, attended by mighty convulsions of nature and the sound of a trumpet. The whole of worship in that age was typical and ceremonial, as being adapted to a weak people prone to image-worship and surrounded by idolaters. But when Christ came, to whom the Mosaic law pointed, He superseded ceremonial worship, by a spiritual one, as declared by Him in the conversation with Samaritan woman (John iv: 21). The sign way to the substance, which the former fed. When at the hour of crucifixion He said, "it is finished," the veil of the temple rent in twain from top to bottom, as if that the old dispensation of shadows and figures was ended, and a new and living way opened to the most holy place of communion with the Father, by Christ Himself, as the believed Mediator and High Priest. Now the prophecy was realized, that the law should put into men's minds and written on their hearts; that the Holy Spirit should be put out on all flesh; that we should not say, 'who ascend into heaven, or who shall descend to the earth' to bring Christ to us, but that the light in the heart and mouth should be prepared as the good news from Him. That Christ promised, before His crucifixion, the sending of His Holy Spirit to His disciples, to abide with them forever. He should take of the Father and show them unto man.

The early Friends grasped these truths vital to living Christianity, and in common with the Puritans, Baptists and other dissenters from the English National Church, protested against the ritualism and ceremonials, that corrupt body had grafted on to the ship of the Almighty. They held that the Christian was one inwardly, who had received heart conversion, and brought forth fruits of the Spirit of Christ. That such a Christian should be outwardly adorned with the image of God in the Spirit, rejoicing in Christ Jesus, having no confidence in the flesh, laid aside all forms and signs, as feeling unnecessary where the substance was enjoyed. There is still a tendency in the human heart to fall back into image-worship, and to cast individual responsibility to love and honor upon an outward priesthood. Therefore continued need for all true Christians, to follow the doctrine of personal access to the Father of all, through Christ alone, and to realize momentary presence in the soul of the beloved by faith."

A Visit to Porto Rico.

BY WM. C. ALLEN AND WM. B. HARVEY.

Aguadilla, First Month 25th, 1905.—This is queer hotel; our room, however, is on the second floor, and more select on that account. It is bordered all around in three colors, pink, blue and green, with white ceiling. We are out on the beach, and the surf pounds away fifty feet from the house. The railroad runs right underneath the window on the other side; it trains each way daily is the crop. Each factory has its own speciality in the way of produce. The smaller kinds are the harder to come by. When we get to Barbados, I think we will get into a clean country; and after we are here, hope to have an inspection that will excel any custom-house work.

Our friend, the Presbyterian pastor of the mission here, welcomed us. We went with him to the jail in the afternoon, I spoke there about half an hour. Men of all shades were about us,—included in their number were, one I talked with, had been sent up for months, for fighting, was twelve years old, and herded together in a large room. After the meeting some of the prisoners were ordered for sale carved coconuts, some quite handsome in design and lettering, all their own work.

By that time rain had commenced to fall pretty sharply; so I got over to the hotel as soon as possible, and rested for the remainder of the day. This morning we had anticipated getting out on a three hours' drive to San Juan, but as to go and return was a whole day's task, and I hardly felt equal to it, I was really glad when we were unable to hire a machine. Now I feel clear regarding that place, I incline to push on to San Juan. There he awaits me, if life and health permit. We are to stop at Arecibo one day en route.

First Month 26th.—This morning we met the children of the Presbyterian Mission School, about seventy-five in number; and had to work amongst them. Last night we had some of the teachers at the home of the minister, we also took dinner with his family. We have this afternoon reached Arecibo, and in our room, whilst W. B. H. has gone away. I have been resting after the trip, it is now a wild mob of boys is shouting and banging under my window, at 6 P. M.

W. B. H. has driven out with Judge Savidge and his wife. The latter is a Friend, and we dined over night at this town, especially to them. They have given us a warm welcome. They are living in the Hotel Italiana. The view from my room is across the street to the plaza, which latter is this time quite fresh and pretty, with a fine new railing about it. It is a bed of flowers, and cement walks; all around the plaza are shops. The Hotel and the view are in marked contrast to our recent experiences. Our room is clean and the house is palatial to us now.

We left Aguadilla at one o'clock on the U. S. mail automobile. It was a little over two hours run, a distance of twenty-seven miles to San Juan, where we exchanged for the train to Arecibo. The trip was quite beautiful and much more pleasant than any thing heretofore, because there were no horses to be cruelly beaten all the way.

First Month 27th.—We reached Arecibo about 4 P. M., and soon found Judge Savidge and wife, in their hotel, where we also stopped. They both, as I wrote, warmly welcomed us. In the evening we had a little meeting together in their parlor, which seemed to be greatly appreciated by them—They seldom see Friends. Altogether we felt well repaid for the extra effort involved in this stop at Arecibo, when we left there at 6.35 this A. M.—We reached San Juan towards noon; and here I pen these lines.

The boarding houses are full, so there was a long search for a place to lodge. Finally we settled on the only place we could find, the Hotel Inglesana, where we hope we can stay until Second Month 6th—when we expect to start south on Royal Mail steamer to Barbados. We have to pay two dollars per day here. All our previous experiences have involved board bills of one dollar and a half per day. But the expenses of traveling are heavy in this country, and made trying by the absolute unreliability of about every one we deal with. We have to struggle for our baggage at times. Thus when we get to a city our trunks are seized by a wild mob of boys and men, each wanting to take us to some hotel—and we have almost to force them off, to get possession. Then we get, say a man to each trunk, and he will take it over to a carriage; and when we pay a nickel or so to each man, a mob of maybe twenty, are dancing around to get the money. So it is practically impossible to get the cash to the real earner of it. The same scene is re-enacted when unloading at the hotel—meanwhile the hackmen will profess not to understand English, and try to charge us two or three times what is right. So it goes—no wonder we want quiet. The above is only a little sample of constant experience.

Seventh-day, First Month 28th.—We have been very busy on book work, and endeavoring to make an arrangement for work next week. To-morrow I have no engagement, so hope to rest. The past two days have been rainy most all the time. The last two weeks indeed, have developed more or less rain each day, except two days we had at Mayaguez.

A funeral just started from a house adjoining this hotel. First came a few boys holding a censer, tall candlesticks and candles, and a "silver cross" about ten feet high. Then some priests dressed up in black gowns, with gold bands on their jackets, or with white jackets. Then the hearse, with plumes about six feet high. Six broad black bands extended on sides of the hearse, the far end of each one being carried by men, who wore tall silk hats. In the rear of the hearse followed a gowned priest and three or four men. I suppose the body will be put into a rented vault, to stay there as long as rent is paid; afterwards cast out.

It is surprising how in a few weeks one becomes tender in the tropics. Thus when the thermometer goes down to seventy-six degrees we feel positively cold. The "goose flesh" runs up and down as it would on a sudden change forty degrees lower, at home. Up in the hills a few weeks ago, we had a temperature of near sixty-five degrees one morning, when neither of us could hardly eat our breakfast, with our teeth chattering so.

The oranges we have had the past weeks have been delightful. Fortunately they do not fall on one, as fried chicken and eggs do. You can get two or three for one cent, each orange as large as fifty cents per dozen ones at home; they are juicy and heavy, and rich in flavor to a degree.

There are many other fruits, which one must acquire a taste for, to enjoy. Some are large in size, and I will never learn their names. Others are the size of pumpkins and grow on trees. Berries of all sorts also grow on trees. All these strange sights make the country scenes very interesting. We do this, however, occasionally—when thirsty we buy a cocunut for one cent, and drink the water in it—or at least a part of it. The large nuts often hold more than a quart.

I have told little again of our work, in this letter; that part largely goes into my journal. But I may say, that the retrospect of our trip around Porto Rico affords satisfaction. Our visits to the missionaries have affected them deeply, in some places, as they have so much appreciated the love which has incited us to sympathize with them, and work amongst their people. Our other meetings in hall or theatres have been sources of blessing to many, who have not understood the Gospel, and that Christ was within them; their hope of glory. I hope some of them will be gathered into fellowship with their Protestant neighbors. Many conversations have I had with young men and women, about their temptations in this colony, and they have often thanked me for my words after I have courteously spoken to them of their soul's interests. So all this has been a reward for the physical trials, exercises of faith, and other besetments that have been our lot. A little over one week more of anticipated labor in San Juan awaits me, if health permits. I will then thankfully leave for other scenes, if so be the Divine will.

BEING an acknowledged minister amongst Friends, and frequently engaged in Gospel labors for the good of others, Peter Yarnall found it needful to watch against his natural eloquence and the fervor of his own spirit in the Lord's cause.

Third Month 11th, 1850.—"There is need of more religious depth and feeling in many to qualify them for service in the church. . . . The present state of the Society calls for a more fervent travail on the part of those who are sensible of it, and a more united application to the Great Head of the Church for wisdom and strength to labor for reformation among us."—Journal of William Evans.

It is wonderful how easily luxuries, if possessed for awhile, grow into necessities; how easily benefits which at first awakened lively gratitude become mere rights for which no thanks are due. Perhaps there is no deterioration of character more subtle than the selfishness which grows and flourishes under love's own sunshine—receiving gifts and services without thought or acknowledgment simply because they have been so long and so lavishly bestowed.—Forward.

SHALL WE LOWER THE BARS?

"If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him" (1 John II: 15.)

Shall we lower the bars, and let them in?
The whirling dance, with its oft-time sin;
Could we ask our Lord to join us there,
Do you think He in the dance would share?

The card, with its fascinating charm,
Luring its victims on to harm;
Leading so oft to the gambling-den—
That trap of death to unwary men?

And the play-house, with its brazen glare—
Should we find our "Father's business" there?
Would our Master join the giddy throng,
With its vulgar jest, and its ribald song?

Would it speed the coming of our King,
Into the Church the world to bring?
For the Church He suffered, bled and died;
And He by the world was crucified.

The Church is His temple, so He said—
Should she drop the bars the world to wed?
"Unequally yoked" they would surely be,
For the Church and the world can not agree.

Nay, nay! We must never yield our stand,
Nor give to the world a welcome hand—
"Dead unto sin," "in newness of life,"
We must shun the paths where sin is rife.

Tis Satan's device to bring them in,
To lure the weak into ways of sin;
And with glowing tints he paints his lair—Beware, O Christian! Beware! Beware!

The "road" for the Church of Christ is strait,
But ever leadeth to heaven's gate;
And pleases the sweetest there abroad;
No joys like these in the world are found.

Shall we lower the bars?

A Warning Unheeded.

A sorrowful account of several young men in America, who going on a party of pleasure on the water, after attending a Quarterly Meeting (or the meetings for worship), wherein they had been faithfully warned, yet persisting, were drowned; related by a friend belonging to said meeting, as follows:

At our last Quarterly Meeting, our beloved friend Thomas Scattergood, in the course of his public testimony, in moving language, warned the youth present to beware of wanton behaviour, dancing, frolicking, etc.; that he had known several instances of Divine displeasure, manifested to individuals who had attended such places as these, and directly after gone to horse races, etc. One instance he held up of a young man on his way home, falling in with a company that were collected on that occasion. They urged him to ride one of the horses. He at first refused, but being hard pressed by some of the company at length submitted, and in the race was thrown from the horse, which occasioned his death; and that it appeared to him his proper business to warn the youth present to beware of such conduct, lest some of them might be made like examples. "I do not say it will be the case, but I find it my duty thus to proclaim a solemn warning."

On Third day after meeting ended, twenty-seven, chiefly young people, embarked on board a boat bound for Sandyhook. But before they set off, it was observed several of them were discouraged and ready to give out; and on their way it was remarked, how dreadful it would be if an unfavorable accident should happen, after being at meeting, and hearing the advice and caution there given. On Fourth day they arrived, and went to view a monument erected over the body of a person of distinction, who with twelve others perished there not long since, and were there all interred.—Fifth day they walked to the lighthouse, and on their return went on a narrow reef of sand that lay about twenty yards from the shore, which is bare at low water, and also the way to it, on this they spent some time in walking, bathing, etc., at length observing the tide rose fast, they were alarmed, and concluded to return, but alas! the sea had covered their path, and smoothed all their waymarks. However they made an attempt, and as they were pressing on, suddenly eleven of them stepped into the deep and were overwhelmed as in a moment, and seven of the number perished, the others by the assistance of some of the company that could swim, got to the shore, though almost spent; four of the corpses were found and brought up here on Sixth-day.

The next day was appointed for their interment. An extensive notice being given, a great concourse of people attended, after which a meeting was held on the solemn occasion, wherein our beloved friend Thos. Scattergood was enabled eminently to preach the Gospel, pertinently to exhort all present to profit by the pointed calamity, and feelingly to impart a portion of consolation to those who drank large draughts from sorrow's stream; and further our said friend T. S. was not free to return home after our Quarterly Meeting ended, nor to proceed in accomplishing any preceding prospects he might have had; but here he was waiting in great exercise of mind, and was heard to say, the day before the tidings came of this extraordinary event, that he was not able to discern the cause of his being thus detained. On Sixth-day evening he retired into a back room, and while sitting there under the pressure of exercise a messenger stepped in with the mournful tidings. Then he thought he could account for the trying dispensation he had passed through; which he related to the crowded audience, and also, that it might be said of him, as of Nehemiah, "Why art thou sad seeing thou art not sick?" "I was not sick (added he) but felt such a pressure of exercise that I had thoughts of taking to my bed."

The entrance from the sea up to New York is about thirty miles distant from Rahway in East Jersey, where the Quarterly Meeting was held.

LOOKING over a sketch of the life of Samuel Bonas, the following extract arrested my close attention. Those who read it carefully can make the application:

"In a district he afterwards visited, he felt an uncommon and weighty concern to ask for a meeting with the ministers, and in it he spoke seasonable words of caution, as some of their members were wont to go into extremes in preaching and vocal prayers without due regard to the needed anointing and guidance of the Holy Spirit, a mistake which they themselves admitted; and on revisiting these meetings the faithful preacher was much cheered at the satisfactory change in the ministry."

Elizabeth Haddon.

Although two hundred years have passed since Elizabeth Haddon came from England take charge of her father's possessions in new America, the interest in her romantic history and useful life remains undiminished.

Hers was a strong and self-reliant nature guided by an unerring conscience, else it would hardly have had the courage to leave the wealthy, comfortable home of her parents at the youthful age of nineteen years, to live in the wilds of America. But she counted not in the spirit of adventure alone, but believing that it was her appointed mission to be a friend and physician to the Lord's people in the New World. With this high and noble purpose in view, she was enabled to surmount the many difficulties which surrounded her pathway, and to establish a home among scattered settlements of New Jersey, where the weary traveler was never known to rest in vain, a home whose influence for good was felt by all her neighbors. She left England early in the year 1701. Upon her arrival in America she spent some time among her friends in Philadelphia before taking up her abode in the New Jersey estate.

During this visit she met with John Estlin, a former acquaintance and frequent visitor at her father's home in England. He was young man of great talent, and an accepted minister in the Society of Friends, which had joined by conviction at an early age. This unexpected meeting of an old friend, a strange land must have been very pleasant to both travelers. John Estlin had returned from North Carolina and Virginia where he had been traveling in the ministry and now felt it his duty to go again to Virginia, "not feeling his mind clear of that province." In the meantime Elizabeth Haddon continued her preparations to occupy her home. She crossed the river at the ferry by Daniel Cooper, and made the remainder of the journey on horseback, a bridle-path being all that pierced the New Jersey forests, led from one settlement to another.

The surroundings were all new and strange to her; the streets of the prospective town were defined only by marks upon the trees of the forest, and the few scattered houses and curious appearance of the natives must have given a peculiar sense of loneliness to the young woman, fresh from the great city of London.

The house which was to be her home was situated on the brow of a hill overlooking Cooper's creek, and about two miles from the present village of Haddonfield. It is probable that she enlarged and improved the house according to her ideas of comfort and convenience, and that she might the better entertain her friends. It being a custom of the time to give a name to these settlements, her home was very appropriately called "Haddonfield."

This home soon became the centre of good works and deeds. So efficient was her skill in the use of simple medicines, and so prophetic her sympathy, that for miles around, in case of illness, her neighbors were sure to send Elizabeth Haddon. She was kind and generous to the poor and the needy about her, ministering to their wants in a way most profuse and durable to them. The neighboring Indians, too, soon learned to love and trust her, and always truthful, just and kind, and from whom she learned much of the medicinal value of roots and herbs.

Friends passing to and from the meeting at Newton ever found a hearty welcome at her door and fireside, and among others John Estauagh was a not infrequent guest. He and Elizabeth Haddon doubtless found much of interest to converse about, of their early life in friends in England, of the growing interest in the new country, and of the wonders to be seen around them. John Estauagh may be found a plausible excuse for his frequent visits in the apparent need of the Newton meeting of someone to hand forth spiritual aid to the few attendants, and could not be blamed for accepting his friend's pressing invitation to go home and dine with her.

Lydia Maria Child, in her account of "The Faithful Emigrant," tells a pretty story of the courtship of John Estauagh and Elizabeth Haddon, upon which the poet Longfellow vividly bases his account. She says, "John Estauagh, with a number of other Friends had mingled with Elizabeth Haddon, and in the evening they started on horseback to attend a Quarterly Meeting at Salem, wagons being in unknown in New Jersey. John Estauagh, says kindly in his impulses, busied himself helping a lame old woman, and left his steed to mount her horse as she could. Most young women would have felt slighted, but Elizabeth's noble soul the quiet, deep tide feeling rippled with an inward joy. 'He is saying kindest to the poor and the neglected,' thought she.

"She was leaning over the side of her horse to adjust the buckle of the girth, when he stepped up on horseback and inquired if anything was out of order. With slight confusion and eyes less calm than her usual utterance, she replied, 'Nothing, friend John; I was merely looking to see if Joseph had buckled the girth securely.' They trotted along leisurely behind the guests for some time, talking of the wonders of this new country, and the Lord had provided a home for his own people.

Presently the saddle girth began to slip, the saddle turned so much to one side that Elizabeth was obliged to dismount. It was some time to adjust it, and when they again started the company was out of sight. There was a brighter color than usual in the maiden's cheek, and an unwonted radiance in her mild blue eyes. After a short silence she said, in a voice slightly tremulous, 'Friend John, I have a subject of deep importance on my mind, and one that deeply interests thee. It has strongly impressed that the Lord has chosen thee to me as a partner for life. I tell my impression frankly, but not without prayer and deep reflection, for matrimony is a sacred relation, and should be entered into with sober maturity. Thou art to leave this part of the country to-morrow, and, not knowing when I could see thee again, I felt to tell thee what upon my mind.'

John Estauagh was taken by surprise, for though he had ever respected and esteemed the friendship, this was a new thought to him, and he felt best satisfied to let the matter rest until he should have discharged the duties of his mission upon which he was then engaged."

The veracity of this record is questioned, however, by the descendants of Elizabeth Haddon, by the probability that the trip to Salem was accomplished by water, as no extended journeys were attempted on horseback in those days, where the place to be reached was near a navigable stream.

This is further shown in the account of the funeral of Esther Spicer, a neighbor of Elizabeth Haddon's, who died in 1703. The company embarked in boats, going down Cooper's creek to the river, by the river to Newton creek, and up that stream to the Newton graveyard. Each boat carried a torch, presenting a weird and impressive sight as they passed silently along through the dark forests which came close down to the shores of the streams.

But, whether the journey was made by land or water, or whether Elizabeth Haddon took the initiative, certain it is, that John Estauagh shortly returned, and he and Elizabeth Haddon were married on the first day of the Eighth Month, 1702. The wedding was a simple affair, occurring in Elizabeth's own house, in the presence of a committee appointed by Newton Meeting and a few invited guests. There were few marriages accomplished in public meetings in early times, the more select home wedding being generally preferred.

In 1713 John and Elizabeth Estauagh built a new brick house a short distance from the present village of Haddonfield, on the site where the residence of Samuel Wood now stands. This house was substantially built of bricks brought from England, and bore the evidence of wealth and taste on the part of the owner. It was called "New Haddonfield," but the name was soon taken from both settlements, and given to the village which stands partly on the tract of land owned by Elizabeth Haddon.

It was a long journey from New Haddonfield to the meeting-house at Newton, which was situated where the railroad station at West Collingswood now stands, and the roads were often very bad. A small log meeting house was therefore built in the new settlement near the King's Highway about 1720 or earlier.

Scarcely more than a year later, a new brick meeting-house was built, on ground donated for the purpose by Elizabeth Estauagh's father, John Haddon. This was until 1818 the only place of public worship in the village. Elizabeth Estauagh was for fifty years clerk of the Monthly Meeting held there.

John Estauagh died in Tortola, one of the West Indies, while on a religious visit in 1742. His wife survived him twenty years, being in the eightieth year of her age when she died. Her remains were interred in the graveyard at Haddonfield, but unfortunately no one now living knows just where. How thankful, we at the present day would be if some stone, however rough or rude, pointed out the exact spot where were laid the remains of one whose life and labors were so closely connected with the founding of our Haddonfield.

Elizabeth Estauagh had no children of her own, so she adopted her nephew, Ebenezer Hopkins, the son of her sister Sarah. He came to this country to reside with his aunt, and was educated by her. To his children she willed her vast estates.

Many interesting relics are now in the possession of the descendants and friends of Ebenezer Hopkins. Among these are the wedding certificate of John and Elizabeth Estauagh; a silk cape worn by Elizabeth Estauagh; a mirror, three tables, several napkins and spoons marked with her initials; numerous letters from John Haddon to his daughter; a mortar and pestle used by Elizabeth Estauagh in the preparation of her medicines; a tall eight-day clock which is still a good time-keeper; John Estauagh's Bible, printed in 1566; and other valuable books and papers.

The house which for so many years was the home of John and Elizabeth Estauagh was destroyed by fire in 1842, but was soon replaced by another, built much on the same plan. This place has much that is attractive to the antiquarian, the present owners being careful to preserve everything that originated with Elizabeth Haddon. A distillery which was attached to the premises is still standing. This was used as a "medicine house," where were brewed the medicines for which she was famous.

A part of the original brick wall which enclosed the fine old garden still remains standing, and the front walk is made of square bricks from the old house. On the front door is the knocker, bearing the initials J. & E. E., and the date 1713.

The fine old yew trees, brought over from England and planted in the garden by Elizabeth Haddon, and which have bravely withstood the winds and storms of two centuries, are in themselves well worthy of a trip to historic Haddonfield. But the chief monument of her life and work is the town which bears her name, and where the influence of her unselfish life and religious teaching is still felt, after so many generations have passed away.

LYDIA E. KITE.

A PLAIN EXTERIOR.—To accuse any Monthly Meeting of frequently preferring individuals for service in the church, simply or chiefly for their exterior plain appearance, is very unjustifiable. We imagine no one can possibly suppose that a plain exterior is in itself, sufficient qualification (for service in the church); but other things being equal, there can be no question of its being a recommendation, if it does not qualify, neither of itself, does it disqualify. Whereas a fashionable exterior, with or without the requisite essentials, must be, in itself, a forbidden element in the character. —British Friend, vol. xxiv: p. 119.

You say that the absence of restfulness in modern life springs from the fiercer struggle for existence. But the Bible goes a good deal deeper than this: the want of rest is rooted in want of trust. Depend on it, he that believeth not is always in danger of feverish impatience. Depend upon it that, to the end of time he that believeth shall not make haste. Nothing is gained by hurry. Patiently wait for God's leading. —Selects.

CORRUPTING FOOD! for any to feed upon the faults of others. These things stagnate the circulation of life in meetings, and may be compared to the foxes which spoil the precious vines."

The Testimony of Priscilla Cotton made to Friends on the Day She Died.

All my dear friends, who have found your Redeemer, oh! wait upon Him at all times, that you may stand continually in his presence where life is, that with the light you receive from Him, you may see your thoughts, and deny them, that in stayedness you may be kept, when the hasty, forward spirit would arise, and keep it down. With the measure of God's spirit all may be weighed, the words to what they tend, that no lightness may appear in your words, nor unsavoriness, that no offence come, but edification by all you speak. Let the elders watch, that at no time the younger may see lightness, laughter, or words of offence, but that you may always keep down the evil in yourselves, and may minister grace to all you have to do with, that God's spirit be not grieved. So keep the field clean, that was once ploughed up and made green and beautiful, that no stones or hurtful weeds grow in it to oppress the seed.

Friends, the cross is the power of God; and when you flee the cross, you lose the power; that which pleaseth self, is above the cross, and that which pleaseth man, is above the cross; and that which shuns the cross, yields to the carnal part, and loses its dominion.

Though the cross seems foolishness, stand in it; though it seems weak, stand in it; though it be a stumbling block to the wise, stand in it; there the dominion, authority, and crown are received. This is not for you to be exercised in for a time only, as at your first conviction, but daily, even to the death, as long as a desire, will, or thought remaineth in you, contrary to God's pure light, and judge it by it; and as you wait in the light you will come to know a cross, in the use of meat, drink, and apparel, and keep to the cross when alone, or in company; what the pure mind of God stands against in you, that the cross is against.

So Friends, watch daily to keep Christ's command, Take up your daily cross; be not at liberty one day, but deny thy own will, thy own thoughts, and thy own self. Taking up the cross, you feel the power, the strength of the Lord God, which breaks down all, keeps in order, in safety, and in peace. This preserves from stubbornness, wilfulness, and headiness, and brings all to be subject, as dear children, unto God, and subject one unto another as brethren. In the light and in the cross, there are no evil thoughts, no hard speeches, no contention, no having pre-eminence; but as brethren and sisters, pitiful, tender-hearted, courteous, forgiving, forbearing, long-suffering, and supporting one another.

Here the power of the cross is known, which brings all God's praise, and to his honor and glory, and to his children's prosperity and peace: so let it be, Amen.

PRISCILLA COTTON.

It is said of a certain author, that to him "there is no life to be compared with that of the student; he is perfectly happy among his books." This is a happy taste for a part of life, but not for the whole of it. The place of books is to fit for service. We read to learn the truth about man, that we may then go out among men and do the good we have dreamed.—Extract.

For "THE FRIEND."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

"It has ever been the care of this Committee to avoid interfering with their Government or taking side in their disputes; but to endeavor by a kind, conciliatory, and impartial course of conduct toward everyone, of whatever sentiment, to convince them that our motive was love to all the Indians, and our object the promotion of their welfare and improvement, without distinction of name or party. In the present unhappy controversy we feel it our duty to keep steadily to the same course, and as we trust that your views are in accordance with ours, we desire affectionately to strengthen your hands therein. It is the province of the Indians to settle among themselves the form of government under which they will live; our line of duty is to confine ourselves to the promotion of their religious, moral and social improvement, encouraging them to be united among themselves, and to join hands for the advancement of the general welfare.

"We feel for you, dear friends, in your remote and lonely situation, and in the arduous duties which devolve upon you, and desire to encourage you to look for wisdom and strength, as well as preservation, to Him whose tender mercy reaches the most solitary seeker, and who is the unfailing refuge and helper of all those who put their trust in Him. Desiring to hear often from you, we are your affectionate friends."

The subject of adopting an improved system of education for the benefit of the Indians had for some time been under consideration. The irregular attendance of the children at schools when they returned to their homes at night, had been found to be so great, that the establishment of a Boarding School had been seriously considered by the Committee prior to the Yearly Meeting of 1850, in which body a minute was made stating that "It appearing desirable that a more efficient system of education should be introduced at the Reservation, the Committee were desired to take the subject into their consideration, and if they see their way to propose any mode by which it may be accomplished, they are encouraged to present it to the Meeting next year."

In accordance with this minute a sub-committee was appointed by the Indian Committee to consider the matter more fully, who reported in the Tenth Month, 1850, proposing that about six boys and six girls should be taken into the family at Tunesassa, and instructed not only in school learning, but in agriculture, gardening, spinning, knitting, needlework and the various branches of house-wifery; and that the care-takers should endeavor as far as practicable to maintain toward them a tender parental watchfulness and care, and to inspire them with feelings of filial respect and affection so as to harmonize as one family.

The proposition contained in this report was approved by the Yearly Meeting in 1851, and the Committee soon took steps to carry it out, and thus was begun one of the agencies which has perhaps been the most successful in the fifty years which have since elapsed in improving the general character of this people, and assisting them in retaining possession of their land. At this time in addition to the day school taught by Sarah Eastlack, a school at Horse Shoe Bend was more or less under the care of the Committee.

Solomon and Susan Lukens resigned the positions at Tunesassa in 1851, and we succeeded in the following year by John Wood and his wife Susanna L. Wood, members of Birmingham Monthly Meeting, Pa. They were accompanied by Rebecca G. Cope, (afterwards Rebecca G. Passmore) also a member of the Meeting, and arrived at Tunesassa in the Eleventh Month 1852.

A Committee consisting of Joseph Elkinton, Joel Evans, and Thomas Wistar, Jr., visited Tunesassa at this time and introduced John and Susan L. Wood in a public council to the Indians. They also explained to them the plan which they had in view in reference to the Boarding School and desired their cooperation in selecting six girls from distant parts of the Reservation who should be received as boarders in the family. It was also understood that children residing in the neighborhood should be admitted as day scholars. These plans were the approval of the Indians. Previous to the opening of the school however, the building which Ebenezer Worth had erected near the river, the accommodation of the school was removed to a site adjoining the farm house, and so changes were made in the dwelling houses on the farm to accommodate the increased size of the family. The three members of the Committee above mentioned paid a visit to Cattaraugus Reservation at this time and held a council with the Indians in reference to pressing invitation which the Committee had received a few months previously to occupy the property there, which those who had separated from Friends in 1827 had abandoned and to open a Boarding School on it, for education of their children. The Indians were informed that their friends, the Quakers, were willing to assist them by paying the salary whole or in part, of a teacher who might instruct their children in a day school, to be conducted under their own control and responsibility, but that they did not feel prepared to go further at that time.

The Boarding School at Tunesassa was opened on the 23rd of Twelfth Month, 1852, and during the winter about thirty day scholars attended it, in addition to the six girls who had been taken as boarders. The attendance of those who lived in the neighborhood was however quite irregular, and the number of the present averaged about twenty. Susan Wood who was an experienced teacher, instructed the children herself.

The progress of the children in their studies under her care was quite satisfactory, and the Committee felt so much encouraged as to take steps to increase the number of children boarding at the school, to twelve.

WHAT A good Master do we serve that allows us time for sleep and furnishes us the convenience for it and makes it refreshing and reviving to us! By this it appears the Lord is for the body, and it is a reason why we should present our bodies to Him as living sacrifices and glorify Him in them.—Matthew Henry.

mighty Power, for such Thou surely art, a hold creation subject to Thy will;
 say These knowledge of Thyself impart, or bid my craving after Thee be still.
 Why is it Thy will that I should know, why this my hungry longing after Thee?
 shouldst Thou have beckoned the heavens so Thy intention were I should not see?
 Thou art love, as some are wont to say, help me to understand this law of death;
 both doth of life make sport and with me play, though I fight against it at each breath.
 come with lack of reverence for Thee, come with earnest questionings like these.
 because I fain the truth would see, how before Thee thus on bended knees.
 my fault that centuries of lies have heaped themselves till truth is deeply hid?
 that I doubt the witness of my eyes, and find it hard myself of lies to rid?
 on all around are those who claim to know, and show authority from Thee to speak, that I to blame because my feet are slow or Thee of my unaided self to seek?
 thy me, I pray, nor let me grope in blindness, for I seek the truth and Thee, to seek to my heart the words, if there be hope, that some day I the blessed truth shall see.
 the truth, 't'hen when its scourge I feel, seek the right, though oft from it I stray, rest in Thee and now before Thee kneel;
 teach me the truth and guide my steps, I pray.

LISTEN, youthful reader, to the voice that is louder than the noise of many waters. Art faithful in little things? or art thou seeking to do something great, and to accomplish it in thy own way? Art thou willing to step up thy cross daily in the paths of self, and follow a crucified Saviour whitherever He may lead? For He has cast up a holy way for all his humble, faithful disciples to go in. Art thou obedient like Moses, who when the command was given, "put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground," obeyed the word of the Lord. There may be a covering of the mind, not acceptable in the Divine sight, the command to thee may be to put it off from thee. My youthful reader! remember, obedience is better than sacrifice, and to obey the voice of the Lord, than the fat of rams." — Q. U.

Items Concerning the Society.

THE VICE CRUSADE.—A minute of Germantown Executive Meeting has been published, deploring conditions of vice as practically winked at by city government, and invoking a religious conference for the delivery of the city from the bondage of corruption.
 The first starting of the present remarkable movement of protest against the tolerance of the "White " and kindred traffic, has been traced to the fulness of conferences of women Friends in city, in first petitioning the authorities. The plan of the recent remarkable presentation of Grand Jury, as well as the president and some members of the Committee of Seventy, are also in membership with Friends, two of whom also serve the Committee of Seven appointed by the recent officers and Business Men's Convention to keep the reform active and spreading.
 These Friends having served as a quiet vanguard in this crusade, are not without a reserve rearguard waiting on the Lord for the right place for them especially to step into. After the whirlwind, may there be heard "the still, small voice."

Abram Fisher writes from Tampa, Florida, that he has been on a visit to Cuba. He traveled over the island by rail, horseback, and on foot, attended several meetings, visited the prisoners in the large jail at Matanzas. The inmates crowded around as if not to lose one word when mention was made of the grace of God which brings salvation and has appeared to all men. After a large meeting in a small town people said that they had learned nothing from the priests, who had kept them in darkness, but "now we are left without excuse, being informed by the full and free salvation that comes by Jesus Christ." In an interview held a priest said there was nothing in water baptism, as at the best it could not go further than the body, but that true baptism reached to the spiritual life. A railroad conductor being offered a tract said he was a Roman.
 He was asked whether he went to confession, which he spurned from him, and said no. Then he was told that he was no Roman, at which his countenance brightened up and he took some tracts and put them carefully away for perusal. "Some of those who come to meetings held after the manner of Friends are very poor, and I think that if some of the more favored Philadelphia Friends knew of it they would be glad to help them. . . The Lord has a great work on hand and to do in places where heretofore there has seemed almost total darkness.
 To a Southern general and other listeners at a hotel the teaching of Christ whose kingdom is not of this world, and as to Peace, appeared new. . . As I read to a full cabin of passengers the testimony of early Christians against war, they would hardly believe it."

Notes in General.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Philadelphia has celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. A million men a year are said to enter the doors of its various branches.

The latest authentic figures it is said give the number of Catholics in the world as 230,000,000; of Protestants of all denominations, 140,000,000;
 and Greek or Russian Catholics, 100,000,000.

Samuel A. Eliot says: "May we not cherish the reasonable hope that with little or no diminution in the number of the sects we may come into an ever-larger sympathy, each cultivating his own garden with assiduous care, but each rejoicing in the other flowers and fruit, not always harping on the weeds."

The pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle, N. Y., says: "All deep-eyed men are seeing with increasing clearness that it is not by ecclesiastical might or by political power, but by the spirit of Jehovah, that the mountains of iniquity are to be levelled and the rough places made smooth. The evangelism of the coming days will begin with God."

An article on "The Great Religions Revival in Wales," in The Independent, states that "the movement is killing sectarianism, which has been the bane of Welsh Protestantism in the past, and all the churches are holding union meetings where necessary." An addition of thirty-five thousand members has been made, it is said, to the churches.

The Cathedral in the City of Mexico, which stands upon the site of the famous Aztec Temple, is one of the largest and most elaborate cathedrals in America. The cost of the exterior was about $2,000,000, while the decorations of the choir alone cost $1,500,000, its wonderful railings having been made in Macao. The Cathedral was built under the auspices of Charles V. and Pope Clement VII.

Over fifty-two thousand wretched men sought shelter, food and help at the old Jerry McAuley Mission, in New York, last year. Forty thousand nights' lodgings and fifty thousand meals were given. It is said that about ninety per cent. of the applicants were once Sunday-school scholars, and in one group of forty-six, twelve were college graduates. The mission is almost directly under the end of Brooklyn Bridge, and is open from early morning till late at night.

It required fifty years for the King James version of the Bible to come into common use in place of previous translations. The American Standard Revision has grown very rapidly in popularity.
 The demand for it is now four times as great as when it was first published by Nelson & Sons in 1901. Thirteen styles of it have appeared, the latest being a large quarto pulpit edition. The London Quarterly Review says of the American Standard Revision, "It is a noble work, destined to become the accepted Bible of the majority of the Anglo-Saxon race."

OUR TANDEM POLYGAMISTS. — The Providence Journal calls it very poor logic to say that if clergymen refuse to marry divorced persons and these are driven to the purely civil ceremony, the sacred aspect of the institution of matrimony will be injured. What sacredness can it possibly have to the tandem polygamists who change partners whenever the fancy strikes them? Certainly no religious body that uses the impressive words of the Prayer Book can consider the union of men and women who have living wives or husbands as in any sense "sacred."

A Brockton High School boy, having had a difficulty with the military instructor, wrote and published a pamphlet of sixteen pages, which he called "Frenzied Militarism," and of which he sent copies to President Roosevelt, Governor Douglas and the Brockton Library. This is distinctly a childish performance, though grown men have not infrequently been guilty of something very like it.
 What the President and Governor have done the gift is not stated. Most likely they, or their secretaries for them, have forwarded handsomely and vaguely worded letters of thanks and acceptance. The librarian of Brockton, has, however, declined to receive the pamphlet, thereby exposing himself to the suspicion of not quite knowing his business, says the New Bedford Standard.

MODERN METHODS IN A CHINESE CITY. — The Chinese have the reputation of being still wedded to the things of the past, and to be suspicious of everything that savors of Western civilization and progress. But this does not apply to all, even to Chinese officials. Governor Chou Fu, who was recently promoted to the Liangking viceroyalty, had been in Chinanfu, the capital of the Shantung province, since 1902, and the progress of city and province had been remarkable. This model governor had been friendly with all foreigners; had exercised a fostering care of the institutions he found when placed in charge, and had himself created a model police system, a hospital run according to Western methods, a mint, and other modern institutions. The people of the city are very sorry to lose him, and feel that the heavier responsibilities of the viceroyalty may be too great a burden for his seventy years, for he is not a man of robust health.

THE MISSION OF PEACE.—The time has come for a persistent effort in behalf of a peace sentiment that shall effect something in the world. Nearly a century and a half ago the historian Gibbon wrote:

"So long as mankind shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors, the thirst of military glory will ever be the vice of the more exalted characters."
 And even now in the dawning of the twentieth century we continue to place special emphasis on the world's soldiers rather than upon her civilians. Are Grant, Sherman and Sheridan American idols because of the slaughter of the Wilderness, the march to the sea, and the famous ride in the Shenandoah? Of the Civil War we continue to touch the record of the campaigns and the graphic accounts of the battles.

It is time to be heroic, to eliminate the French and Indian wars, the battles of the Revolution, and the campaigns of the Civil War. It is enough to know that our forefathers suffered at the hands of the Indians for a century and more, that our fathers were able to wrest victory from a powerful mother country, and that after four years of struggle the South yielded to the superior force and better conditions of the Union army.

It ought to be considered a crime against humanity to have one question in any school or teachers' examination papers referring to military campaigns and battles, and then the teachers who dwell upon these phases of history would be forced to confess that they teach these things from blood-thirsty instincts.—A. E. Winskip.

FOOTBALL MORALITY.—The Springfield Republican says: "In the matter of excuses for absences," writes the dean of Harvard College in his annual report, "the standard of honor among a considerable body of our students, generous and in other affairs high minded, of whom the college may otherwise be proud, is deplorably low." The criticism of college football as morally degenerate serves to fix attention upon what President Eliot calls the practice of malingering. That is, to put it bluntly, plain lying to the college authorities to escape the duties of the hour; that it is very prevalent among college students is the testimony of the responsible witnesses. The low football morality complained of may not be due to the inherent character of that game so much as to the generally low moral atmosphere of life in general and college life in particular in our time.

The dean of Harvard College speaks of the "deplorably low" standard of honor among students in lines far removed from the football field. It is certain that football is not the cause of college malingering; something else causes this widespread lying and deceit. What is it? Cannot the college authorities fasten upon it and extirpate it? They would abolish football—some of them—in order to eradicate the immorality lurking in it. What should be destroyed in order to eradicate the chronic malingering of a thousand students?

There is no extravagance in the opinion that the moral evils of football to a large degree have their roots in the civilization in which our young men are reared, before they enter college, and into which they plunge again after leaving college. The question of the Wall Street Journal was rather droll. "The bulk of the young men graduating from American colleges to-day," it said, "go into business and professional life. Are they carrying into the field of business the same principles which have governed them in the conduct of the great intercollegiate game? That is indeed a very serious thing to contemplate." There is not a little of the comic in the idea that Wall Street ethics are being polluted by the football ethics taken into business and professional life by a few college graduates. The truth is that the almost universal spirit of "success," which so rots the morality of business life and judges all things according to the standard of "anything to win," does not originate in the sports of college students. The ethics of practical life have made inroads doubtless upon football, but that should not blind one to the fact that the source of demoralization is deep in the people's life.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President sent a new treaty with San Domingo and a message to the Senate on the 15th instant. In the latter he states that to maintain the Monroe doctrine it was necessary for the United States to see that just claims contracted by South and Central American republics and those of the West Indies be satisfied, and that, therefore, it was in the interest of peace for this Government to take over the control of the revenues in San Domingo. The Monroe doctrine is discussed at some length, especially as regards the relations of the United States to the republics of the South. In protecting these republics and guaranteeing their territorial integrity, it is asserted to be necessary that these republics be paid, so that foreign intervention in the affairs of such republics may be avoided.

The new treaty provides that the United States shall collect the customs revenues of San Domingo and turn over to President Morales' Government a specified per cent of the same, and the proceeds of administration and disburse the remainder among foreign claimants. The United States undertakes to respect the integrity of San Domingo, and the protocol or treaty must be approved by the United States Senate and the Dominican Congress.

It also provides that "the Government of the United States, at the request of the Dominican Republic, shall grant the latter such other assistance as the former shall deem proper to restore the credit, preserve order, increase the efficiency of the civil administration and advance the material progress and welfare of the Dominican Republic."

Should this treaty be ratified the Dominican Republic will be under the direct control of the United States and a precedent be established in regard to the application of the Monroe doctrine, which may cause grave apprehensions in view of the financial condition of other countries in Central and South America.

Director Martin, of Philadelphia, says that all buildings in which a case of pneumonia is discovered should be disinfected. He regards the disease as contagious, and advocates that physicians take precautions to prevent its spreading.

The recent cold weather and heavy snows have greatly injured the coal business. The estimates made by traffic officers of the Pennsylvania that there have been 5000 cars of delayed freight in and around Harrisburg, 5000 cars in and around Pittsburg, 5000 cars around this city and Jersey City, and 5000 are among the yards at Baltimore, Sunbury, Buffalo, Altoona and Pitscane. More than 10 per cent. are loaded with coal, destined for Eastern cities.

A despatch from Washington of the 17th says: After many years of negotiations, a parcels post treaty between the United States and Great Britain was to-day signed by President Roosevelt, Secretary Hay and Postmaster General Wynne. It has already been signed by the corresponding British officials. The maximum weight allowed is four pounds six ounces. The rate fixed is twelve cents a pound or fraction of a pound in this country, and two shillings per parcel in England. All packages sent under this arrangement are limited in value to $50.

The recent development of the oil fields in Kansas has made the oil business one of the State's most important industries. Much feeling has been aroused in that State against the Standard Oil Company, which it is alleged has unjustly discriminated against the producers of oil in Kansas. In compliance with a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives, President Roosevelt has directed the United States Corporation to conduct an investigation of the operations of the Standard Oil Co. in that State. Requests have been received by the Government, that the inquiry should be extended into the operations of the Standard Oil Company in other localities. It is stated that a bill providing for the establishment of a State oil rebuffey passed the Kansas House of Representatives by a vote of 91 to 30. The bill had previously passed the Senate.

Members of the Legislature believe Kansas is to receive material aid from Iowa, Missouri and Arkansas, and probably other States, in its contention with the oil trust.

A despatch from Dallas, Texas, says: The oil issue is becoming an acute one in the Texas Legislature. The independent companies have been clamoring for legislation to protect them from extortion and business conspiracy, in which they claim to be victims of representatives of the Standard Oil Company, which, it is alleged, controls the pipe lines of the State.

FOREIGN.—The British Parliament was opened on the 11th inst. King Edward read a speech to the members assembled in the House of Lords. In the discussions which followed, Foreign Secretary Lansdowne expressed his sorrow and concern at the continuance of the war, and said that should an opportunity for bringing it to a close present itself, the Government would avail itself thereof with alacrity, but an attempt at intervention now would mean retarding the very object desired. True in regard to the Tibet question, he said that the policy of the Government toward Tibet had been absolutely consistent. Colonel Younghusband, the British political agent who headed the mission, had transgressed his instructions when he arranged for British forces to remain in the Chumbi district for seventy-five years, and this action had been repudiated by the Government.

On the 17th inst. the Grand Duke Sergius of Russia, uncle of the Czar, was killed by a bomb thrown under carriage in which he was riding. The assassin was arrested in Moscow. This murder is believed to have been instigated by the Socialistic revolutionary party, by whom he was considered a largely responsible for the late progressive measures of the Government.

A despatch of the 18th says: The murder of Grand Duke Sergius just at the time when the forces of liberalism were again in the supremacy and when the signing of the Zemsky Sobor was actually assured meets a universal reproach, even by extreme social democrats who denounce the crime as strongly as do the liberals and conservatives.

A despatch of the 19th says: The assassination Grand Duke Sergius has struck terror to the hearts Russia's imperial family and to every official known have incurred the enmity of radical organizations. Regard for the personal safety of the sovereign led to the decision that the Emperor shall not go to Moscow to attend funeral.

A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 14th says: Estimates, based on official figures, show that Russia's loss in men killed, incapacitated, invalided and rendered ineffective through capture at Fort Arthur for the first six months of the war has been between 122,000 and 125,000. Of 63,000 men have been killed or died of wounds disease.

A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 17th says: Empress of Russia has received from the women of Moscow an address piteously appealing to her, as a woman and a mother, to use her best influence with the Emperor, to secure peace and "sovereignty," the petition says, "believes your mother's heart feels all the horrors of war as we do. Peace is violated not only beyond the front but even in the heart of the Fatherland. We see in cent troubles the beginning of calamities that may or all Russia if the Emperor does not seek to avert a war which passes his life and the life of his people into a trembling. Mothers who have to bring the young generation are saddened by seeing that it is impossible to train up children on the basis of truth, and duty when the social life of the country does not rest thereon. Our best forces are perishing. Mothers who hearts are breaking cannot remain silent."

War has broken out in neighborhood of the Shabke River Manchuria continues.

"Purga Urbem."

For the suppression of vice let us not forget the police force, or look too earnestly on the mayor's policemen, as if by their own or holiness they could cause vice to be repressed. Vice in its myriad forms is but an expression of sin in the human heart, and the true crusaders of the crusade that eliminates it must be men of the true Cross. Veneration of outward heads of government influence some votes, but when the votes are cast it is but the finish of a day, while the spiritual voting days of the year are a hundred and sixty-five in number. In continuing days now our true work for reformation lies. For the fifty or perhaps for the hundred righteous may the Sodom be saved. The holiness of the soldiers of the Cross must be according to the old Roman meaning, as solus. The closet is the voting-booth, every equal exercise co-operative with Christ's righteousness is a vote of power, and the darkness of faith within many of the denizens can light them up, and no political candidate could resist a cleansing baptism of the sea and of fire in the dens of pollution. Nationalism on the part of religious representatives will be as unproductive in results as it has been in voters; but may stirring up be overruled as a preliminary still, small voice of effective, inworking truth. Through God's emissaries, visible and audible, a work of cleansing can go forth; He asserts his need of policemen and policemen of his own choosing, whether cure or in open exercise of spirit and holiness, may that purging of a city go on only a baptism of the river of the water of life can make.

observer of the Welsh Revival, says that in Anglesey he has heard farm servants, common plowboys, practically unlettered, burst out into spontaneous prayer and a flow of the most chaste and classic Welsh. "Their diction," he says, "is frequently more chaste and beautiful than anything I can hope to attain to. You cannot possibly explain it by any ordinary human standards. It must be inspiration."

SHALL PRAYERS BE UP TO DATE, OR UP TO HEAVEN?—A Mothers' Council has been declaring the well known verse-form of prayer for children, "Now I lay me down to sleep," etc., to be "out of date," without indicating any reference to the one Authority for true prayer, as to whether the acceptableness to Him of that language has ceased. Indeed this, as every other form of prayer, is always out of date when out of the Spirit of grace and supplication in the user of it; and the only up-to-date prayer is that which, whether voiced or unvoiced, is for the time being prayed "with the Spirit and with the understanding also."

The same principle applies to the proposed substitutes, which may be repeated thousands of times without praying once. "Beautiful," was truly said of one of them, "So tranquilizing!"—a criterion which forgets God, and judges of a prayer by its pleasing auditory effect on man. "I could not hear thy prayer, thou spoke so low," complained one after a meeting for worship. "It was not addressed to thee," was the sound answer. What regard has our Heavenly Father for prayers aimed along the earth's level, and placed as church or as bed-room furniture for human effect? He will leave their answers to those to whose ear the prayers were directed. Such expressions as "he made us a beautiful prayer," illustrate the lowered conception of public prayer which a stated praying to audiences has been teaching. Let words of our mouth and of the child's mouth be heart-prayers before they are word-prayers, then God is not mocked, and no suitable form of the heart's living utterance is out of date to Him.

QUENCH not the good in any, but cherish it and nourish it: the husbandman is tender of his cornfield, and so is the Lord of his seed, which He has sowed in the fields, which is the hearts of people, that it may grow up in the patience.—George Fox.

Worship Prearranged Out.

The following is an extract given in the British Friend, from a private letter written by an English woman who joined the Society of Friends some years ago, and is now residing in one of the Western States, where "pastoral" methods prevail.

It is a very difficult question, that of the method of conducting our Meetings. Of course, if all the units would live up to the true Quaker ideal, there would be no possible lack of interest and life in any meeting; but alas! a large proportion of those who attend go with vacant minds, some even lacking any active desire to be fed—just going from sheer force of habit or attention to the proprieties; and then what wonder they find everything stale and unprofitable! Nevertheless, it does seem to me that we shall be wiser to keep the way open for the fulfilling of our ideals, rather than fill up the lack by "arranging" our meetings. I have felt this strongly since coming to this place; for what is the distinction here between Friends and others? Nothing beyond the dropping of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and the use of an occasional "thee." With the Pastor preaching a regular sermon of about forty minutes, and a choir on the platform to lead and do most of the singing, there is no possibility for any "leading of the Spirit."—no time, not a minute even, given to silent worship. And also at the commencement of "service," the Pastor announces "Let us have a season of prayer," it is all done on the talk basis, one and another making the usual prayer-meeting petitions. Directly the constant flow of words ceases for a minute, the Pastor gives out a hymn; and so we keep busy till the end, and the restful, solemn quiet of spiritual waiting upon and worship of God is crowded out, arranged out, as obsolete, unworkable. Words will not tell you how keenly I hope that English Friends will not give up this, their birthright message and testimony to the reality of the leadership of the Spirit, and to the deep spiritual worship of the soul before God in silence.

Pastors, choir-singing and forty minute sermons can be got in better shape at other conventicles, but this niche of silence and Spirit-led utterance will be unoccupied in the Temple of Worship when English Friends rule it out of date. I had a chat about it with the Pastor at ———, and he remarked in a condescending way that of course English Friends were conservative,—it would be useless to try to force their hands,—they were not ready for American methods yet! Mentally I said "Thank God!" It was useless to discuss it with one so thoroughly self-satisfied.

"True religion shows its influence in every part of our conduct; it is like the sap of a living tree, which penetrates the most distant boughs."

Some notes concerning two visits to Washington in company with other Friends appointed by the Meeting for Sufferings, show the attitude of two of our Presidents toward Friends, and their views in regard to war.

"In 1890 a committee was appointed, to prepare and present a memorial to the President, Benjamin Harrison, and other officers of the United States government, respecting the disturbed condition of the Sioux Indians in the Dakota States, and commending a policy of justice and conciliation toward them, instead of using the army and forcible measures, to keep them under control. We had an interview with the President, who received us respectfully, (but standing);—he was handed a copy of the printed Memorial, which we offered to read to him, but he preferred to do so at leisure. We gave a few words of explanation, and reference was made to the sad news just received that morning of a conflict between the troops and the Indians, in the effort of the former to disarm the latter.

The President expressed his determination to carry out the process of disarmament, at all hazards, and occupied so much of the interval allowed us, in vindicating his own plans, as to foreclose, very much, any remarks on our part.

I suggested to him the Scripture policy of overcoming evil with good, which induced the rejoinder, that soldiers and Indians were both rather strangers to such a rule of conduct. To this I replied that I understood our President was a professing Christian, and hoped he would endeavor to carry its principles into practice, in the administration of the government."

We then proceeded to the office of the Commissioner of Indian affairs, who gave us a quiet and satisfactory hearing, for a half hour or more. We thought him a fair minded man, who honestly desired to act justly toward the Indians, as far as his authority extended.

Third Month 29th, 1898—"On the twenty-fifth inst. the Meeting for Sufferings met in Philadelphia, on account of the critical state of public affairs between the United States and Spain, in regard to the insurrection in Cuba, it being felt by many members of the Yearly Meeting we should address the Administration and United States Congress in favor of a peaceful settlement of the differences now existing between the two countries."

A memorial was prepared and delegates appointed to present it to President McKinley.

"We obtained an interview with the President, who greeted us politely, requested us to be seated, and expressed his desire to prevent war, and maintain peaceful counsels in dealing with Spain. He thought the proposal he had made, in the early part of this year, to the citizens of the United States, to contribute to a fund of money and provisions to relieve the starving inhabitants of Cuba, would, if liberally responded to, have a conciliatory effect on the Spanish Government. We assured him of the sympathy of our Society in his trying position, and that our prayers were put up to our Father in Heaven for his guidance and help. He expressed himself gratified with our visit, and we left him with feelings of comfort, and an impression that he is sincerely desirous of doing all in his power, under the present public feeling of animosity against Spain for her cruel treatment of the insurgents in Cuba, to avert the breaking out of hostilities. We also saw John Sherman, Secretary of State, who received us kindly, and conversed freely. Copies of the Memorial were given to all the members of the Cabinet."

Fifth Month 14th, 1891—"For the past six months a race-course has been established in the vicinity of Gloucester City, in Camden County, N. J., which has greatly demoralized many of the people of this county, while thousands of people have gone daily, through the past winter, from Philadelphia and Camden to participate in the scenes of racing, gambling and drunkenness. The daily newspapers published the betting and results of races, and finally an effort was made to have a law enacted by the Legislature, repealing the long-standing statutes of New Jersey, prohibiting horse-racing, betting, etc. This seemed to rouse the dormant opposition of the Christian people, and remonstrances were so largely signed and sent to the Assembly, that the committee who had charge of the obnoxious bills did not report them to the House. I felt it my duty to call the Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings together in reference to this subject, and prepared a Remonstrance to the Legislature of New Jersey, which was adopted, and a delegation of members from New Jersey were sent to Trenton with it, who appeared before the House Committee and read and commented on it.

Feeling my mind much exercised at the thought of the enormous evils going on in our community by the racing, &c., at Gloucester, contrary to law, and the supineness of all the legal officials, who should stop such proceedings, I have, under a sense of duty to the cause of Truth and righteousness, exerted myself to confer with and stir up the clergymen, and other good citizens in Camden, to take public action on the subject. For this end I visited the weekly conference of the Methodist Ministers in Camden, and laid the subject before them. They responded by referring it to a special committee, who subsequently invited a conference of other ministers of different denominations, when it was resolved to hold a public meeting, in the court house in Camden.

This was done, and a large and enthusiastic body of citizens assembled, who heartily endorsed the resolutions to form a law and order Society, to combat this and other infractions of the law, especially in reference to illegal liquor-selling.

We have organized, and are now engaged in trying to procure indictments before the grand jury against law-breakers."

1893—"Of late years in considering the disabilities, under which the colored population of Camden County, labor, in regard to conducting business, in comparison with their white fellow-citizens, arising largely from the prejudice of race and color, and also from the centuries of slavery to which their ancestors have been subjected, I have thought we who are of the more favored class should study to do all in our power, to help them rise above this low condition, and fulfil the second commandment of Christ toward them, viz: to love our neighbors as ourselves.

The public schools here, whilst by law open to the African race, do not receive it graciously. Their children cannot fraternize on terms of equality with white children, are liable to imposition from the latter, hence separate schools for the colored pup are instituted, where their numbers will warrant it. I have noticed that in a cold settlement at Sadlertown, in Haddon Township, and west of it, their children were obliged to walk a long distance to the colored school in Haddonfield; and these families have no power of worship within reach of their homes, so some of them seem to live in ignorance and destitution of all Christian instruction. The considerations have induced me to build a storied house at Sadlertown, of which the upper room has been fitted up for meetings and a school, and the lower for a day school, for colored people of that vicinity."

Sixth Month 17th, 1894—"At our Monday Meeting in the Fifth Month last I laid before a joint session of men and women, a sense of religious duty that has been on my mind a year past, to hold some public meeting in Camden County. It was fully united with

Pursuant to this apprehended duty, I held a meeting at Hammonton on the thirteenth of the Fifth Month, in a public hall. There were probably two hundred and fifty persons present and they were very attentive. I felt rapturous in proclaiming the doctrines of the gospel, and exhorting on the great importance of those relating to the Atonement and redemption of the Redeemer, as well as His inward work, by the Holy Spirit in the heart, and the two are inseparable in the conversion and redemption of mankind. There are said to be many persons professing Spiritualism residing in Hammonton, and I suppose some of them were at the meeting. They reject the doctrine of the Atonement, by the outward sacrifice of Christ, as one of them told me there, when they had got beyond that idea. I felt a concern that this class should give up their reasonings on this subject, and accept Christ as little children, seeing He said to the Jews, 'If ye believe not that I am He (the Messiah) ye shall die in your sins, and whither I go ye cannot come.' Fifth Month 27th, I met in the colored people of Haddonfield in the Meeting-house (Baptist), and was exercising the subject of baptism, showing the spiritual nature of saving baptism, agreeably to the Baptist's definition in his conversion with those who came to him for the ordinance. 'I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance, but there cometh One after me. He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire.'

How grateful to Him, who is Omnipotent should I be, for His condescending goodness to such an unworthy creature, (as I feel myself) in guiding and upholding me in these services, so that I have the reward of peace and can say in truth, 'bless the Lord our God, and all that is within me, bless His holy name!'"

CORRECTION.—The last clause of the paragraph in these Selections under date of Mo. 1st, 1888, should read: "To them the tabernacle of God shall be with men, and shall dwell with them and be their God."

(To be concluded.)

fair and lovely it is to behold the sun in its splendor approaching the west, grace is near run, and refulgent as gold slides through the ether as hastening to rest.
 links, but in sinking 'tis only to rise, its splendor and glory afresh to display;
 sets—but in other and far distant skies, rises and reigns with the brightness of day.

far more resplendent than this is the scene of the good man approaching the confines of time;
 loving, all peaceful, all calm and serene,
 he passes away with a brightness sublime.

—but no pencil can ever display the splendor and glory that bursts on his sight, guided by angels he speeds on his way, through the portals of praise to the temple of light.

mas Story, at a meeting in Virginia, where he had been challenged to a dispute by a clergyman of the district, was led into the following beautiful analysis of the Lord's Prayer.

The introduction, or address of that prayer prayers, is to the Almighty, as He is the Father of all—with acknowledgment that his habitation is in Heaven, above all. And the petition is that his name, or by what word the Divine Being is meant, expressed, designed, may be mentioned with reverence awe, as the most holy thing and not blamed, lightly used, profaned, or taken in vain. And the second petition is that his Kingdom, rule, dominion and government, may be made manifest and established over the earth and every soul therein, throughout all generations, as explained by the next words therein, that is to say, 'Thy will be done in earth as it is in Heaven,' which implies the highest degree of perfection and ex-tention human nature is capable of in this world. For, if the will or law of God is to be done in earth as in Heaven, then there can be no more possibility of sin, unrighteousness, evil among the children of men, to the end of the world; for the expression is unlimited, including all persons, ages and times. And the holy angels of God in Heaven, and the spirits of the just made perfect continually forever do the will of God to all perfection, in which also standeth their life eternal.

 We are here taught to pray that it may be the same here on earth. And the petition in this Divine and most perfect prayer regardeth ourselves, with respect to present personal Divine nourishment and sustenance while here on earth and forever, that is, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' the true bread which the Father giveth in Heaven, the bread of life, which giveth unto the world, of which mankind may eat and not die,—the living bread which comes down from Heaven, of which whoever shall eat shall live forever, which is likewise the flesh which Christ giveth for the life of the world, and unto Him whosoever shall come shall not hunger or thirst any more. This is the ever-living and heavenly bread which giveth life unto the world. This is the hidden manna, more excellent than that in the wilderness—the tree of life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God. By the breaking of this bread is the Son of God made manifest unto the world who eateth thereof, to be that meat which endureth unto everlasting life. This is the same heavenly bread which the apostles and primitives loved, desired and prayed for, that they might be continual partakers of it, and which we also have prayed for, do pray for,

 and are mercifully and graciously heard of the Holy One unto whom we do pray. By this bread we grow and increase from stature to stature, and from strength to strength, unto eternal life and everlasting establishment and perfection in glory, in and with Him who liveth and reigneth over all, and in all, and is worthy forevermore.

'The next petition is, 'Forgive our trespasses as we forgive them who trespass against us.' This petition also is suited to general or universal communion. For, as all have sinned and come short of the glory of God, all and every one ought, being convinced of sin by the Holy Spirit, to confess their sins unto Him who convinceth them, and to desire forgiveness,—whether of God, for sins committed against Him, or for trespasses done, one against another. In both cases confession is to be made to the offended, and forgiveness requested, before we can reasonably expect it, whether of God or man. For as to our sins against God, it is said, 'If we confess our sins
 He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness and sin.' And as to our trespasses one against another, it is said, 'If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother,' etc. Or again, 'If thy brother trespass against thee rebuke him, and if he repent, forgive him.'
 And as God is merciful unto all, so He would have us all be merciful one to another, and therefore Christ the Lord commenteth upon this petition in an especial manner, saying,
 'If ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you, but if ye forgive not men their trespasses neither will your heavenly Father forgive your trespasses.' In all which the Lord teacheth us to be like himself, full of goodness, mercy, and social virtue, doing the will of the Father on earth as it is done in Heaven, in a state of restoration, redemption, righteousness and truthfulness, the end whereof is life eternal, which is opposite to a state of sin, in the nature of things, and (b) the end of the coming and manifestation of the Son of God.

The last and concluding part is a just and sincere acknowledgment unto the Father that we can do nothing without Him, but by Him;
 'For his is the Kingdom and the power to enter therein by which alone we can do all these things, and our whole duty unto his holy requirements, whether with respect unto the Lord himself or one toward another as we ought. And therefore, as we have no power or sufficiency of our own, no glory or praise belongeth unto us for the work required and wrought, either during our conduct and abode in this world, or in the world to come. And so this matter rested without reply.'

'ONE of the first steps to ruin is keeping bad company.'

'STAND in awe and sin not; commune with your own heart upon your bed and be still.'

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Word from Pasadena.

(On the Russian "Quakers.")

It being reported that there was a colony of Russian Quakers lately come to Los Angeles, Cal., several Friends of Pasadena felt inclined to visit them and ascertain what sort of people they were, but on going had some difficulty in ascertaining where they were located, but by persevering inquiry at different places they at length found an educated Russian teacher in a school building in the suburbs of the city, who seemed very glad that any should feel so much interest in his countrymen, who, he signified, had fled for their lives from a land of oppression. He could only leave his duties in the school for a brief interview, but he informed them that about twenty-five families had come and more were on the way. He said the men were away to work through the week, and it was only on First-days that he had the opportunity to teach them the English language, but if Friends would fix the time to come on the afternoon of that day of the week they could see the strangers and he would then be at liberty to answer their questions and interpret for them if they wished. An arrangement was made accordingly to meet him on the fifth of the present month.

A number of Friends fully intended to go, but the extraordinary storm and great fall of water about that time discouraged them from going, and the visit was deferred for one week, when a company of eleven went by trolley and spent perhaps two hours with a collection of these people, much of which time was occupied with their worship, which mostly consisted of Scripture reading, singing and praying, and was performed with the appearance of great sincerity and tenderness of heart. A part of their intercessions may have been for those they left behind, as they are very warmly attached to each other. A young man who happened to be present at the time of a fresh arrival, says it was the most joyful meeting he ever witnessed.

It not being the day first arranged for may have been the reason that the teacher before met with was not there, and the person who officiated as interpreter not being very well qualified made it difficult to obtain all the information desired—the time too, being short after their meeting was over.

Their home in Russia was in the Caucasus country, and the occasion of their fleeing just now was on account of the war, expecting they would be pressed into the army, and knowing the sufferings of their ancestors who refused to comply with military requirements and were most cruelly put to death. Their peace principles, and not thinking it right to resent injuries under any circumstances are the principal features of their religion peculiar to Friends, so far as we know. They think if the Almighty wanted to destroy any people He was able to do it himself, and instanced the flood in ancient time and the destruction of Hierosolymum and Pompeii as well as earthquakes that have been. They asked whether we believed all that is recorded in the Scriptures concerning Jesus Christ, and said that they noticed it.

We believed that the simple dress of our friends and their not wearing jewelry and even the plain arrangement of their hair attracted their attention, and they expressed their gladness to meet with a people who felt about such things. When asked about the Doukhobors, they seemed to be strangers to them, and said they were another people.

While writing this little account and considering how very unacquainted these people are with our principles, it has seemed to the writer very desirable to have some tracts in Russian language to offer them, particularly something concerning Divine revelation.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

THE PILGRIM'S WANTS.

I want that adorning divine,

That shall my God, content bestow;
I want those beautiful garments to shine,
Which distinguish thy household below.

Col. iii: 12-14. Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering; forbearing and forgiving one another, even as Christ forgave you.

And above all these things so also do ye put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness.

I want, Oh I want to attain

Some likeness, my Saviour, to thee;
That longed-for resemblance once more to regain Thy comeliness put upon me.

1 John iii: 2. Beloved, now are ye the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is.

I want to be marked for thine own,

Thy seal on my forehead to wear;
To receive that new name on the mystic white stone,
Which only thyself can declare.

Rev. ii: 17. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it.

I want every moment to feel

That the spirit does dwell in my heart;
That his power is present to cleanse and to heal,
And newness of life to impart.

Romans viii: 11. But if the spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you.

I want so in Thee to abide,

As to bring forth some fruit to Thy praise,
The branch which Thou prunest, tho' feeble and dried,
May languish, but never decay.

St. John xv: 2-5. Every branch in me that beareth fruit He taketh away, and every branch that beareth fruit He purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit.

I want thee own hand to unbind

Each tie to terrestrial things, Too tenderly cherished, too closely entwined,
Where my heart too tenaciously clings.

1 John ii: 15. Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.

I want by my aspect serene,

My actions and words to declare,
That my treasure is placed in a country unseen,
That my heart and affections are there.

Matt. vi: 19. Lay not up for yourselves treasure upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal.
For where your treasure is there will your heart be also.

I want as a traveler to haste

Straight forward, nor pause by the way,
No forethought nor anxious contrivance to waste
On the tent only fixed for the day.

Heb. xiii: 5. Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be ye content with such things as ye have: for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.

I want; and this sums up my prayer,

To glorify thee till I die,
Then calmly to yield up my soul to thy care,
And breathe out in prayer my last sigh.

Phil. iii: 8, 9. Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In their report to the Yearly Meeting 1853, they thus mention another subject affecting the welfare of the Indians.

"Another railroad (the Allegheny and Great Western) is now being made through the Allegheny Reservation with two depots on the Indians' land. The effects of these changes are unfavorable to the improvement of the native character. They bring among them a description of white people whose morals are depraved, and whose habits and influence tend to spread the corruption with which they themselves are tainted; and thus counteract the labors of Friends for meliorating the condition and elevating the moral standing of the Indians. In whatever aspect we view the condition of these oppressed and injured people, it is calculated to waken feelings of deep sympathy and commiseration, and calls for the continued efficient aid of Friends, in shielding them from the evils with which they are threatened, and affording them that disinterested assistance and counsel which so few are willing to accord; and above all, in endeavoring to impart to them a knowledge of those Christian principles which form the basis of all moral excellence, as well as of solid comfort in this life; and open to the mind the animating hope of a state of unalloyed felicity in the world to come."

During the Autumn of 1853 the neighborhood of Tunesassa, was visited by a serious sickness, in the course of which a considerable number of the Indians died. On the 15th of Eleventh Month 1853, Susan L. Wood was also removed by death. In consequence of this event the school was discontinued, and the children were returned to their parents. In their report to the Yearly Meeting in 1854 the Committee remark in reference to the loss thus sustained "she was a faithful and efficient helper in the important service entrusted to us by the Yearly Meeting, and while we deeply feel her loss we are comforted in believing that having been earnestly engaged in doing her work in the daytime, she has been mercifully gathered among those who rest from their labors, and whose works do follow them." They add,

"Our friend Mary Elkinton, whose continued interest in the cause, which has so long engaged her attention, and whose experience well qualified her for the service, having offered her assistance in preparing for a crease of boarders, was there at this time was attacked with the prevailing fever.

several weeks illness, she so far recovered to be removed to her own home, and the health of the neighborhood being restored, at a favorable time the school was again opened under the care of a Friend, who offered to take the care of it temporarily, which was very acceptable to the Committee. The Friend here alluded to, Sarah Elkinton, (afterwards Sarah E. S.) remained at Tunesassa for several months.

In the Sixth Month, 1854, John Wood expressed his desire to withdraw from the care of the concern at Tunesassa, at the close of the school term, and in the Ninth Month of the year, the services of Samuel and Rachel son, members of Sadsbury Monthly Meeting, which they had offered to the Committee, were accepted. These Friends accompanied some of their daughters, arrived at Tunesassa the 5th of Tenth Month, 1854. Joel and Ebenezer Worth visited the Reservation at this time, and introduced them to the Reservation.

In the Third Month, 1855, Sarah Elkinton returned to Tunesassa, and took charge of the school. At this time the number of children taken as boarders had increased, and the number made to the Yearly Meeting this year that as many as seventeen boarders, and of twenty-eight or thirty children had been attending the school more or less regularly, and that "they all seem to be as happy and readily controlled as the children of white parents separated from their parents."

They also say "one of the Committee spent several weeks at the settlement in the past winter and spring, remarks in a letter that "I have been comforted and encouraged in believing, that our small, silent meeting, which has been owned by the Great Head of the Church, and that the countenances of the little ones, at times give evidence that they are prepared to feel something of it." This report contains the following paragraph "From the opportunity afforded for judging of the condition of the Boarding School, we are of the judgment, that if it can be properly supported, suitable caretakers and teachers, it will be of more permanent benefit to the children than any other plan which has been tried. It is chiefly upon the youthfulness that we can hope to make a profitable and lasting impression; and this is much more likely to be accomplished when the children are withdrawn from the improper and hurtful influences to which they are exposed among their own people. Many of the Indians seem to appreciate the advantages their children receive under the care of Friends, and are anxious to have them placed at the school; so that we had the means and sufficient help, the number of pupils might be much increased."

In the Third Month, 1856, Thomazine, and Caroline Hogeland went to Tunesassa, to assist in carrying out the work of the Friends there, and the labors of the two were afterwards extended towards the Reservation generally, so as to encourage and instruct them in the habits of housekeeping, and the care of families. In the prosecution of her ser-

A Visit to Porto Rico.

Mayaguez, First Month 17th, 1905.—One becomes accustomed to things in this country which would seem almost impossible; for instance, as I sit here in my room by my dressing stand I have as spectator a lizard, with head erect, less than three feet from my head, hanging to the curtain, and it does not try to budge. We are feeling more at home now and are making comfortable acquaintances and seem to be making progress.

We are in the very strongholds of "spiritualism," as professed by an intelligent class of people. Dr. Matiero Cuitron, of Ponce, of whom I have written, we learn since coming here, has published an article since the conference, which we hope to secure, admitting truths which have caused his fellow-laborers to become replete; this Dr. M.—is his reader, in fact, so far as we can learn, about the head man of the island. W. C. A. seems particularly led towards them; last evening, at appointment, we went to their place of worship, in the rear of the residence of their pastor, and we had a talk with three or four of the prominent people of their society; they pressed themselves as fully uniting with our booklet giving briefly some of Friends' views, though later spoke regarding some of their own peculiarities, mediums, seances and at spirits did not suffer eternally, that there is a steady progression or professing to live by the Bible, though it was not difficult to compound questions which they could not answer. They seem to want to be rightly led, and least were eager to learn our views on worship, and admired the lack of form and plain manners. We both earnestly crave at some good at least may result from this visit. We may have a meeting with them in a few days.

This forenoon we have visited the Industrial school. It is to be moved to the military barracks which have been vacated, and which will be better used to train the minds and muscles of the Borinquins (Porto Ricans), and to harbor the bearers of the sword.

The military strength of the island has been much reduced; the people are rather an offensive class, as might be supposed when twenty-five per cent. of them are said to beemic. I think it is thymol that kills the parasite which causes the trouble, and if people live more careful lives, there should be a wonderful improvement in the health of the islanders.

We looked in yesterday afternoon upon a chocolate mill, a small affair, which appears to be about the only manufacturing concern in the city. So the commerce here is slight coffee is the important crop, and since the American occupation, the prices have fallen very much. Consequently there is a great deal of poverty, both in city and country, even though there are so many fruits and vegetables hanging and growing on all sides in great profusion. The better class need to learn at labor is ennobling and not degrading; the women live such an idle, listless sort of life, and the peons are apt to give up a chance of regular employment if they receive their weekly wage in a lump—they don't seem able to bear prosperity.

First-day had been pretty full, with two meetings, so yesterday afternoon we went down to the seaside and took a few hours of leisure. Our pictures of "a study in bronze" and the "one mule tram car" should show something unique; also hauling in the net by fishermen. We arranged this morning with the "Alcalde" (Mayor) for the theatre on First-day next at 8 P. M. It is the place in this country where rich and poor will congregate. The color lines do not seem to figure greatly down here, though within the last few years people are giving more attention to them. Imagine the feelings of two refined American girls going out into a country school district and find their principal a big black man. Indeed the self-sacrifice of some of our people is striking; with the young woman teachers there is doubtless in many a desire for adventure and travel; with the wives of missionaries in isolated fields, surrounded by people speaking another tongue, and their husbands much of the time in their saddles, there is place for much sympathy. All these people seem glad to see us, and many of them are so helpful in assisting us in our work, though not a few natives are very responsive.

Sixth-day, P. M.—I guess our blood is thinning, and we are falling into line with southern ways; it is almost necessary to take a nooning, even then we are tired enough by night.

Things are so very different down here from homeways, that we sometimes wonder that progress is being made with even any rate; in the matter of interpreters we have had a great problem, particularly here, as I mentioned in my last, so many things to consider on both sides—religion, politics, society, and on the other side, I need not state our view-points. Carlos Laughler, seems finally, after days of work, to be our man, and we feel comfortable in it.

Fourth-day morning we walked out to the Experiment Station, which is under our National Department of Agriculture; it receives the usual fifteen thousand dollars yearly national grant, has intelligent Americans at the head, and interesting experiments are being carried on with oranges, pineapples, cotton, tea, root and fibre crops, &c., different kinds of cultivation, fertilization, and such other work as might be expected at a place of this kind. I was interested in the "green" house, so called—slat sides and slat roofs, but the latter were covered with brick, admitting no light, of course—glass too costly; results apparently very poor. Bamboos cut in sections were used as pots. They have gotten some Hereford stock lately. Work cattle and beef seem to be what these people are after at present, though the men at the station admitted that dairy cattle were needed, but funds were not sufficient.

We have been among the schools this week, though no religious teaching is allowed therein—I. e., the public schools. In the Presbyterian mission school, visited this morning, they do have it, and seemed to appreciate the visit, and W. C. A. had considerable for the encouragement of the children, which are from the best families of the city. It is a pay school, about eighty children, and they do not begin to be able to take all who apply.

We have learned of some of the old Spanish customs in teaching; there is surely a great change which has resulted in the present efficient system now prevailing in the schools in general, though there are difficulties to be met, as might be expected; the natives don't like so many new notions. The school directors, three in a district, are political appointments, and the incumbents as a rule do not know any too much about what is needed in teachers whose politics have much to do with appointment.

Yesterday morning we attended the clinic at the Presbyterian mission hospital. The poor people come in to be healed of their varied maladies by the mission doctor, and religious exercises are conducted while they are there. The father of the doctor fills the prescriptions; he is a godly man, a sort of missionary, and with the medicines gives out tracts, testaments, &c. We left him quite a package. The doctor has other points where he visits, and is a good, conscientious, hard-worked man, and his services are greatly appreciated by peons particularly, who if able, pay perhaps ten cents for the medicine. Anemia is the most prevalent disease. Thymol in heroic doses is given to kill the parasites, which lodge in the intestines. How grateful are the people when cured! and all the more ready to receive the gospel. In San German, the priests have opposed the doctor, which has resulted in greatly increasing the number of patients when on that round.

Conditions here are enough to make one of a sympathizing nature heartsick, though I don't want to be a pessimist. We have seen enough of the island to form some ideas for ourselves, though I cannot undertake to dilate here. Not a few people here and near here are paying the extortioners thirty per cent. on mortgages, and if they cannot pay up by a given time, the holders of the mortgage take the property—this on what we would consider good security. A sad case in point was narrated yesterday by Chief Missionary Caldwell. Many coffee groves are not worked at all, and as this is the chief industry here and hereabouts, the degree of poverty is something awful. Our poor people are rich in comparison. It is a life and death struggle for existence with many for nine months of the year. What is needed is encouragement of thrifty foreigners to come here to show the natives some modern ideas, as the American occupation found things hundreds of years behind time. Politicians seem to rule, and laws do not seem to favor foreign capital to find investment. People having in them the love of Christ and the gospel have a wonderful field if they come rightly qualified, but northerners have much to consider before investing here.

Yesterday afternoon we went by coach to San German, about sixteen miles distant; we made it in an hour and twenty minutes—the drivers are so cruel. Arrived there, I went to Supt. Foucaud, whom we met at the conference of school superintendents in Ponce; we recognized each other, and he assisted us all that he could. The Van Dykes, (the wife was a "Coamo") were very helpful. We had seen the missionary James R. Woods in San Juan and had a letter from him to his wife granting the building. So advertising was promptly under way; notice given vocally in places. Had our own difficulties about translation, and a meeting shortly after seven — about one hundred and fifty perhaps, near half of whom were outside. The interpreter for W. C. A. was an American, who is a good-hearted fellow, and I think the service was largely for him and the English people there. His wife told me after meeting, that if we would come more, she thought her husband would learn to pray. It was exercising for him to interpret a supplication to the throne of grace.

We started home about 8.30. Our driver almost seemed "possessed," though not with wine, lashing the poor brutes, who had to go at their very top speed. I stood it as long as I could, then grabbed his hand and arm, and we understood each other. He put up his whip awhile, but after while was at it as had as ever, up and down hill. We were favored to reach here with no bones broken; one horse had fallen prostrate on some freshly dumped stones, but had to go on. It was a beautiful night, cool and pleasant. The moon almost directly overhead shone in grandeur on this tropical country, the harsh lines of poverty being mellowed by its kindly rays; and were it not for our fierce driving and cruelty, one would have enjoyed the ride greatly.

We had arranged to have our mail delivered here, and by the time it was read it was rather late; and when I went to my room my menagerie was in full swing. In addition to the other specimens formerly observed, though more numerous, I had a huge spider. I do not remember ever having seen one so large.

We (he and I) had a slipper battle; the last I saw of him, I didn't see him, for he had taken refuge under one of my coats. His longest spread was, I judge, three and a half inches. I hope to be asleep to-night before he makes appearance. We have been cared for thus far, and have no cause to fear if we strive to keep in our right places. Now for the afternoon and evening labors, not a little of which is in an individual nature. William Allen's kindly talks seem often like sermons, and the effect, we can but trust, will be for their up-building.

Seventh-day, 1.05 p. m. — Just through breakfast, I will chat a little more while resting, or, in other words, keeping away from the broiling sun. It is only 81° in my room. If a body could only take off coat and roll up sleeves there would be real comfort. I think I could endure it, sun and all, but much depends on keeping our bodies in fair trim, and we do try to be careful.

We had an interesting interview last evening, through an interpreter, with the man who has charge of the municipal library. It did us good to observe the interest taken when the kind of literature we had was explained. The children are more and more understanding English, and there are very few English books. So, with the interest shown, high character (comparatively speaking) of librarianship, it is perhaps the best place we have found for planting a goodly number of books. We could dispose of hundreds of Dymond's Essays. One school superintendent wanted sixty. There is something about Friends' simple ways and manner of worship which seems to appeal to these people, and we are surely treated with the most kindness by the people with whom we become acquainted.

This morning we dropped into the market for a little while. Oranges are delicious. We have them twice a day, four to eight for one cent, etc. Plantains and bananas are very cheap. It might be thought that the people could live all right with things so cheap, but with large families and the very few cents in their possession, not much can be bought, and with a fruit diet so much must be eaten to sustain life. The children are very apt to have protruding or "banana" stomachs, caused by eating so much that lacks real nutrition.

This afternoon is rather a time of waiting (though meetings have averaged just about one every other day, a little more, besides much other work since landing), and we propose hiring two bicycles and taking a run out into the country, largely for needed active, physical exercise. Prior to this I must go down to Plaza (seaside) and see about lamps for the theatre building for to-morrow night. The electric light company's agent wants $6 for lights alone (one and a half hours), because we are foreigners, and possibly because not Catholics, and we hope to cope with him.

Second-day morning, First Month 23rd. — Well, the lamps were secured, and we have not felt badly in getting ahead of the people who manufacture light currents. We had arranged to go down to the Presbyterian Mission Sabbath-school, near the Plaza, at 9.30. I went myself and talked somewhat to the children. Between sixty and seventy of them are said to be the worst boys in the city. My friend was rested by evening and able to go to the theatre. It was raining hard part of the time, and these people seem afraid of getting wet, so that there were probably not over one hundred and fifty people, all told, in the house. The silence, both here and at the Theatre, was impressive, the people being asked to spend some time in silent prayer. In the meeting last evening W. C. A. directed the people to the Saviour, dwelt on the advantages of Christian living, the offices of our Saviour, the need of prayer and individual saving knowledge of Christ. Our interpreter was satisfactory, and the people at least for the most part seemed satisfied. Some think it strange that we have no music.

I thought, perhaps, the most important part of the service was after the regular meeting was dismissed. A group of Spiritualists, apparently the leaders, stood waiting to object to some parts of the sermon, regarding Christ as son of a man, and that we are all sons of God, etc., and seeming to be in a mood for disputing. Here was philosophy and intelligence, and William Allen was wonderfully favored powerfully to answer their objections and arguments so that they could answer not a word. It was, indeed, striking. I trust we are duly thankful for the favor. These people had asked for a meeting in their "temple" (though a plain affair). We expect to know soon whether after last night's experience they still want it. W. C. A. feels willing now to look towards no more meetings here, though would meet this special class again if they ask it.

More than the rain militated against a large attendance last night. There was a ball in the Spanish Casino, also one in the Porto Rican Casino, in honor of the King of Spain's birthday, which occurs to-day. Then, too, the carnival season is commencing. Yesterday was the first I saw of it, something about celebrating in honor of the patron saint of the city. I was told yesterday that the superstitious people thought that the typhoid epidemic last year was caused by their not celebrating sufficiently, and that they hope the Virgin to treat them better this time by their making much of the event. Sad, is it not? Yes, day people were on the streets, plaza, dressed as clowns and making ridiculous noise and gestures, and this morning early we were awakened by a troupe of musicians out on street. I must admit this was beautiful music, Spanish, I suppose. It is now our prospect to-morrow to Aquadilla, and on Fourth to San Sebastian, Fifth-day Arecibo, reach Juan by Sixth-day evening or Seventh-day, want considerable time there before embarking for Barbados.

P. M. — We will probably go down to Carlo Etlan's this evening, a Spiritualist, though do not expect to have an appointed meeting. Our interpreter is to dine with us here. It now seems short here, and we are finishing writing ready to mail this evening so we get off comfortably in the morning.

SHALL not we who are parents, endeavor to see in the light which deceiveth not, how in our own families, as well as in the church?

And is it not for us to labor with our children, to bring them to a just sense of the necessity of taking up their daily crosses, to give them a crown of everlasting righteousness and joy; and if indeed they were owned by the Saviour upon earth, as his people, I often fear lest I should not say, in the language of example, "Follow ye me, I will follow Christ;" yet it is my earnest desire, hear about in this body the dying of the old Jesus, that his blessed life may also be manifested in my mortal flesh. Nothing we do after all our speculations, but a dying to and living that life, of which an eminent Christian speaks, "I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." If we are without this knowledge of the great work of regeneration, it will nevertheless manifest itself through other, to the true church must take the place of old false, and all that appertains to "Myra Babylon" must fall as certainly as God is true, righteous, and just. My heart feels interested in those I have long loved, that they may be found walking worthy of the high vocation wherewith we are called." — S. L. Grubb

The classics are found on forgotten shelves. Homer is no longer sung in the streets. Aristotle and Plato, Seneca and Bacon are known only to the student. But more than more does the Bible enter into the life of the race. Its copies are multiplied. Its power over man increases. The world is being subdued by its message. Humanity finds alone that which satisfies every need. Childhood and old age alike find comfort in its pages. It is of the great uplifting force of the world. It is of the everlasting voice of God upon earth. — Justice David J. Brewer.

So that man may be blest,
To give the gift that is best,
Rather to reach than to preach, d labors in this direction, continued at rvals for many years, Thomazine Valentine me widely known throughout the Reserva-a, and her influence which is known to have y very useful, was much appreciated by the mittee.

In the report to the Yearly Meeting in 1856, Committee introduced a portion of a let-which they had received from some of the cipal Indians on the Allegheny Reservas, as follows:—"We are glad that we are mitted to meet together to-day. We wish peak a few words to our old friends the kers. Many years ago some of our old fa, Complanter and others visited President hington. After some conversation they ired of him whether he had any good hon-people whom he could recommend as being able to help and instruct the Indians. He e had, that he could recommend the kers. Since that day the Quakers have e friends to the Indians. They have always us good advice and done much to help
e. We wish you may not get discouraged, continue to assist us and advise our people.
We feel thankful for your advice and wish ake it. We desire to do what we can to urage our young people to habits of in-ury; to clear up their land and farm it, and discourage all habits of immorality, which believe would be a disadvantage to our le. We often speak to our people on the ect of intemperance, and discourage the of intoxicating drink amongst them and e been trying to keep the article from our ration."

The Committee also referred in this report the drain upon their resources caused by staining the Boarding School, and suggesthe propriety of opening voluntary subsitions among our members in aid of this valent object. This was approved by the rly Meeting and the report of the Com-tee and the minute of the Yearly Meeting the subject were printed and circulated:
early four thousand dollars were received he Committee in response to this appeal.
1856 Henry Battin, Jr., spent some months nessassa as helper on this farm, and during same year Rebecca Conard, of Chester ty, succeeded Sarah Elkinton in the care he children. In the early part of 1857 H. Blackburn offered his services to the mittee, which were accepted, and after a of a few months he was left in principal of the Institution by the return of uel and Rachel Whitson to their homes the 1st of Eleventh Month, 1857.

Robert Scotten spent several months with Friends at Tunesassa, during this autumn the winter of 1857 and 1858, assisting in management of the mill and in the general ern for the welfare of the Indians.

In the Fifth Month, 1858 Reuben Battin and wife, members of Nuncy Monthly Meeting, ding at Elklands, whose services had been ted to the Committee, arrived at Tunesassa.
took charge of the farm and household the school at this time having been orarily suspended.

REAL LIFE.—If thou wouldst have an unction from the Holy One,—Sink to the level of a babe in wisdom.

If thou wouldst have him work mightily in thee,—Cease from thine own doings.

If thou wouldst hear him speak to thee—Be silent.

If thou wouldst have him lead thee—Forsake thine own desires.

If thou wouldst have him control thee—Be slow to speak.

If thou wouldst catch his whispers—Shut thine ears to other sounds.

If thou wouldst have him change thee in to his likeness—Hold thyself at all times peacefully in his presence.

If thou wouldst have him be all to thee—
Sink into nothingness before him.

In short:—If thou wouldst have the inner temple of thy being filled with God—Go out of it thyself, and abandon it to him.—*South African

Items Concerning the Society.

Recent letters describe the voyage of Wm. C.
Allen and Wm. B. Harvey from Porto Rico to the island of Barbados, where they are probably still laboring.

Haverford Monthly Meeting at its last session adopted a minute on the conditions of vice and corruption in the city of Philadelphia. It appealed to the mayor to use all his power to rescue the city from the evils which now prevail in it and which have given it an unenviable reputation.

On account of the reported conditions of vice in portions of the city, a special session of the Philadelphia Meeting for Sufferings was held on last Seventh-day, Second Month 25th. A feeling spread over the meeting that there was a distinct service for Friends towards the Mayor in this matter, a service which had not been occupied by representatives of religious bodies.

Four members were deputed to address the Mayor in such mode as might seem best open to them for his encouragement to discharge the solemn responsibilities resting upon him, and for his strengthening unto a holy purpose to suppress vice and corruption.

It seemed best to the committee, on conferring together, to proceed immediately to the City Hall and ascertain when an interview would be acceptable to him. The time proved opportune. The Mayor was free at once to grant to representatives of Friends an interview, during the course of which they felt fully cleared of the service resting upon them at the time, but the details thereof are properly not for publicity. They received from him assurances of the uplifting effect of their spiritual engagement for and with him, and an acknowledgment that if other representatives of religion had met him in the spirit manifested by the Friends, his heart would have been better strengthened for such cooperation as lay within his power.

Notes in General.

Bunkio Mateuki, in an address said, a better understanding by the respective peoples of both Shintoism and Christianity would result in mutual advantage.

"O," said a godly man almost in despair, "how little can a church do when a bronze or marble statue is in the pulpit, even though its phonograph attachment is the best in the city!"

"We have the finest set of laws to punish crime in the world, but they are not observed. If public opinion does not support the punishment, the only way to remedy affairs is to prevent crime," said Mackay Smith last week.

The Sultan of Turkey, under pressure, has renewed his permission of Bible colporter work, but has forbidden such labors in the European provinces and Anatolia, the very places in which the colporters have been chiefly engaged.

Among the quotations from The Heart of Asbury's Journal is the following: "I have served the Church upward of twenty-five years in Europe and America. All the property I have gained is two, six or eight horses, the constant companions of my tail, six if not seven thousand miles every year."

"Not until the Church," says the Churchman, but we would say, not until the Spirit of Christ "shapes the ideals of men in society, in the nation and the world, will it be possible for her to impart the controlling principle of the gospel—the love that binds men in the corporate life of the family of God.

THE WOMEN'S MEETING.—The Episcopal Convention of California has adopted a canon creating a House of Churchwomen, whose duties and powers are "to legislate for the conduct of woman's work in the Church." This is the first diocese in the United States to create a woman's convention, and the experiment will be observed by the Anglican communion with great interest.

The Record (London), says: "Public feeling against the retention of Episcopal houses superfluous in size and ostentatious in title grows stronger." Much regret is felt at the decision of the bishop-designate of Worcester to live at Hartlebury Castle after Bishop Gore prepared the way for a break with the past, by resolutely refusing to live there.

Esther Malthie, for many years the head of the girls' boarding school at Samokov, in Bulgaria, is now in this country. In speaking of the people of Bulgaria, she says that if they were truly Christianized it would be a help to all southeastern Europe. These people listen in large numbers to simple gospel preaching. Esther Malthie considers the people of Bulgaria much superior to their neighbors in ability and strength of character.

Nehemiah Boynton and Professor Day of Andover have just completed a visitation to the colleges and universities in Illinois, in which they have laid before the students the claims of the ministry. The audiences aggregated over 4000 students, who gave careful attention to the speakers as they magnified the ministry as "the unappreciated, the unequaled, the indispensable profession."

In Speaking of the great Welsh revival, G.
Campbell Morgan asks: "What shall we do in the presence of this great movement? Imitate it?
And his reply is, "Imitation will be fatal. Let no man come back and attempt to start anywhere in London meetings on the lines of those held in Wales, and for this simple reason, that no man started them there. If somewhere here there should break out some great manifestation such as this, then God grant we be ready to fall in line.
You cannot imitate this kind of thing. What shall we do? If we cannot imitate, we can discover the principles. What are they? Let us listen for the Spirit, confess Christ, be absolutely at his disposal."

"Let the Spirit control us," adds another, "act on his promptings, and the revival is begun."
At one of the meetings which he attended at Cardiff G. Campbell Morgan stood for three solid hours wedged so that he could not lift his hands.
He says, "It was a wonderful sight, utterly without order, characterized from first to last by the orderliness of the Spirit of God." "I do not reconcile these things." "They are both there." "I have never seen any thing like it in my life." "There was no human leader."

THE CHINESE ALPHABET AND JAPAN.—A Catholic missionary in Japan, who has lately written in the Illustrated Catholic Missions a series of articles on Osaka, refers thus to the written characters whose use there is a tendency at present to discontinue:

"A great difficulty to be met in Japanese education is the employment of Chinese characters; it is one which the student finds hard to overcome. It takes ten years of study with four or five hours of work a day to learn the characters which are in common use in daily life. This fact places the Japanese student far behind the young college man of the West.

"A university course in Japan can scarcely be completed before the age of thirty. It is useless to give way to these regrets, however. Owing to Buddhism, Chinese characters have become an integral part of the Japanese literary language. And, indeed they render a certain service which may explain the fondness of the nation for them. They give a key to the language a precision which is lacking in Europe. As years are devoted to committing them to memory, the faculty is developed to a marvellous degree. The study of them constitutes an excellent mental gymnastic for the finding of different ways to express the same idea; it is a good training for oratory, and in this department the Japanese show themselves the equal of the people of the West. If they do not excel in depth of thought, they are more proficient in the use of words.

"Finally the Chinese characters have contributed not a little to give the Japanese that finesse in little things which they possess, that quickness in grasping all sides of a question as soon as presented, keenness in detecting the slightest flaw in an argument, as well as their marvellous ability to observe the smallest details of an object, an ability which has enabled them to put forth masterpieces of miniature art.

"However, let it be understood, it is not necessary to know the Chinese characters in order to live in Japan. They are written only, and not spoken. The spoken language, the language of the people, is easily learned, very sonorous and harmonious. In fact, after a year's residence missionaries speak, preach and hear confessions in Japanese."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Fire involving a loss estimated at five millions of dollars, and a serious blow at the immense export trade of New Orleans, has occurred in that city and destroyed the vast freight terminals of the Illinois Central, known as the Stuyvesant Docks. Nearly a dozen squares of modern wharves and freight sheds, two grain elevators, hundreds of loaded cars and vast quantities of freight, including 20,000 bales of cotton, was destroyed, together with a large number of small residences.

In a recent address in Philadelphia President Roosevelt strongly advocated a powerful navy, basing his appeal on the possession of the Philippines by the United States, the building of the Isthmian Canal, and the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine. Ex-Secretary Long, at one time chief of the Navy Department, has questioned the wisdom of this course, stating that "by that very fact we shall seek complications with foreign Powers which we should not seek if we did not have a large navy," and also: "We have something like fourteen-a very good battleships and cruisers. There are also under construction twenty-four battleships and armed cruisers, which will be built in the next few years. We shall then have thirty-eight battleships and cruisers, and we have not to-day men and officers enough to man these ships."

A despatch from Washington of the 23rd ult. says: Paper money will carry disease germs for one month, metal money will carry such germs only twenty-four hours, according to the conclusion of Dr. Thomas Darlington, president of the New York City Board of Health, who has been experimenting with bacteria on money, and who presented the result to-day to the House Committee on Banking and Currency. The germs of only two diseases have been experimented with—consumption and diphtheria—and both of these may be communicated from one person to another on money. Dr. Darlington presented the conclusions of the Advisory Committee to the Board of Health of the city of New York in the interest of public health that soiled bills be withdrawn from circulation as soon as practicable."

A recent election for magistrates and other city officials in Philadelphia resulted in the election of Republican candidates by majorities ranging from 25,000 to 150,000. Charges are made that probably 40,000 votes were fraudulent.

A recovery from lockjaw by the use of an antitoxin serum in a case treated in a hospital in Bridgeton, N. J., is reported as greatly interesting medical men in that neighborhood.

By a recent carrying-in of timbers in the Virginia mines located near Birmingham, Ala., over one hundred men are reported to have been entombed, and one hundred families and three hundred children left destitute.

It is reported that 4,000 laborers are now at work in different parts of the proposed canal across the isthmus of Panama, and that substantial progress has been made. The engineering of the canal was approved last year by the Isthmian Canal Commission. They recommended a sea-level canal, with a width at the bottom of 150 feet, and a minimum depth of water of 35 feet. The total estimated cost is $280,500,000, and the length of time required to complete it from ten to twelve years.

Pathological studies conducted on the Great White Hospital Laboratory of the University of Buffalo, under the patronage of the State of New York, have proved cancer to be a parasitic disease, infectious in type; that it has been transplanted and reproduced in perfectly healthy animals; that the reproduction has been true cancer as it exists in the human, and that the disease in animals has been cured by the administration of a serum which is prepared in the Buffalo laboratory.

An apparatus is said to have been perfected by Jacob Reese, of Sharon Hill, Pa., by which the deaf and dumb can communicate by the aid of electrical currents. Such persons are to put on their thumbs and forefingers (thumbs, such as are ordinarily used) by means of wires. These wires are connected with positive and negative wires to a battery, and by using the Morse code in striking the fingers together they can talk together as rapidly, directly and accurately as they could telegraph a message.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 24th says: There is a partial suspension of railway traffic throughout the empire. At the same time there is a reign of terror at Batoum and Poti, there is a recurrence of the strikes in South Russia and Poland, and there is a renewed strike of 40,000 workmen in St. Petersburg, mostly belonging to well-paid government establishments. The situation generally in the south of Russia is becoming worse instead of better, and contains many factors which are causing the authorities the greatest alarm. Another factor that is causing grave concern is the actual difficulty of transporting enough commissary supplies for feeding the army at the front.

Another account says: Telegrams, from almost every part of Russia, tend to show that the labor movement and political disturbances have become epidemic throughout the empire.

The country between the Black Sea and the Caspian is reported to be in open revolt. Desperate fighting has been reported from Manchuria.

A decision in the controversy between Great Britain and Russia, arising from the firing on the fishing fleet, was made last night at Geneva at 12 o'clock by the Russian Squadron, commanded by Vice Admiral Rejzovsky, has been officially announced by the International Commission of Inquiry, which sat at Paris. The commissioners found that the fishing fleet made no hostile demonstration, and a majority of them that there were no reports of any political disturbances in Batoum, and that the opening of fire by Rejzovsky was not justified. The British press welcomes the report of the International Commission of Inquiry with almost unqualified satisfaction.

It is stated that a telegram by the wireless method was transmitted recently from the Marconi company's station at Azio, Corvallo, in England, to a station belonging to the Italian navy at Ancona, Italy. This route is almost entirely overland, the distance being about 1,000 miles. To reach their destination, the waves passed over France and part of Italy, including some of the highest mountains of the Alps.

A despatch from Brig, Switzerland, of the 24th ult. says: The Swiss Signal Corps at Brig, Switzerland, was completed at 7:30 o'clock this morning. The work was commenced in 1858. The meeting of the two boring parties (Swiss and Italian) was signaled throughout Switzerland by ringing of bells and salutes by cannon. Many unexpected obstacles were encountered, the most serious being hot springs, which threatened to wreck the enterprise, and a temperature, which at one time rose to 131 degrees Fahrenheit, making a continuation of work impossible until the engineers found means of drying the atmosphere. The work of preparing the tunnel for a permanent way is to be pushed as rapidly as possible, and it is hoped to inaugurate the tunnel about the 20th. Its length is about 124 miles.

The Coronia, the largest steaming belonger to Cunard Line, was scheduled to sail for New York on the 26th of this month for New York. Three vessels (belonging to the White Star Line) are said to exceed in size. Her length is 675 feet over all, and her tonnage 21,000.

The crater of Kilian, in the Sandwich Islands, became active Second Month 21st, is now reported as showing the greatest activity that it has exhibited since 1838.

Westtown Boarding School.—For conveniences of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage most trains leaving Philadelphia 7:16 A.M. and 8:18 A.M. and 8:48 and 4:32 P.M. Other trains are met who report Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7:30 P.M., twenty cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, West Chester, Phone 114a. EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Secy.

Friends' Educational Association.—A meeting will be held on No. 140 N. Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, Seventh-day, Third Month 11th, 1905, at 2:30 P.M. Program, in harmony with our last, has been prepared, it is believed, the meeting will be one of great interest to parents and members of school committees, as well as teachers. A cordial invitation is extended to all interested.

PROGRAM.

"The Neighborhood as the Starting-point in Education," by Dr. Robert Ellis Thompson, Principal of Philadelphia Boys' High School.

A general discussion will follow.

THESEA WILDMAN, Secretary.

DIED, on the twenty-first of First Month, 1905, at B. O'Connell's, aged seventy-one years, five months and seven days. She was the daughter of James and Sarah Bruff, and was born at Damascus, Ohio, fourteenth Month, 1833, and was united in marriage to Truman Coggeshall on the thirtieth of Eighth mo. 1859, with whom she moved to West Branch, Ia., 1864, where she resided until the death of her husband, a man of superior qualities, and was for several years a clerk of both Quarterly and Monthly Meetings of West Branch, Ia. She will be greatly missed by her relatives and friends.

—, in Philadelphia, on the twenty-second of First Month, 1905, SARAH LIGHTFOOT PRICE, widow of an Martin Price, in her seventy-third year; a beloved and dearly loved Motherly Friend, who lived a life of being a faithful, sincere and loyal in the performance of her life's duties, this dear Friend was concerned to do her day's work in the day-time. In her youth she had the evidence of her love for her Heavenly Father, and her desire to walk acceptably before Him, and in many years as the cares and responsibilities of life increased, she was ever ready to do her duty, and it was increasingly her endeavor "to do justly to love mercy, and to walk humbly with her God;" and few days before her decease, she remarked that the promise of Scripture was much with her, we believe, "I will be merciful to the humble, and will comfort." Thus in her lowly, watchful, Christian life she exemplified many of the beautiful characteristics of her heavenly Father, and her legacy to her children, by whom she was devotedly and tenderly loved, and for in her declining years. Her very humble view of her own spiritual attainments had, for many months, she felt her health failing, brought much exercise, and least in the solemn hour of dissolution she should be wanting; but the humility, tenderness and sweet her spirit were a precious evidence that the sanctification had been experienced, and we believe that through the mercy of God, in Christ our Saviour, in Whom alone was her trust, she shared the sufferings of the afflicted tabernacle, and the conflicts of time for overhauling rest and trials and the many mansions in our home prepared by our blessed Redeemer for those who love Him. "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for they are the kingdom of heaven." "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

COMING UP HIGHER.—We have been interested in observing three successive steps of evolution of a righteous concern in this city. In its method, that appeared not first which is spiritual, but that which was political; afterwards an approach to that which is spiritual.

1. A convocation of all ministers to hear evidence of permitted or protected vice and pour blame on certain city officers from their pulpits.

2. A re-convening of the clergy generally to meet together for a change of heart in the administration, many of their invocations being published in next morning's paper. Last week's marks in THE FRIEND looking towards the ritual field of operations were sent to press before that call for prayer was announced.

3. This week a general call to the ministry assemble in one place in prayer for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the ministers themselves, and upon the haunts of vice to divert their inmates to Him who came to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself.

So the ideal for Christian faithfulness keeping from accusation to prayer, and from prayer of ministers for delinquent officers to prayer of the ministers for themselves, and civic cleansing by way of the heart. We do not say a word about methods thus far, while the religious concern of ministers seems opening in the Lord's hands. May it be our privilege to record further steps in grace before the movement ceases. A religious intention of the vicious district is described as having been made last First-day with public speaking services. Well meaning speakers learned nothing by the attempt, and some could talk to their hearers' condition. But what to become of inmates scattered by a spiritual outpouring? What Christians are ready to confirm or escape of these to better lives, by providing rescue homes for penniless penitents?

Hard of Hearing.

Not so much the "silence of God" is to be complained of, as the deafness of men. And none are so deaf as those who will not hear. "The hearing ear and the seeing eye—God hath made both of them," and we will not turn them towards his voice or his light, for fear of learning something inconvenient to our wills. "He that doeth evil hateth the light and cometh not to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved." And turning his ears from the reproofs of instruction given by the still, small voice, he cultivates a voluntary deafness till he gets past hearing. Vain is it then for him to cry, "Be thou not silent unto me, O God, lest I be like them that go down into the pit." Such go thither because deaf to Him by practice of deafness, with the result that they know not even the day of their visitation.

A tender, sensitive hearing comes by a tendered heart, submissive to the invitation, "To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts." A hearing that is a hearkening in order to obey, gives the trained ear of the disciple that comes to know more and more familiarly the Divine voice from that of the stranger. The language of his Word has been from the beginning, and to as many as have received it has He given authority to become sons of God. But to the majority who have had ears precluded by preferred sins He has seemed the silent God, though his inspeaking Word is not idle in hearts upon which it will not be thrown away. To some of these his word has been revealed for publication unto others, when men had become too gross to hear his word directly. He has sent for their outward hearing prophets and his dear Son, to recall men to the witness for Truth in their hearts, and has at times broken through the habitual deafness of multitudes by violent or quickening manifestations of his Spirit, "to revive his work in the midst of the years, in the midst of the years to make it known," and in wrath upon sin to remember mercy to sinners who will hear unto repentance.

But all along since the beginning the fault has not been in the silence of God, but in the willful deafness of men. He has not been slack in communication to those who would hear and obey. But if the object of Divine communication is frustrated at the receiving end, communication over that line will cease. Many will shout as through telephones, "Oh, Lord, hear us;" but keep their receivers rigidly hung up. Some are afraid of what they might hear to their inconvenience if they should hear from the Truth. And there are plenty who would rather themselves stand in the place of transmitters between souls and God, and get the patronage of the business of mediators; and so they ridicule as fanaticism the declaration, "God is come to teach his people Himself." But if there be any virtue in Quakerism, if any testimony of Truth, which history has profusely acknowledged with gratitude for the service of our religious Society on earth, its essential germ is treasured up in that one revelation which said, "There is One, even Christ Jesus, who can speak to thy condition," and which said again, after years of experience had confirmed that truth as the nucleus of the Society of Friends and its work: "Let nothing stand between your souls and God, but Christ."

"When a youth I discovered this Quaker secret," says one, in a publication received by mail in the midst of the writing of the preceding paragraph, "I found the still, small voice was really the voice of God—an immediate revelation, or direct communication from God to the soul—never ceasing to speak, generally rebuking or saying unpleasant things to me, showing me that nearly all my thoughts, words and actions were selfish, earthly and evil, and that my charities and best actions wanted washing, being found in pride and self-righteousness.

"When I listened to it I was brought low, passive and willing to obey; then an unspeakable Peace filled my soul. I felt reconciled to God who comforted me. 'Abba, Father!' rose from my heart, and 'My son,' was the response back to it. I tasted the heavenly bread, and since tasting it I have never been satisfied with anything else, or with anything less. If I go from this Word in my heart, where? or to whom shall I go? For it, and it only, has the satisfaction of Eternal Life."

They say there is no revelation; but what is made known to us as our duty, as the Lord's will, is revelation. This is my belief—I am sure of it. They slight revelation; but it shall prevail, and the Spirit of the Lord shall reign over all.—John Barclay's Testimony on his Death Bed.

Eighth Month 11th, 1895, First-day.—"A sense of my need of the renewings of the Holy Spirit, a partaking of the living bread, prevails this afternoon. Holy Father grant that I may experience the gifts of life and spiritual love toward Thee. Thy beloved Son has said, that unless He wash us we shall have no part with Him; then with Peter my spirit exclaims, 'Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head.' . . . How pure and high a standard is set for us in the teachings of the Lord Jesus; yet Thou Father can enable us, poor unworthy children of Thine, to live up to them; and may we not trust and beseech Thee to grant this power? Now unto Thee, who art able to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless before the presence of Thy glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God, our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power both now and forever."

Second Month 24th, 1896.—"The Apostle Paul could say, 'for we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.' This sure knowledge of a glorious resurrection and renewed life in a spiritual sense, after the dissolution of the earthly body is the grand privilege of every true believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, who declared, 'he that believeth on Me hath everlasting life.' We may not all have the same undoubting confidence Paul had, but such as are 'passed from death unto life,' through Christ's regenerating power and submission to His Spirit's work in the heart, are built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. They may in humble dependence on Him, rejoice in Christ Jesus, having no confidence in the flesh."

I have craved of Him earnestly many times to refine me by all His dispensations, so that meetness for His Heavenly Kingdom may be realized, and when the final summons comes to me, I may be as one of His servants, who shall be found watching, and know Him to be to me the resurrection and the life."

Seventh Month 1st, 1900.—"I want that the closing years of my life may be more devoted to the service of the Church and less to outward concerns, although I have believed one's duty to our Heavenly Father may be involved in a faithful stewardship over earthly cares, as well as in what is usually regarded more strictly religious labor. The responsibility of a gift in the ministry of the Gospel of Christ has ever seemed to me a most serious charge, and I earnestly crave that now in the evening of my day, I may have Divine Grace to enable me to fulfil all that the Master may require at my hands."

I was impressed to-day in reading from the journal of James Backhouse (an English Friend and minister) these remarks:—'However I may, toward my fellow-men at times appear strong in the Lord and in the power of His might, and even contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, and embraced by our forefathers, and by us who are among their descendants, I feel before the Lord a poor, weak, feeble, helpless and halting child, dependent entirely upon Him.' These words express in degree what I have felt in our meeting to-day, that we are not 'sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God.' We sat silently all through the meeting. I endeavored to wait upon the Lord for the renewal of my spiritual strength, but felt no call to impart anything to others.

Friends profess not to depend on those in the station of ministers, when met for worship, for spiritual instruction, but that all are taught immediately by Him. This is a high profession, and makes a marked line of distinction between us and other professing Christians, who consider an officiating Minister essential to conduct Divine worship for the congregation. How important that we do not fail in our meetings to experience that individual exercise of soul and watching unto prayer that will make our profession a reality and not a delusion! I believe this personal access of each member of the true Church of Christ to communion with Him is a precious truth, and if all felt and acted upon it, our meetings would prove the reality of the saying that, 'where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them.'

Twelfth Month 8th, 1902.—'Weakness of the heart and general debility remind me of the increasing frailty of my advancing years. What can sustain and console as dissolution approaches but the grand hope of immortality and eternal life for the soul, through the Gospel! The glorious words of Paul epitomize these great truths: 1 Cor. xv: 20, 21, etc.—

'Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead.' (That is by the man, Christ Jesus). 'As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall bear the image of the heavenly.' 'So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory." Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!'

Those who were present when the final summons came, can reverently acknowledge that Death was "swallowed up in victory," the last words being:—"There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus"—then in broken accents, "through the washing of regeneration"—and finally, in a whisper, "Hallelujah! Hallelujah!"

The following lines from one of Bonar's hymns, were quoted shortly before the close of his earthly pilgrimage, in a letter written after the death of a cousin, and are most expressive of the attitude of mind and spirit during this last year.

"I go to life, and not to death,
From darkness to life's native sky,
I go from sickness and from pain,
To health and immortality."

For toil there comes the crowned rest,
Instead of burdens, eagle's wings—
And I, even I, this life-long thirst, Shall quench at everlasting springs."

"In heavenly things men should be independent of their fellows, and trust in God alone."

"CROSSES and troubles are often concealed mercies and special favors."

"I Can't, but Jesus Can."

There is a story of a little boy's heroism the storm which devastated the Suez Islands.

When the waves rose and swept across islands, and the water burst open the door, and rushed in, bringing boards, dugeese, snakes and rubbish, a mother tied baby on her shoulder, and lifted her boy on in her arms. To her fourteen year old daughter she said:

"You must carry one child."

"Which, mother?" said the girl.

The mother looked at the two, one of years, one of two, unable to choose which leave. Here, Ben, the boy of eleven, a Christian, yet full of fun and frolic as a can well be, said: "Ma, I'll take the little of."

"No, my boy, you can't; you can't yourself, let alone the child."

"I know I can't," answered Ben, "but I can."

"The water is too deep; it's up to your shoulders now," said the despairing mother.

With a smile that gave her courage, the boy swung the little one upon his shoulders. "It's deep for true, but Christ is a tall He must be."

So they started. The anxious mother calling to her children through the roar of wind and water. The daughter kept up her, but very soon Ben ceased to answer.

When at length they reached the ground, she met her brother trying to force his horse through the water to her aid. He took her to his own home, but of Ben there was no trace.

When the tide went down the next morning she sat grieving for her lost children. Ben tramped into the house, saying, "Do I tell you true, mamma?" He put his charge into his mother's arms.

Surely, Christ had guided the child who trusted Him.

Had he followed his mother he would soon be beyond his depth, and must have been drowned. But unconsciously he turned aside and reached the bank that forms the plantation boundary in old times. So this he walked, waist deep in water; a step two on either side would have been fatal to the child trod the narrow path in safety. He reached a house where a man came from the upper story and took the child. It—Selected, in the Christian Instructor.

WHAT we call unction under the inspiration of the Spirit of God can never be simulated. Vociferation, boisterousness and physical force are clumsy and disgusting counterfeits of genuine spiritual unction, easily detected by an intelligent audience. . . . It was a chief offense to counterfeit the 'holy anointing' (Ex. xxx: 33) in the Mosaic dispensation. Do it be a venial sin in the more glorious dispensation of the Spirit to stand up in the name of Christ and pour out upon a multitude of mortal souls needing impulse heavenly wretched counterfeit unction, a mixture of fine prose rhetoric garnished with scraps of poetry and seasoned with the grimace and gestures of an actor?—Steele.

These further particulars appear in Wm. Harvey's correspondence, which serve to supplement that heretofore printed from Wm. Allen's.—[Ed.]

quadilla, First Month 25th, 1905.—I think we made no reference to the Royal Palms which are to be seen in many places over the island,—trunks of a light shade, very symmetrical, with a comparatively small tuft of foliage on top. The outer part of the trunk is very tough and is split off in curved slabs in reference to the annular layers, and is used as it comes off for flooring, etc. The interior is pithy. The trees are sometimes cut down to obtain the bud at the top, which is a delicacy, yielding the possessor, say 25 cents. One of the industries was the making of straw hats; we saw girls sitting around in shade weaving them.

Our arrival here was very different from that at Mayaguez. We had engaged quarters here at this place, and the automobile transman (American) met us. Then this house "American" is only about six feet from the railway track, and the train stopped opposite. While at breakfast, in came Missionary Judson L. Underwood and Dr. Colbert. We felt quite made up. Old ocean sweeps in or ceasing rolls almost under this building, which is built partly on poles or piles. It is so strange that these people do not appreciate the beauties of nature surrounding them. We have to go to the least desirable part of the house backside to get a good view of the ocean. We noticed at San Juan that beautiful bluffs overlooking the bay were occupied by slum settlements.

J. L. Underwood desired us to go in the afternoon to the jail, and to this request we acceded after W. C. A. had rested. There were at ninety men and boys altogether, though two or three boys. In exhorting them a beautiful story of the prodigal son was related to their condition. Some literature distributed amongst them, and we can but say that some good was done.

This is the most populous district in the island,—418 persons to the square mile, though the Mayaguez region follows closely. There are few good buildings here, but they fairly compare with people.

Our presence in this island seems pretty well known, and our kind friend Underwood seemed determined to have us occupy his house of worship. It is important to keep humbly and unobtrusively in the line of duty. There does not seem much to do here. We are waiting now for a coach to go to San Sebastian. They all seem to be in use on distant trips. . . . The room was showery. W. C. A. felt warned to keep in doors. We had been invited to Underwood's for dinner and both wanted to go. It seemed a duty for me to go alone, though the rain and mud, and I went. * His wife was just such a woman as one would expect or hope to find as a help-mate for a hard-working, earnest missionary. They were most kind, and it was certainly one of the bright spots in my Porto Rican experiences. We had much of Friends and Friends' ways, and they seemed to appreciate our coming down here, and what encouragement we can give them. They have so few visitors, and work month by month and year by year endeavoring to win souls to Christ. J. L. Underwood started here five years ago. When he would read the Bible to them they could not understand what it was. They thought he was making a poor attempt at some kind of Spanish; and his appearance in prayer caused thoughts even further from the real purpose. He now has a very comfortable house of worship, and over two hundred, I think, members (Presbyterians). He told of one remarkable conversion of a great, big fellow, the dread of the neighborhood, armed "to the teeth," as it were. He had commenced attending Missionary Underwood's meetings, and afterwards came up and said, "Pastor, I want to join your church;" and went on to say that he had no use for his weapons,—would cast them into the sea; asked if J. L. Underwood wanted any of them. So he took a pair of iron knuckles, which were calculated to settle men in much less time than it requires to tell the story.

First Month 26th.—It would be a good thing to have some of William Penn's writings in Spanish. People want to know if we belong to the Society of which he was a member, and the children seem to know so much about him. His writings, or parts of them, would be very helpful, and would be read. We wish that we had more copies of "No Cross, No Crown."

Last evening we both went to Underwood's to dine, and W. C. A. did appreciate it, and did not wonder at my enjoyment of the previous evening. We did not go to their evening service, which perhaps was a little disappointment to J. L. Underwood, particularly as we are here so short a time compared with other cities visited. They brought the two mission teachers here with them, and there was a little meeting before we left; and this morning William Allen had an encouraging message for teachers and pupils at the mission school near here in charge of the Presbyterians.

San Juan, First Month 27th.—Here we are again. In a sense, it seemed like a sort of getting home again. A crowd of Northerners are here and we had some difficulty in locating ourselves.

Having visited the mission school in Aguadilla, we were about through. There is no railroad communication between Aguadilla and Camuy. We steer shy of coaches, if possible, and so choose the automobile passage, sitting alongside the "driver." He had a machine weighing two tons, and has hauled nineteen people between the two places, and had fifteen hundred pounds in a "trailer" in addition. We had pretty glimpses of the sea, the scenery was fine, and the country teeming with people. Much ground was planted to cotton, the sea-island variety, and it does very well. Saw only one modern plow during the day; the others had single handle, and I suppose were practically the same as in the time of Moses.

We reached Camuy about 4.30—twenty-seven miles in three hours and a half—and train was waiting to take us to Arceibo, where we found Judge Jose Savage and his wife, who was Mary Hutchinson, daughter of John H. of N. J. and a "Friend." It was on their account that we stopped off, and they did very much seem to appreciate the visit and the little meeting held in the evening. Judge Savage is a young man, an Episcopalian, very bright, as is his wife.

Arceibo has numerous advantages and seems like a quiet place—though when we drove in there was a great crowd of boys under the balcony fighting for pennies dropped from above. A policeman came to stop the performance, though the boys showed him scant respect. The Plaza (park) was well kept, and a nice little green spot it was. All the towns have a plaza—some bare apologies, some quite refreshing—and all towns of fair size have their Catholic churches, and it does not take a town of much size to hold 5000 people, even though largely made up of shacks and one-story buildings.

Arising about five this morning to make train to this city, we passed through much cane land, very luxurious; many cattle and horses grazing on the rank Malo Hielo (Para) grass. The calves, some of them, pretended that it was cold, and humped their backs. Oranges have been planted on a large scale, though as it requires five years for a budded fruit to come into full bearing, the success of the venture is not assured.

We were both pretty quiet for a considerable part of the way. We had to recount our many blessings in having been cared for through trying experiences, in having had the way opened as it was; and there is reason to believe that hearts were prepared to receive the seed. For not much more than a sowing can be expected when so little time is spent in one place.

Considerable attention has been given to the distributing of our literature. It is natural to expect that any one who had not been in the field would not be likely to send just what was, or what we think is needed—but that is the next thing on program. The week promises to be very full.

A WOMAN'S FAITHFULNESS PREVIOUS TO THE RISE OF FRIENDS.—An extract dating a little before the year of 1640:

"Now at this, Mr. Kelly being some years deceased, his widow persevered in godliness, and it might be said of her as of Ruth, that all the city did know her to be a virtuous woman. She was very famous for piety, bearing a testimony against the superstitious and traditions of those days and would not observe their invented times and feasts called holidays. She had a grocer's shop in High Street, which she kept open on the time they called Christmas day, and sat sewing in the shop as a witness of God, in the midst of the city, in the face of the sun, and in the sight of all men, even in those very days of darkness, when all sorts of people had a reverence of that day above all others. This gracious woman, like a Deborah, arose with strength of holy resolution in her soul from God, even a mother in Israel, and so she proved: because she was the first woman in this city of Bristol that practiced that truth of the Lord, which was then hated and odious separation."

It is always safe to do just right, whatever are the appearances of danger. It is never safe to do wrong, however small the risk may seem. The whole universe is ordered of God so as to have these truths stand out over against each other in unflinching continuance.

Superintendent's Report.

At the beginning of the year it becomes my pleasant duty to report to our patrons and friends the progress of the work. The General Superintendent has pursued much the same plan of work as heretofore. We have traveled about 15,000 miles in reaching the great railway lines, such as the Pennsylvania system, the B. & O. the Chicago & North-Western, the C. M. & St. P. with its 7000 miles of track, the great Rock Island, the Santa Fe, the Illinois Central, C. B. & Q., etc. We endeavor to see as frequently as practicable what is on the principal trains of these roads, and examine their news stands in the cities through which they pass.

Whatever we find that is suggestive of crime or suggestive of immorality we purchase and forward to the manager of the road with very definite information as to what it is and where and when purchased. By being careful in our judgment and definite in our information, we seldom have any difficulty in securing the suppression of the objectionable matter. If the matter handled is very vile, we ask that the vendor be discharged, and it is generally done.

We generally make our report to railroad officials, instead of the news company, because the most of the news companies will sell anything on which they can make money, no matter how vile, but the railroad manager commands them, and they must obey or lose the privilege of the road. Last year one news company was entirely removed from a great railway system because we repeatedly reported their misdoings, and they did not clean up.

We are preparing an appeal to news companies to drop off the lower grades of books which most of them handle, and to substitute for them a higher class. We cannot condemn all light reading, but there is a wide range of entertaining books that are not poisonous.

The following, which we clip from a Chicago paper, forms a good basis for such an appeal: Crime Due to Bad Novels.—Many Jail Prisoners Ascribe Fall to "Yellow" Literature.

"Yellow literature is the stepping-stone to a career of crime."

This was the conclusion reached by Mrs. W. C. Keough, member of the board of education, after two hours' talk with the more youthful prisoners at the county jail. She talked only with the ones who were old enough to realize the wrong they had done. Mrs. Keough made the visit to get data for use in securing the passage of a bill to prevent the sale of sensational and immoral novels and literature.

"One of the boys told me he had read stories of train robbery and bank robbery until the daring of the hero bandits seemed to him the best of characters to imitate," said Mrs. Keough. "Another youth in jail for the first time, had been led into bad ways through a desire to emulate Tracy, the bandit, as portrayed in some criminally 'yellow' novel. The boys laughed at me when I asked them whether they thought cigarettes or dime novels had the more influence in starting them wrong. I did not talk with a single one who did not say the dime novel was what turned his thoughts toward crime as an attractive career."

"Afterward Mr. Whitman was good enough to let me talk to the men in chapel, and, when I asked all who blamed the dime novel for their present condition to hold up their hands, fully two-thirds of the men in the room condemned the yellow back.

"The natural instinct in the mind of the child is to emulate some hero, and sensational writers realizing this, throw a halo of glowing deeds and daring about some bank robber or highwayman and his abhorrent successes."

Judge Myer, of New York, mentioned to us a book he had just read, and which was highly entertaining, and yet elevating. The Judge wants us to recommend such books to the news companies, and thus assist them in raising their standard. The suggestion is a good one, and we shall be glad to have the friends of our work send us lists of entertaining, yet useful books, especially adapted to the railroad trade.

The smallness of the finances by no means measures the extent of the work. Were it not for the transportation furnished by the railroads we could not travel 15,000 miles and touch and inspect so many of the great railway systems. And even with this transportation furnished, it could not be done did not the general superintendent give time to it, though he receives but little compensation.

We desire to thank the friends of the work, whose contributions have made our work possible.

Out or In.

"Trouble is with Maria," said Cousin Jane, "that all her doors open. Anything that's brought to her she's willing enough to have. If her friends'll come in, and make a fuss over her, Maria's glad to see them. Her door turns on the hinges easy enough to let in the things and the people she likes. When she was young and good-looking, and well off, Maria enjoyed life pretty well. What she wanted came to her, and she was contented enough. But now that she's older, and hasn't as much to live on as she used to, she frets, and complains that life isn't worth living, and thinks people slight her, and that she has a hard and bitter lot. So far as I can see, the bitterness is mostly in Maria, more than in her lot, for it's just an average lot.

"If she once knew what some folks had to bear, she wouldn't feel so—she'd be thankful instead. But her doors don't open out. She doesn't get into other people's lives. She has never gone out of herself to help a friend, even. She's never set out to do any work for others. Things must come to her; she doesn't go to them. Everything leads in, and nothing out, in Maria's life. It's no wonder folks have got tired of bringing love and sympathy and cheerfulness and brightness to her, when she never comes out of herself to bring anything to anybody.

"If I was Maria, I'd take my doors off, and rehang them, all opening out instead of in. 'T would be something of a job in the way of repairs, but it would pay—yes, it would!"—Ex.

"MEN'S monthly meetings were settled in the glorious order of the Gospel; that all in the power of God might seek that which was lost, bring again that which was driven away; cherish the good and reprove the evil."—George Fox.

Man's Tendency to Degenerate.

By G. FREDERICK WRIGHT.

In 1847 M. Prisse D'Avignes presented the National Library in Paris a roll of papyrus covered with Egyptian hieratic characters. This roll had been found by peasants, w. M. Prisse had employed to make excavations for him in the necropolis of Thebes. An examination it was found to come from a tablet of the eleventh or twelfth dynasty, and before to have been made 2,500 or 3,000 years before Christ. With the exception of a fragment containing some unimportant contents dating from the last king of the dynasty (about 3,500 B. C.) this is the only writing upon papyrus which has been discovered, and from its size and the importance of the literary matter it contains it deserves to be called a book, and is generally referred to as "the oldest book in the world," by a more specific designation is the "Prisse papyrus," after the name of its discoverer.

For thousands of years in Egypt the substitute for paper was the pith of the papyrus plant, which used to grow abundantly on the banks of the Nile. To form the writing material the pith was cut lengthwise into slices, averaging eight or ten inches long, these were placed together with the slightly overlapping and pressed until adhered. Sometimes, however, a glue substance had been used. To make the whole other slices were pasted upon the back transversely, making a convenient sized sheet. When more than one sheet was needed a number were usually pasted together at the ends, so as to be rolled, thus making a book in the form of a roll.

Though this copy of the book in question was made during the eleventh or twelfth dynasty, it was an edition of a much older book which had been long in circulation. The characters in which it was written are about half-way between those of the oldest hieroglyphic writing and the latter form resembling the modern alphabet. Indeed, it is pretty certain that the Phœnician alphabet from which that of the Greek was derived was made up by selecting a certain number of the phonetic forms used at the time the first papyrus was written upon. Though the papyrus was discovered in 1847, it was more than forty years before a satisfactory translation of it was made. It was done into French by M. Virey after six years' labor in Egypt and from that version an English translation has been made by Dr. Howard Osgood.

The book consists of two parts, the first of which is a treatise on manners, written by Kakimma, who says that he was living in the predecessor of Senoferu, the last king of the third dynasty, "arrived in port," he died. Senoferu was the first king of the fourth dynasty, the beginning of whose reign is placed later than 4,000 B. C., some time before the great pyramids were built.

The treatise of Kakimma is short, containing only about 400 words, but it is to the point and breathes throughout the noblest sentiments. His cautions against gluttony run us of the proverbs of Solomon, some of which may, indeed, be the source from which the latter were drawn. The following are some of his maxims: "If thou sittest down to h a glutton, to keep up with him in eating I lead afar. If thou sittest down to eat h a number, despise the dishes which thou est. It is but a short time to restrain thy-f, and voracity is something degrading, there is bestiality in it. He who is drawn ay by his stomach when he is not on the job is a worthless man. With such people stomach is master."

Among these maxims, also, we find this in amendation of good manners: "As for a lacking good manners * * * who ars a surly face toward the advances of a vicious heart, he is an affliction to his mother his relatives." The interest of Kakimna the instruction of children is worthy of rial note: "Do not," he says "harden the crts of thy children. Instruct those who be in thy place. * * * Let the chief to his children after he has gained exper- ence. They will gain honor for themselves increasing in well-doing, starting from that ch he has told them." Most instructive all, in this most ancient relic of human ature, is the noble conception of the ty appearing in it. God is referred to in singular number, as bringing to pass events ch cannot be foreknown by man.

The second part of the book consists of the cepts of Ptah-Hotep" and contains about 30 words, or twice as many as there are in article. Ptah-Hotep lived toward the close he fifth dynasty, during the reign of Assa, seems to have been both Assa's uncle and or. His tomb at Sakkara, near the "Step" amid, is one of the most interesting and preserved which is visited by tourists. lived to be 110 years old and wrote these verbs as his last effort to do good to the ld. They number in all forty-four, and al throughout a highly cultivated, gentle, arous and virtuous man, enforcing on the riers of Pharaoh the precepts which he self practiced, and which they were ex- ed to practice 3,000 years before the be- ing of Grecian history.

From this single treatise one gets a very idea of the progress in civilization ally attained, and of the high standard of ic morals which was cherished and in- ated. We do, indeed, learn that then, ow, "there are people who take all sides n they speak, so that, by not replying, may not grieve the one who has made a sement." But this is not the course of luct commended, for elsewhere he says, hen thou speakest, know what objections e made to thee. * * * To speak in sel is an art, and speech is criticised e than all other work; it is contradiction h puts it to the proof."

If the desirability of controlling one's tem- Ptah-Hotep speaks as follows: "If thou to do with a disputer while he is in his, and if he is superior to thee in ability, or the hands, bend the back, do not get a passion with him. As he will not per- tence to spoil his speech, it is very wrong interrupt him; that shows thou art not to be quiet when thou art contradicted. hen, thou hast to do with a disputer while n in his heat, act as one not to be moved. hast the advantage over him, if only in being silent when his speech is bad. * * f thou hast to do with a disputer while he is in his heat, do not treat him with contempt because thou art not of the same opinion. Do not be provoked with him when he is wrong. * * * He is fighting against his very self; do not ask him to flatter thy views. Do not amuse thyself with the spectacle which thou hast before thee; this is odious, small and of a contemptible spirit."

And yet again, "If thou aimest at having polished manners, do not question him whom thou meetest. Converse with him alone so as not to annoy him. Do not dispute with him until thou hast allowed him time to impregnate his mind with the subject of conversation. If he displays his ignorance, and if he gives thee an opportunity to put him to shame rather than that, treat him with consideration; do not keep pushing him on; do not reply in a crushing manner; do not finish him; do not worry his life out for fear that he for his part will not recover, and that men will leave thee to the benefit of thy conversation."

Especially interesting are the instructions given concerning the proper treatment of one's wife and neighbor. "Do not," he says, "give way to thy temper on account of what occurs around thee; do not scold except about thine affairs. Do not be in a bad temper toward thy neighbors; a compliment to him who gives offense is better than rudeness. It is wrong for a man to get in a passion with neighbors, so that he knows not how to manage his words. Where there is only a little difficulty, he creates an affliction for himself at a time when he should be cool." "If thou art wise, love thy wife purely. Fill her stomach, clothe her back; these are the cares to her body. Caress her, fulfill her desire, during the time of thine existence; it is a kindness which honors its master. Be not brutal; consideration will lead her better than force. * * * This establishes her in thine house; if thou repellst her, it is an abyss. Open thine arms to her for her arms; call her, show her thy love. * * * If thou takest a wife, may she be more content than any of her fellow citizens. She will be doubly bound if the chain is sweet to her. Do not repulse her! grant that which pleases her; it is when contented that she will value thy guidance."

Interesting as all this is, its importance is extreme, because of the light which it sheds upon the law of progress, which has characterized the history of the human race. In the most emphatic manner it contradicts the rampant theories of evolution which many have insisted on applying to human history as well as to material affairs. But nothing is plainer than that man has an inherent tendency to degenerate, in other words is a fallen being, and continues to fall, except where he has been brought under the influence of the divine revelation recorded in the Bible. Egypt 4,000 years before Christ was in a higher state of civilization than she has ever been since. At that time she built her largest pyramids, she executed her finest sculptures, she had her highest conceptions of divinity, her mildest manners, her purest homes and her most beneficent political organization. From that position her native people have constantly degenerated, until now the fellahin are the obscuring of the earth.

Divine it has been everywhere, except as the Siva revelation through the Jewish race has stayed the corruption in national, social and individual life and proved itself in its effects to be the true remedy which the ills of the world most sorely need. It is no small part of the evidence of the truth of the Bible that has correctly diagnosed the maladies of human society and provided the remedial agencies needed for the healing of the nations.—Ram's Horn.

Order.

Under the head of vital things, order should be written in large capitals. No house is beautiful if its laws are disregarded. The order that faints at the sight of a speck of dust, the order that locates every chair and table by a chalk mark, the order that cannot tolerate a misplaced book, is not to be thus written. This order is not vital. It was once called good housekeeping, but it is not considered good home-making, and never can be. It has wrecked homes quite as successfully as the saloon.

The order that makes for restfulness and comfort is vital. It cannot exist in crowded rooms. Furniture is made to be used and books are made to be read. If the disarranging of a chair or the misplacing of a book upsets the order of a room, something is wrong, and the "something" is the crowded condition. Get rid of the superfluous. Most rooms have too many pieces of furniture, and all rooms have too many things.

Simplicity of arrangement is so bound up with order and the absence of the superfluous, that it cannot well be separated. A few features chosen to accord with the room, books that are placed within the reach of those who use them, lamps that are located where they are needed, flowers that are arranged with a Japanese feeling for the value of the leaf and stem, are expressions of a love for a simple arrangement. Beauty no less than comfort is dependent upon this vital principle.—Elizabeth Emery, in The House Beautiful.

THE THING WORTH WHILE.—Once I came to a crossroads in the old life and did not know in which direction God wanted men to help hasten his kingdom. I started to read the Book to find out what the ideal life was, and I found that the only thing worth doing in the world was to do the will of God; whether that was done in the pulpit or in the slums; whether it was done in the college or class room, or on the street, did not matter at all "My meat and drink," Christ said, "is to do the will of him that sent me," and if you make up your mind that you are going to do the will of God above everything else, it matters little in what direction you work. There are more posts waiting for men than there are men waiting for posts. Christ needs men in every community and in every land; it matters little whether we go to foreign lands or stay at home, as long as we are sure we are where God puts us.—Henry Drummond.

WHEN the young men went to Samuel Bowmas to complain of their elders he replied, "young men, if it were not for the fathers in your meeting, you would set the house on fire." And to the elders he said, "If it were not for the young men, I fear the fire would go out on the altar."

A Brief Account of Mary Stanton's Illness and Death at the Age of Forty-seven Years, written by her Husband. Her death occurred Ninth Mo. 27th, 1857.

She had enjoyed almost uninterrupted good health all her life until about the beginning of this year, when her strength began to fail, at first perceptible only in her knees and ankles, which increased by slow and almost imperceptible degrees, so that she gave attention to her domestic concerns and attended religious meetings until about the first of Sixth Month, by which time the weakness had so increased she was unable to walk alone, after which she spent most of her time until the day before her death in an easy chair.

She suffered little or no pain from the disease, and her appetite and general health were mostly pretty good, so she could enjoy the family circle and the company of her friends who called to see her, and often spoke of it as a great favor, saying the greatest privation she had was her inability to assemble with others for Divine worship. The weakness continued to increase so that the last six or eight weeks of her time she was unable to turn herself in bed at night, which caused frequent attention necessary and also many wakeful hours, which were often made truly heart-tendering seasons, in which she expressed her apprehensions she should not continue long with me, and we were unitedly made willing to resign the event to Him who knows what is best for us and requires no more of the humble and contrite ones than He will enable them to bear.

About the twentieth of the Ninth Month she took a cold which settled in a cough and reduced her strength more rapidly, and on the twenty-sixth she said she did not think she could last many days longer, adding: "But I am afraid I have not searched every corner of my heart as with a lighted candle. I have craved that I might be favored with assurance of Divine acceptance before the time arrives. I fear I have not been as attentive to my duty while strength and ability were afforded, as I ought to have been. O! for one of the lowest mansions in the kingdom."

On the morning of the 27th, after spending a wearisome night with her cough, she said she thought she could not get through another such a night, and shortly after added, "I am almost gone and see nothing in my way. I have endeavored to search every corner of my heart as with a lighted candle, and I trust the sincere endeavors of the humble and contrite ones will be accepted. My complaint has come very gradually; I have had a great while to think of these things, and I trust I have not been unmindful of them." Shortly after, it appearing evident to those about her that she could not survive much longer, her children were standing around her bed weeping. She looked at them and said, "Dear children, don't fret, we have to part sometime, and it can't be in a better time. I want you to be good children, live in peace, and in the fear and love of the Lord, and try to help your father."

While after, when some present, thinking she was unconscious of what was going on around her, proposed to lower her head, which had been raised on account of her cough, that now had entirely subsided; on hearing which she shook her head, and being asked if she did not want it lowered she said, "No." Another friend coming and wanting to adjust her pillow, was requested to just be quiet, to which she responded, "Yes, be quiet." Awhile after, her sister came in, whom she had not seen that morning, and going to the bed stood awhile and was about turning away, not apprehending she was conscious of her presence, when she expressed in a clear voice, "Farewell! farewell! my dear and only sister. Don't hold me; I am going to the mansions of rest and peace;" which were the last words she spoke, and quietly passed away about eleven o'clock, A. M., being twenty-five years to the day and hour since we were united by the marriage covenant, which I trust has been mutually and faithfully fulfilled, a retrospect of which affords peace and satisfaction.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In the autumn of 1858 Joseph Elkinton and Ebenezer Worth visited the Institution under appointment of the Committee, and while there made arrangements for the reopening of the school under the charge of Abel H. Blackburn. In an interview which these Friends had with a number of the prominent Indians on this occasion, reference was made to the opposition formerly manifested by the Indians to the education of their children, and the statement was made by them, that "now there is none." At this time there was an evident interest manifested upon this subject and six or seven schools had been taught upon the Reservation and one of them near Cold Springs by Cynthia Pierce, afterwards Cynthia Gordon, an Indian woman. The Friends were pleased with their order and attention of the children during their visit to her school, and Joseph Elkinton remarks, "It is very interesting and pleasant to find instances of the natives being engaged in teaching their own people, that being the object Friends have had in view respecting them."

In the Third Month 1860, Abner Woolman and his daughter Abigail, members of Frankford Monthly Meeting, offered their services to the Committee, which were accepted, and these Friends soon afterwards proceeded to Tunasassa. Rueben and Eleanor Battin who were released at their own request returned to their homes in the Twelfth Month previous. Abel H. Blackburn and his wife Caroline remained in charge of the school.

The tract of land which the State of Pennsylvania had presented to Complanter contained about six hundred and forty acres, on the west bank of the Allegheny River, a short distance below the southern boundary of New York, and also two islands in the river near it, of several acres in extent.

In the course of time these islands became united into one by accretions which had been deposited by the water, and under pretense of obtaining a title to this, an unseated land, a warrant for it was obtained by a white man in the vicinity who endeavored to secure it by forms of law. The subject claimed the attention of the Committee, and in 1859 Thomas Wistar and Joel Evans had the island surveyed. One of their number appeared before the Board of Property at Harrisburg in the Third Month, 1860, with the draft of the survey, together with depositions taken by the defendants, other information bearing on the case, after a short deliberation by the Board, judgment was pronounced in favor of the Inc title.

In the Fourth Month, 1860, information received from Abel H. Blackburn that some of the Indians were without seed to sow plant, and a list was furnished of those who had applied for aid. This evidence of destitution took hold of the minds of the Committee and it was concluded to grant a supply of seed in cases where it appeared to be necessary, and Ebenezer Worth was appointed to go to Tunasassa and assist the Friends there in procuring and distributing it. In this work was joined by Thomas Wistar, who offered to accompany Ebenezer Worth. These Friends distributed forty-six bushels of seed corn, three hundred and thirty-one bushels of oats, four hundred and thirty-five bushels of potatoes with some grass and garden seeds so as to give very general satisfaction, and furnished as believed "a timely and substantial relief to a poor yet grateful people." Ebenezer Worth his report adds, "We endeavored, and in every measure succeeded, to have the supplies arranged as to be of easy access to those who ordered for them, and it was not only pleased but encouraging to observe the promptness of the Indians in forthwith proceeding to their teams, either of horses, or oxen, after the supplies intended for their respective neighborhoods."

The cost of the grain, potatoes, etc., purchased and distributed was three hundred and eighty-seven dollars and thirty cents.

In 1860 the building of another railroad through the Allegheny Reservation, was in progress. The Indians desired to know the views of Friends in regard to granting privileges for the construction of stations, and upon their land, and a Committee was named to address them on this subject. In this communication which was signed by the meeting generally, the Committee state that the information that they had received "causes us much uneasiness. We have no prejudice against whites, nor any desire improperly to oppose their views, but we know, and you know, O Brethren, that wherever they have fixed their selves on your land, they have been an injury to you. They sell you rum,—they induce you to drink it, and in other ways they corrupt the morals of your people.

"Brothers, if the railroad company get out to build a Depot on your land, they will certainly want to have a tavern too. I do not want persons will gather there, and tempt the Indians to do badly, to neglect their farming and other useful business, and they will likely to draw your young people into wicked and ruinous ways.

"Brothers, we are sorry to have cause for such things, but we would seriously ask whether they are not true? You have seen as well as we, what great mischief has been done among Indians by those whites who are on their lands, and we earnestly desire you to guard as much as you can against their coming among you.

"Brothers, we believe you cannot now see the evils which will be likely to grow out of this constant association with whites which low the establishment of Railroad Depots your Reservation, and as your old and faithful friends we advise you to be very cautious you grant the use of any part of it for that purpose. If necessity seems to compel to grant any of it, let it be as little as the we will admit of, so as not to give room for cavern or any other building besides the post.

"Brothers, we entreat you not to rent your land to white men but farm it yourselves. Let there be a firm and settled rule, for we believe the more you let the whites come in and settle among you, the sooner and the more certainly, you prepare the way for being driven from your Reservation and wholly deprived of it." This address was sent and interpreted to the Council, but it appeared that a grant and to the Railroad Company had been made before it reached them. The Indians however seemed to be afresh awakened to the evils arising from the residence of whites among them, and professed a determination to take immediate steps toward their removal.

Science and Industry.

There are two substances that cold will melt, and heat will solidify. One of them, recently invented, is called Cryotase, and the other a glucoside called "vonecotoxin," found in solution of asclepias root.

THE FIRST ENGLISH NEWSPAPER.—The earliest English newspapers were not printed, simply written. For the benefit of those who wished to consult them they were exhibited in public place, each reader being called upon to pay a small coin called a gazetta; hence the word "gazette." The earliest English newspaper was the Weekly News, first published in 1622. In the seventeenth century several newspapers were established, and in the eighteenth century we had the famous Stator and allied publications of the sort. The first daily appeared in 1792. It is also interesting to note that the first serial story "Robinson Crusoe," which began to run in the London Post on Tenth Month 7, 1719, and concluded on Tenth Month 19, 1720.

NEW SUEZ CANAL.—A discussion is arising on the proposition to create a new Suez canal, paralleling the existing one. Twenty years ago this was proposed, and a survey made. Shipowners are now protesting against the excessive canal dues. These dues added the cost in gold for a voyage around the Cape of Good Hope. Consequently many carriers are unable to use the canal. It is estimated that Russia eighty-five thousand dollars to get a division of the Baltic fleet through the canal. The canal is one hundred miles long. It is astonishing that so many travelers to the East do not take the ride from one end of the canal to the other. Excursionists usually stop in the middle and go back.

QUESTIONS ABOUT THE EUCALYPTUS TREE.—Several inquiries concerning the reliability of facts about the Eucalyptus quoted recently in THE FRIEND from the Saturday Evening Post, prompt a suggestion that those interested should procure from the Bureau of Forestry, U. S. Department of Agriculture, bulletin No. 35, "Eucalyptus Cultivated in the United States." It can be had for the asking.

While the Eucalyptus is indeed a wonderful tree group, the fact should be constantly kept in mind that it is strictly a tropical or semi-tropical species. From the above authority I quote: "In the first and largest division (of the United States), the winters are ordinarily so cold as to kill the Eucalyptus, and their growth there is consequently impracticable. This region comprises all the United States except a strip varying from one hundred to three hundred miles in breadth along the southern and southwestern border."

Even in Florida we are informed the occasional cold wave kills all the eucalypts to the ground. So that the great possibilities of enormous wood crops within a few years are not for us, unless we move to Southern California, or plant the hardy or Western Catalpa. This last named tree has made a crop of posts, two to the tree, and seven hundred trees to the acre in ten years under most favorable conditions in Ohio and other Central Western States.

THE EXAGGERATION OF FOOD ADULTERATION.

Our food is now on the whole purer and more wholesome than that of our ancestors. Our evaporated apples are whitened with sulphites, but they are better than those dried by stringing them across the living room. Our macaroni is colored with turmeric, but it is not hung in Italian huts. The water supplied by the city water-works is less likely to contain disease germs than that from country wells. Pewter mugs were worse than our tin cans. The meats of the packing-house are more carefully inspected than that killed at home. Bi-cuits made with saleratus are apt to be worse than with any kind of baking powder.

Much is justly said against the use of preservatives, but it is well to bear also in mind that no chemical ever added is so poisonous as the ptomaines which develop in food which is not properly preserved. The city health officers are doubtless right in prohibiting the use of any preservative in milk because that is unnecessary if it is fresh or kept cool and clean, yet in most poor families milk is not fresh or cool or clean, and many more infants have died from drinking spoiled and germ-laden milk than have been poisoned by borax or even formaldehyde. In the experiments carried out by the British Government the children fed on food containing borax were fairer and fatter at the end of the experiments than those fed on pure food.—The Independent.

METAMORPHISM.—The most important contribution to science published by the United States Geological Survey during the present year is a monograph on "Metamorphism," by Dr. Charles Richard Van Hise, which is now ready for distribution. This work embodies the results of investigations that have covered a period of more than two decades, for it is over twenty years since Dr. Van Hise first began to study the metamorphism of the sedimentary rocks. Finding that no one had systematically studied and discussed the alteration of rocks, he eventually took up the task of preparing a work that should cover the entire field of metamorphism. His first thought was that such a treatise could be prepared in two or three years, but the subject has so broadened as he worked that it has required seven years to complete his task. An eighth year has been needed to put the volume through the press. The time has been well spent, for the finished work marks a distinct advance in science.

The treatise is an attempt to reduce the phenomena of metamorphism to order under the principles of physics and chemistry, or, as it might be more simply stated, under the laws of energy. Metamorphism is broadly defined by Dr. Van Hise to include all alterations of all rocks by all processes. The geologist's knowledge of the phenomena of metamorphism has heretofore been only partial and fragmentary. Dr. Van Hise has woven all these scraggy facts into one consistent whole and has thus made a new chapter in the Book of Science, that great volume of classified knowledge to which men are ever adding.

The volume, which is listed as Monograph XI.VII in the Survey's publications, is for sale at the price of $1.50. It contains 1286 pages and is illustrated with thirteen plates. Application for copies should be made to the Director of the United States Geological Survey, Washington, D. C.

Items Concerning the Society.

William C. Allen and William B. Harvey are expected to set sail from Barbadoes about the 14th instant.

Joseph Elkinton, on his way to the Far West, stopped on Seventh-day the 25th at Pittsburg, meeting with Friends there socially and in their First-day meeting for worship; was also visited by Rabbi Levy to meet his six hundred Jewish children in a school under his oversight, and afterwards their teachers in a separate company. A marked degree of Divine favor was acknowledged. But most remarkable was a gathering of the fourteen hundred employees of H. J. Heinz (the manufacturer of table relishes, pickles, etc.), before whom our friend was earnestly engaged in the love of the gospel.

Sarah E. Holbeck received the endorsement of the Eastern Quarterly Meeting of Conservative Friends held at Cedar Grove, N. C., on the twenty-fourth to twenty-sixth of Second Month, to pursue religious labors among Friends in England and Ireland. By the same meeting Benjamin P. Brown was liberated for gospel service in Canada Yearly Meeting, and some other Yearly Meetings in the United States. There were no ministers present at the Cedar Grove Quarterly Meeting from other meetings, but the three days which it occupied are reported as "a time of much spiritual favor from the great Head of the Church."

GOT MONEY FROM QUAKERS.—If Jay Cooke did what few others could, have done he also did it in a way all his own. His story of it was as simple as the manner of the man himself. He said, according to a recent paper:

"My only hope of saving the Government was in the people; and I knew that if addressed heartily and persuasively they would surrender their all to keep the nation together; and so we were kept busy devising new methods to get at the public. The Friends, for instance, were opposed to the war. Their hearts were all right, but they wanted to keep near that darling weakness of the human heart—consistency—and the old doctrines of Fox tied their hands. I knew the best of them in Philadelphia and in other cities where the Friends were strong.

"One day I called several of them to me and said: 'Friends, you are not doing right. You have money, and your impulses are to contribute to your government. I have found a way by which you shall do it. I have seen the Secretary of the Treasury, and have arranged with him that what loans you take shall be reserved to meet the large expenses we are having for the hospitals and the sanitary system of the army. Now go to work, with my assurance that your money will not be diverted to war in its strict sense, but will be used to alleviate the pains of war.' They complied, and gave freely from that time onward."

Notes in General.

Holland is a small country which does not cut a large figure in European politics, and one reason which is said to have influenced the choice of The Hague as the seat of the Peace Conference is that the kingdom was looked on as a sort of neutral ground.

It is said that "the United States ought to pay its President enough to put him beyond the reach of money worries." True; and the President owes it to the United States to live in such a fashion that he will not get into money worries, says the New Bedford Standard.

Father McLaughlin, of Adams, Mass., it is said, "thinks that while his parishioners do not live beyond their means, yet they die too extravagantly," and he has put a limit on their funeral expenses, and a poor man is not to have a good time going to the grave of his friends and acquaintances.

James Wright, the successor to George Muller, the founder of the celebrated orphanages and who had been connected with that institution for nearly fifty years, is dead. James Wright had the full sympathy of the philanthropic public, and last year alone more than $170,000 was sent him for the maintenance of the work, making a total of about $5,700,000 sent without solicitation since the commencement of the work.

The Boston Transcript finds that many an evangelist who starts out with the most self-sacrificing ideals in due time comes to have or seems to have mercenary aims; and it would not be difficult to name some who have been wrecked on this rock. On the other hand, the peril of those who employ is that they begin to measure the results in terms of converts and the fruitage of the inquiry rooms, and if the evangelist does not put stress on that then he ceases to be rated highly by them and friction develops.

Wm. T. Stead, the editor of the London Review of Reviews, has placed on the cover of his Revival pamphlet, a picture entitled "Eve Home," of the head of Christ crowned with thorns. It is from the painting of the Russian artist, John Astafief. English Protestants object to circulating this pamphlet because of the pictures on the cover, which seems to them emblematic of the Roman Catholic Church; though they would be glad to circulate the pamphlet without the picture.

The whole hideous thing which we abstractly call "vice" is but the sinning of individual men and women. It is to be eradicated only by the creation of new impulses and ideals in the minds of these individuals. This is the work of the gospel. When the churches, in practical co-operation with the missionary agencies already valiantly at work in this section of the city, set out to reach this under world with their message, presented in a manner that will command a hearing and respect, they are about their first and most proper business. For of their Master is it not written, "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost?"

Thirty-two years ago a Norwegian youth landed at New York. The total of his possessions was tied up in a handkerchief, which was slung over his shoulder on a stick. When Governor Robert M. La Follette, of Wisconsin, leaves the executive office some time after Third Month 4th to assume the duties of United States Senator, his successor as Governor of that great Western State will be an immigrant lad, James O. Davidson, who set out from New York with his little pack upon his shoulder—who later rose to be Lieutenant-Governor of Wisconsin and will now become the chief executive of that State. Where are the story books that contain anything more interesting? asks the Columbia State.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The Fifty-eighth Congress ended on the 4th inst. The appropriation bills enacted by it for the various public expenditures during the coming year will require $697,000,000. No legislation was accomplished by it concerning the tariff, the regulation of trusts, or of railway rates, the revival of the merchant marine, or of the coast States. The Senate was called to meet in extra session immediately.

Theodore Roosevelt was inaugurated on the 4th inst. President of the United States amid scenes of military and general display such as, it is said, were never before witnessed in this country. More than 200,000 visitors were in Washington to attend the inaugural ceremonies. The impeachment of Judge Swaine before the House of Representatives at Washington has ended in a failure to convict.

President Roosevelt lately transmitted to Congress the report of the Commissioners of Corporations upon the beef industry, which is to the effect that six packing companies— Armour & Co., Swift & Co., Morris & Co., the National Packing Company, the Schwarzwalder & Sulzberger Company, and the Cudahy Packing Company—slaughtered in the year 1903 about 45 per cent. of the total slaughter in the United States; that the average net profit in 1903 for three of the companies was 99 cents per head; that the year 1902, instead of being one of exorbitant profits, was unprofitable, and that during the months when prices of beef were the highest some at least of the leading packers were actually losing money on every head slaughtered, and that during the years 1902, 1903 and 1904 Swift & Co.'s profits have not exceeded 2 per cent. of the total sales. Cudahy & Co.'s is stated at 1.08 per cent. for 1904, and 2.3 per cent. for 1903.

In answer to an inquiry on the subject, Secretary Hay has formally assured the Haitian Minister here that the United States Government has no intention whatever of acquiring by annexation or otherwise possession of Haiti or San Domingo, nor of extending American influence in that direction.

A despatch from Washington says: Commissioner Jas. R. Garfield, of the Bureau of Corporations, has instituted a rigid investigation of the operations of the oil industry in Kansas and contiguous States. In response to a resolution of the House of Representatives, the report will be made directly to President Roosevelt. Whether it will be made public will lie within the discretion of the Chief Executive. Depending on the facts developed, it may be turned over to the Department of Justice for such action as the Attorney-General may deem proper.

Of 6,000 samples of food products of sixty-one different kinds examined last year at the Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station more than 2,000 were found to be adulterated. Depending on the facts developed, it may be found that adulterations are harmless, apparently, as far as health is concerned, but are worthless make-weights added to increase profits or meet competition in price.

It is announced that petroleum has been found in Baldwin County, Alabama.

Sun spots of unusual size have lately been observed, and electrical disturbances as resonances at them, as is believed, are reported. On the 2nd inst. telegraph circuits from Chicago westward were noticeably affected. The disturbance extended from Chicago to Sioux City, Ia.

A despatch from Pierre, South Dakota, of the 27th ult., says: A bill to regulate football was passed by the House of Representatives. It disqualifies any player who is injured, and makes it a misdemeanor to play on another another game for a period of ten days from the date of disqualification. It also makes it a misdemeanor for a captain to allow a disqualified player to enter a game, and prohibits the entrance into State institutions of ball players who take only part of the course of study.

It is stated that the lifting of massive iron plates, weighing from six and twelve tons by means is now done by a number of largestest works. The nets are suspended by chains from cranes, and pick the plates by simple contact and without the loss of consequent to the adjustment of chain and hooks is older method. It is also found that the metal plate is lifted by the magnets while the chains hold them. A weighing 300 pounds will lift nearly five tons.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 3d: An Imperial rescript was issued to-day by the Emperor to the Minister of the Interior, commanding an elective assembly be called to consider legislative measures.

By virtue of the Tsar's call for an elective assembly Russia has entered on a vast political experiment, and if successful, will strengthen the autocracy, will give the hopes and efforts of her best citizens, will give the people and the monarch into closer touch than obtain for the nation a voice in the Government. It is in this rescript that the Emperor has set forth the help of God, to convene the worthiest men, possess the confidence of the people and elected by them to participate in the elaboration and consideration of legislative measures.

This step, it is reported, involves no change in the regime of the autocracy, and means neither a constitutional monarchy. At the same time it recognizes the principle of the people's right to be heard in regard to laws under which they must live. Whatever result may be, the document is sure to mark an epoch in Russian history, as important, if not more important than the signing of the emancipation manifesto twenty-fourth anniversary of which it was intended to signalize. The signing of the document came at the end of a dramatic scene, the climax of which was an impassioned speech by Emperor Nicholas to his Ministers in which he declared that he sought only the welfare of his subjects. "I am willing," the Emperor said, "to shed my blood for the good of my people." This result is reported to have given great satisfaction in England, and the authorities profess great hopes that it will completely change the attitude of the working people, who have been demanding economic reforms, and have on a strike in various centres of population throughout Russia.

Fighting is reported to have taken place for several days between the Russians and Japanese in the neighborhood of Mukden in Manchuria, resulting in the withdrawal of the former from several of their positions. The losses are reported as exceedingly heavy.

A despatch from London of the 3d says: The Russian claims to Russia amount to $325,000,000, which it is understood, will be paid in a few days without demur.

In a lecture lately delivered in this city on antiquities in Central America, by Dr. G. B. Gordon, of the University of Pennsylvania, it was stated that the antiquities have been discovered, which apparently several thousand years before the Spaniards came to America. The antiquities were found in an excellent preservation. Although the carvings and hieroglyphs are plain, the key cannot be completely determined, was the case with the Rosetta stone. The carvings on the various stone monuments are well executed and considered marvelous. The features of the human face bear a close resemblance to the negro race. Several professors of Christianity, according to the statements, number 477,090,158.

NOTICES.

Tract Association of Friends.—The announcement of the Association will be found in the Committee of Arch Street Meeting-house, on February 11, 1906, at 10 o'clock, at the office of Auxiliary Agents, and an interesting report of the Managers will be read. All are invited to attend.

THESE ARE THE BEGINNING OF SORROWS.—
prevention of anticipated by the coming of overwhelmingly more diabolical sin bring nothing less than long agony of war, more dreadful than those that were used as the excuse for entering into inanity. The war will not be over when peace is pronounced, except that it will in trail of degeneracy continue over both nations for generations. The victorious nation in its spiritual defeat, long to realize its self-righter in slaughtering others, the debasement engendered by its own victories, the inhuman barbarity cultivated within herself and children.

The curse of Cain in either nation is not wiped out by plans for education and culture by refinement of manners, or any industrial revivals, or vaporings of glory when the war is over. Sin is not so soon over, or cheaply covered. When we contemplate responsibility indelibly remaining on each side for each one of these hundreds of thousands of slaughtered lives, we dread to think the moral blight and the descent of character which awaits in the spiritual retribution. The so-called Christian nations that have adopted such procedure by war to a less respectable so-called heathen, have something to think of.

Not only the present awful carnage could be lighter or shame all war out of existence but it might be something good to show. But we look for no good by war except in spite of

When we be risen with Christ, seek those things that are where Christ sitteth." The visible things of God, the enduring realities, when they become our object, the evanescent combinations of matter lose their desirability then man rises into fellowship with the angels of all ages, with them who ever lived that which makes for righteousness.

The Standard of Reform Universally Available.

The governor of New Jersey justly declared last week before a body of ministers that the evils of railroad rebates, trusts and conflict between labor and capital, "grow out of the hearts of the men, and if you make the hearts of the men right, you cure those evils. You can pass a remedial law to-day, and human ingenuity will beat that law to-morrow. The only permanent reform is the standard of morality planted in the hearts of men. What this world most needs is more honesty and a higher striving toward the right. Inculcation of this principle is the province of the ministry to-day."

Rightly said is this, that the only permanent reform is the standard of morality planted in the hearts of men—planted in the hearts that plant it in practice. But this satisfactory saying cannot be made completely so without declaring what the standard of morality is. For there seem to be about as many standards of morality set up as there are systems of morals, and these seem to agree better in pointing out true things than in pointing out the Truth. Yet practically, and in the last analysis, most of the various standards for morality come down to an acknowledgment of a Divine judgment, conformity to which must be the Right, and insubordination to it always Wrong. Conformity to the essential law of man's being, stated in whatever philosophical phrase—one man's definition of the standard seeming to vie with others in a common purpose to avoid preaching—conformity to this Authority which must be a sense of the Will of God, is rightness, is goodness, is morality, is righteousness. And if men will have it that the standard of morality is written in a Book of God, the best Book known under heaven, refers them to the "Word which thee and in thy heart," the immediate witness for Truth proceeding from God's own Spirit to man's heart.

Further back for their ultimate authority for right and wrong seekers after truth never get than this, or nearer home to the secret verdict that satisfies man. The Scriptures everywhere assume that the will of God is the ultimate authority for right doing and that his inspeaking word or spirit of Authority is the criterion. Men are continually referred to this inward life from God for their spiritual experience and moral behavior, that they may become quick of understanding in the fear of God, that they may walk in the light as He is in the light, that they may be led by the Spirit of God as his sons, that they may profit by the manifestation of it given to every man.

Our thanks are due unto Him for the revelation of the unspeakable gift of his eternal Word in Christ, the Divine Word and Standard made flesh and dwelling among men as Immanuel, God with us. He is the clear, revealed standard of morality, whether through his vocal declarations or his continuing word by his spirit and life, inwardly shedding light on truth and practice.

They are the planters of morality, of honesty, of civic righteousness, of peace on earth, of reform from vice by regeneration, of respect for the rights of labor—whether labor as coined into the sweat of the brow, or into dollars of the rich as the wheels of industry—they are the planters of all Reform who plant the standard of the Gospel as the standard of morality for the hearts of men. Inculcate the living Christ as the inspeaking Spirit of all true living and the Saviour from sin, and we inculcate all reforms under the one change of heart more radically than by beating at item after item in detail. The love which is the fulfilling of the law, is the realized love of God in Christ Jesus.

The letters of our friends, William C. Allen and William B. Harvey, now current in THE FRIEND, describing some of their daily experiences in Porto Rico and other West Indies islands, are family letters such as men would naturally send to their homes, and were not written for publication, or as their spiritual diary during travel in religious service. Such spiritual history of their experiences is regularly written, and kept to themselves. But the more outward aspects of their journeyings being of general interest are allowed us for publication, at the risk of our mentioning matters of personal detail. The average reader should not measure their religious labor and exercise by these lighter and outward recitals. Their inward conflicts and trials of spirit as well as of flesh have been many, and, we believe, enough is presented in the printed accounts of their meetings to edify readers, and show to the young of our generation that the hand of our Lord is still extended toward our people.

The Good News from the Valleys of Wales.

We have heard a great deal during the recent months from the seat of war in the Far East; we have had brought to us many exciting items telling of the discord and death in the home dominions of the Tsar; the debates in Congress on statehood, building more battleships, the railroad rate bills, etc., have been daily dealt out, the horrors of a white slave traffic even in the City of Penn have confronted and shamed us, while the tale of crime from the local courts has given assurance that moral conditions right in our midst are not what they ought to be, but—have you heard the good news from the valleys of Wales?

For several months past reports of a wonderful sort have come up to London from around Cardiff and the land of the ancient Cymri, and it is all about an almost unheard of work of Divine grace. Individual observers and delegated committees have proceeded thither to satisfy themselves of the reality of this fire which consumes the chaff of the old nature of man and woman and child, and makes of them new and spiritually transformed creatures. Let us read a passage from the report furnished by a special commission sent by the (London) Christian World to study this present revival in Wales.

"A revival," it says, "which reconciles people who have not spoken to each other for years, which reunites separated husbands and wives, which restores prodigal sons and daughters to heart-broken parents, which amazes tradesmen by filling their tills with money they had given up as hopelessly bad debts, which stops swearing, drinking, gambling, and scamping of work, which makes advocates declare that there is no work for them in the police courts, which brings Magdalenes by the score from the streets to the big pew, where penitents are dealt with, which closes low drinking clubs by members, almost to a man, returning their tickets of membership, which sends betting bookmakers back to earn their honest living in the colliery or in their old trades—this is a revival that was bound to win the respect of even the non-church-going man in the street."

I had occasion one afternoon recently to visit Philadelphia's north-lying suburb of Cynwyd. Being a stranger in the place, I asked a lad, just out from the city with his school books, if he could direct me to the house which I sought. He could; he was going very near there. As we walked I referred to the Welsh name of the attractive settlement, and to its neighbor, Bala, also Welsh, and to the road Montgomery along which we strode, so named from a shire of Wales; next spoke of the body of Friends who had early come to the colony from Wales and located not far away, the Robertses and Joneses and Evanses and others, then turning towards him, I asked whether he had heard the recent wonderful news from Wales. No, he had not; what was it all about? He was told that in the south part of Wales there had been a great strike of miners which had been going on for months, and nobody knew how or when it would be settled, but suddenly, in a very little while, almost before any one realized how it came about, there was an end of the trouble, and the men were all back at their work. And then the miners who drove the horses and mules in the deep galleries below the ground, men who had been always in the habit of beating and cursing the beasts, now treated them most kindly and spoke in the gentlest of tones. The tradesmen, too, were having debts paid to them that they had thought were hopelessly lost, and husbands who had drank and gambled and beaten their wives were now sober, kind, well disposed and supporting their families. How did all these remarkable things come about? The boy with the school-books didn't know; it was certainly very strange. There was only one thing, he was told, that could work so singular a transformation, and that was Divine grace, the direct work of the Holy Spirit upon the hearts of men, and that was what had come upon the miners and many others, a great many thousands of them, in the south of Wales.

While the leadership of man is disclaimed in this great religious revival, there is one, Evan Roberts, lately a worker in the Broad oak Colliery, who has been prominent throughout. He is the son of Methodist parents, an acknowledged poet, having contributed many fine verses to the Cardiff Times. Of a pious disposition, he had been for years a church member, but not truly a Christian. His own words three months ago thereabout were: "Some people had said he was a Methodist. He did not know what he was. Sectarianism melted in the fire of the Holy Spirit, and all men who believed became one happy family. For years he was a faithful member of the church, a zealous worker and a free giver. But he had recently discovered that he was not a Christian, and there were thousands like him. It was only since he had made that discovery that a new light had come into his life. The same light was shining upon all men if they would but open their eyes and their hearts."

This all-important change had come to him in the summer, less than a year and a half ago. He had been in the habit of taking his Bible down the mine, and while at work would put it away in some convenient hole or nook near his working place, ready to snatch it up at any time. He felt that he might have a call to the Gospel ministry. A serious explosion occurred one day, and his narrow escape from death deepened his religious impressions, and he gave much time to prayer. He was about going to a "divinity school," but the light dawned upon him in the privacy of his own room. His soul was filled, as he says, "with unspeakable joy," finding himself, as it seemed, in the very presence of the Almighty God, so that he could speak to Him face to face. For many mornings was he thus favored, and then he thought he must go on to the college to prepare for the ministry, as previously determined. And then came further light, but it was through darkness. The way to college was closed, and the heart of Evan became as stone. The Lord Himself had prepared him, and, in the interim of several weeks, he was told to go speak to the people. The particulars of what followed can not now be given, but the keynote is, that sin must be forsaken, wrongs must be made right, everything doubtful removed once for all out of the life, obedience prompt and implicit be given the Holy Spirit, and Christ, the Saviour, be confessed before the world.

The eminent Congregational minister, G.

Campbell Morgan, went to the scene of revival, but, after being recognized, and speaking briefly, was so impressed with the feel that he should keep in the background, that he did not continue his attendance. "There is no preaching," he said, "no prearranged order, no hymns, no books, no choruses, no organ collections, and, finally, no advertising. Now, think of that for a moment, again. That of all our work. I am not saying these things are wrong. I simply want you to see what God is doing. They were the organs, silent; the ministers, but among the rest the people, rejoicing and prophesying to the rest, only there was no preaching. The Welsh revival is the revival of preaching to Wales. Everybody is preaching. No one, and yet it moves from day to day, week to week, county to county, with the order of an attacking force. No books, but, as we nearly wept to-night over the singing of the last hymn." The Welsh venerate their bards, and for centuries have been a people of especially poetic temperament, but Evan Roberts counsels them not to sing if they cannot do so with the spirit and understanding, rather to relapse into silence, "An effective reason," as W. T. Stead testified in speaking of the revival, "to the practice of the Society of Friends." This, which I read to-day concerning the practice of that people by a writer in the Australian Friend, reveals what appears to be the strong and vital point of the Welsh Revival:

"The cardinal principle of our worship is that we enter on it without any preconceived plan as to the form it shall take upon the occasion, but we leave this to be determined under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit acting upon the hearts of the congregation there gathered. Thus we acknowledge in the fullest degree possible the actual Lordship of Christ in his worshipping Church."

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

ANECDOTE OF RICHARD JORDAN.—In the prosecution of a religious visit, it happened that a minister who entertained a different opinion of herself, expected to pass through a part of the country, in which another he was noted for his much speaking had just been holding large crowded meetings. She apprehended that her service would be regarded with little esteem by those who measured ministry according to the number of words—and, to some discouragement at the prospect. On mentioning it to R. Jordan, he remarked, "at a little with the Master's blessing would amount to multitudes," but without that it required words.

A FEW POINTS.—Obscurity is no proof of depth.

Simplicity is the mark of perfection.

If the word is a fire in the preacher's heart, it will soon find its way to the hearer's heart. It takes more to move a man than to instruct him.

A farthing candle will lighten the face of a rock, but it takes dynamite to shift it.

Sensations grow stale, polemics become wearisome, fireworks die out, and even spectacles lose their charms; but the ministry opens men's eyes and turns them to God all the while forever.—S. C. Leeds.

Declaration of London Yearly Meeting, 1829. In order to prevent any misapprehension as our views, we feel ourselves called upon, this time, to avow our belief in the inspiration and divine authority of the Old and New Testament.

We further believe, that the promise made for the transgression of our first parents, in consequences of whose fall all the posterity of Adam are involved, that the seed of the man should bruise the head of the serpent; the declaration unto Abraham, "In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed," had a direct reference to the coming of the flesh of the Lord Jesus Christ. To Him, also, did the Prophet Isaiah bear testimony, when he declared, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace: of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." And again, the Prophet spoke of him when he said, "Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted; but he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed." The same blessed Redeemer is emphatically denominated by the Prophet Jeremiah, "The Lord our Righteousness." It is that God, and in that miraculous manner which God in his perfect wisdom saw fit, the promised Messiah appeared personally upon the earth, when "He took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham." He "was in all points tempted as we are, yet without sin." Having finished the work which was given him to do, he gave himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God. He tasted death for every man. He is the propitiation for our sins; and for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." "We have redemption through blood, even the forgiveness of sins." He ascended into the heavens; and being the brightness of the glory of God, "and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high; and ever liveth to make intercession for us."

It is by the Lord Jesus Christ that the world will be judged in righteousness. He is the mediator of the new covenant; "the image of the invisible God, the first born of every creature: for by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by Him, and for Him: and all things before all things, and by Him all things were sustained." "In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily;" and to Him did the Angelist bear testimony when he said "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. And the same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by Him; and without Him, was not anything made that was made. In Him was the life, and the life was the light of men." He is the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

Our blessed Lord himself spoke of his perpetual dominion and power in his church, when He said "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life;" and, when describing the spiritual food which he bestoweth on the true believers, He declared, "I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst." He spoke also of his saving grace, bestowed on those who come in faith unto Him, when he said "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life."

Our religious Society, from its earliest establishment to the present day, has received these most important doctrines of Holy Scripture in their plain and obvious acceptation; and we do not acknowledge as in fellowship with us, as a Christian community and body of religious professors which does not thus accept them, or which openly receives and accredits as ministers, those who attempt to invalidate any of these doctrines which we esteem as essential parts of the Christian religion.

It is the earnest desire of this meeting, that all who profess our name, may so live and so walk before God, as that they may know these sacred truths to be blessed to them individually. We desire that, as the mere profession of sound Christian doctrine will not avail to the salvation of the soul, all may attain to a living efficacious faith, which, through the power of the Holy Ghost, bringeth forth fruit unto holiness; the end whereof is everlasting life through Jesus Christ our Lord. "Blessing, and honor, and glory and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever."

A NEGLECTED SOCIETY.—Other wives who see but little of their husbands, will appreciate the point of a woman's remark when she tried to arrange a dinner invitation on an evening when her husband would be at home.

"Will it suit you to-night, John?"
 "No, my dear; I must attend the meeting of the Ancient Order of Foresters to-night."
 "Well, to-morrow evening?"
 "I have the Royal Arcanum, and you know—"
 "What about Wednesday evening?"
 "Oh, the Odd Fellows meet that night; on Thursday evening I have a meeting of the Knights of Labor to attend; on Friday the Royal Templars of Temperance; on Saturday there's a special meeting of the Masonic lodge, and I couldn't miss that; and then on Sunday night—let me see—what is there on Sunday night, my dear?"

"The Grand and Ancient Order of Christian Fellowship."

"Why, I have forgotten. Am I a member of that? Let me see—"

"And you have forgotten another Society, John, of which you were once a member."

"What's that?"
 "Your wife's society."

AFTER all, it is the truth of God sent warm and straight into the individual conscience and heart that proves character-forming and life-permeating and controlling.

Outside Observations on the Service of the Ministry.

[Many honest declarations of representatives of various churches might seem in this day to relieve us of quoting early Friends' tracts concerning a spurious ministry. They sometimes speak as sharply as a Friend could wish. In the following quotations that which is named as a call will not appear to reach to the same depths that would satisfy a Friend. A general call once for all is assumed to be sufficient,—then the minister goes on as best his talents may prosper him, desiring indeed divine assistance, taking it for granted, but not depending on the witness of it for each service,—or on the influence of the Holy Spirit being perceptible. Friends, when they are such, depend not only on a first call, leading them into the service, but on the successive calls within the call,—as many calls as there are services authorized by the Witness.

We quote first this utterance of Lyman Abbott before a thousand men, Eleventh Month 20th:

"The most sacrilegious evil in America at the present time is that many of the preachers in some of our celebrated churches preach the word of God not because they earnestly believe what they are saying, but because they receive large salaries for their labors. Some of these men do not give one penny toward relieving the sufferings of their fellow-man."

The next is an article in the Episcopal Recorder a few days later:—Ed.]

It cannot be denied, judging from their actions, that some who are in the ministerial ranks have strange ideas respecting their service and obligations. And before proceeding further, it should be borne in mind that the ministry is entirely different from any secular calling. It is not one of whim, caprice, sentiment, profit or pleasure. It is, on the contrary, for the glory of God, the spread of the Gospel, and the salvation of souls.

What saith the Scripture? St. Paul, speaking of himself, says, Romans i: 1: "Called to be an apostle, separated unto the Gospel of God." Again, I Corinthians i: 1 "Called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ, through the will of God." Again, I Corinthians ix: 16, "Necessity is laid upon me: yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel." 1 Timothy: 12, "Putting me into the ministry." 2 Timothy: 11, "Whereunto I am appointed a preacher and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles."

Here is the Divine call, according to the Gospel. Nay, further. St. Paul also speaks of the Jewish priesthood as Divinely called for, he says, Hebrews v: 4, "No man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron."

There is nothing to imply, in any of the foregoing portions of the Word, that the ministry is of temporary service, to be dropped or resumed at pleasure, or formally relinquished.

The Church at large realizes that the ministry should be Divinely called. We now speak more particularly of the Church of England, the Protestant Episcopal Church, and the Reformed Episcopal Church.

In the ordination to the Diaconate in the Church of England, the Presiding Bishop asks the following question: "Do you trust you are inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost to take up on you this office and ministration, to serve God for the promotion of His Glory and the edifying of His people?" Answer, "I trust so."

The Protestant Episcopal Church propounds the same question. Likewise the Reform Episcopal Church.

The Church of England, in the ordination to the priesthood, asks: "Do you think in your heart that you are truly called according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the order of this United Church of England and Ireland, to the order and ministry of priesthood?"

The Protestant Episcopal Church has the same formula, except the latter clause referring to the Church in England and Ireland.

The Church of England, in the consecration of bishops, asks: "Are you persuaded that you be truly called to this ministration, according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ and the order of this realm?"

The Protestant Episcopal Church has the same, except the word "realm," Church being substituted.

The Reform Episcopal Church has the same as the Protestant Episcopal Church.

It will be observed that the words, "inwardly moved of the Holy Ghost," in all the foregoing, occurs only in the ordination of the diaconate. In that of priest and bishop, the words, "truly called," are alone used. Bishop White, in his "Commentaries Suited to Occasions of Ordination," says: "To some it may seem a material omission that in this service (the ordination for priests) there is no such question as the first in the service for deacons—"Do you trust that you are inwardly moved of the Holy Ghost," * * * If the deacon have been sincere in his former answer, he may be presumed to be still under the same bent of disposition."

As far as possible, then, care is taken to ascertain that the respective candidates are divinely called to the ministerial office.

This article has been written because of some parties (all ordained in the Protestant Episcopal Church), recently brought to the notice of the writer, who now no longer minister at her altars. Of these, one had some difficulty with his bishop, ceased preaching, dropped the title of "Rev.," and is now writing magazine stories. Another quarreled with his vestry, resigned his charge, and announced that he should engage in "literary work." Another simply said that he would also engage in "literary work," in lieu of the ministry.

The question is, were these parties, and others like them in different denominations ever really "inwardly moved of the Holy Ghost" to preach the Gospel? Yet they so asserted in their ordination. Why, then, do they act otherwise?

Had they correct views of the ministry before engaging in it? It is to be gravely doubted. The ministerial office is neither a bower of ease or a bed of roses. It means often great worldly sacrifice; severe mental toil and application; a constant witnessing for Christ, often in face of scorn, neglect and ridicule; many privations; many misrepresentations; great opposition, particularly when offence is given in faithfully and fearlessly preaching the Gospel; a great trial of faith in things temporal. Had all these been primarily considered? Had they any knowledge of the plague in their own hearts? Had they fully understood the plan of salvation? Had they ever experienced the new birth? Had they ever felt the constraining love of Christ? Did they yearn for souls? Did they look upon the appalling condition of so-called modern Christendom at the present day, unmoved and indifferent? If so, how could they lay hold of the plough and look backward?

Johr Newton, who knew as well as any man, and far better than many, speaking of a ministerial call, says to his friend, who had recently obtained a living: "I believe God has given you a desire to be useful to souls. Church preferment, in any other view, is dreadful, and I would as soon congratulate a man upon seeing a millstone tied about his neck, to sink him into the depths of the sea, as upon his obtaining what is called a good living, except I thought him determined to spend and be spent in the cause of the Gospel. A parish is an awful millstone, indeed, to those who see nothing valuable in the flock but in the fleece."

Bishop White says: "If the motive be either wealth or maintenance, it is corrupt; coming under the censure which St. Paul passes on those who undertake the ministry 'for filthy lucre's sake.'" Again he says: "For a father to destine his son to the ministry for some secular object to be accomplished, and the project to be carried into effect without any reference to qualifications, and especially the essential qualifications of love and zeal for the work, and desire of being useful in it, is to bring on them both a heavy load of sin."

The testimony of Thomas Scott, the well-known commentator, may here be mentioned.

He entered holy orders while as yet dead in trespasses and sins. True, the Lord overruled his presumption and wickedness, eventually to His glory, and his subsequent history is too well-known to be repeated. But let him speak for himself: "Thus, with a heart full of pride and wickedness, my life polluted with many unrepented, unforsaken sins, without one cry for mercy, one prayer for direction or assistance, or for a blessing on what I was about to do; after having concealed my sentiments under the mask of general expressions after having subscribed to articles directly contrary to what I believed; and after having blasphemously declared, in the presence of God and of the congregation, in the most solemn manner, sealing it with the Lord's Supper, that I judged myself to be 'inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost' to take that office upon me, not knowing or believing that there was any Holy Ghost, on September 20th, 1772, I was ordained a deacon." "Forever blessed be the God of all long-suffering and mercy, who had patience with such a rebel and blasphemer, such an irreverent trifler with His majesty, and such a presumptuous intruder into His sacred ministry."

Every ministerial candidate should be reasonably certain that he is Divinely called to the sacred office. Some enter it with the foolish plea of respectability or social advantage. Some, with literary aspirations. Some from a monkish sentiment, with longing for an ivy-covered ancient church and rectory, rich with historical associations and a mediaeval past.

But let all such remember the warning those like Bishop White, John Newton, Thomas Scott, before they distinguished themselves by their folly.

It may be fearlessly asserted that no one who has ever entered the ministry from a conviction of a Divine call, for the love of so has ever regretted so doing. They may come weary in it, but not of it; they may have many trials, they may not always see the fruit of their labors, they may have much to cheer their faith—but they are cheered with the thought that they are laborers together with God, and may be the honored instruments saving souls. They are not enticed or switched with "literary work;" their principle "literary work" is the study of God's Holy Word, and the realization of its undying promises. Their boast is not that of authors, ephemeral at best, but of God, with whom righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.

It is clearly contrary to the implied teachings of the New Testament that the office of the ministry should be set aside, at pleasure, as a garment. Such a procedure makes light of it, and casts dishonor upon it.

There are cases when ministers may cease their labors. They may be set aside by sickness, loss of voice, long-continued sickness or accident. These may be considered prudential restraints and intimations, and such, should be heeded. Even Paul and Timothy were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the Word in Asia, but why, is not known. Suffice it to say, this was the Lord's will, some wise and inscrutable purpose. In James' version of the New Testament it is not said, however, that they were directed to take up "literary work," in lieu thereof. Perhaps higher criticism, and modern culture and some hitherto unknown but hidden sin of a new Gospel may explain the matter, the satisfaction of these cleric literary artists.

NAMES APPLIED TO MINISTERS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.—They are called "ambassadors of Christ," "angels of the Church," "apostles," "apostles of Jesus Christ," "defenders of the faith," "elders," "evangelists," "fishers of men," "laborers with Christ," "men of God," "messengers of the Church," "messengers of the Lord of hosts," "ministers of God," "of the Lord," "of Christ," "of the sanctuary," "of the gospel," "of the word," "of the new Testament," "of the Church," "of righteousness," "They are called "overscers," "pastors," "preachers," "preachers of righteousness," "servants of God," "of the Most High," "of Jesus Christ," "of the Church," "shepherds," "soldiers of Christ," "stars," "pillars of God," "of the grace of God," "clerk-mysteries of God," "teachers," "watchmen," "witnesses," "workers together with Christ," etc.

It needs a Christian to understand that before we label any one as a failure we must know the reason why he failed. Whether the reason was not because the men by whom he was surrounded rather than his own incapacity. So of religious truth, or a Society professing it.

A Visit to Porto Rico.

first Month 30th. — This afternoon our ing at the penitentiary was held, though y somewhat delayed because our inter-r was tardy. The warden hoped nothing d be said to antagonize other religions, and was very kind. It was a study in an nature to see such a mass of humanity; rs, yet all having souls possible to be d at last; and they evidently very much ociated having a heart message of gospel preached with Divine authority; telling e Saviour's love even of sinners, and of hope of salvation through Him, if we for-our sins. The interpreter was J. R. ls, who has been a missionary at San an, but is now in the custom house. It important to try to get some one for such e who is accustomed to Bible terms, language of the kingdom," as the secy of the Y. M. C. A. put it this morning.
W. C. A. appeared in supplication, I all the prisoners kneeled. It was surely pressive occasion throughout. The great n doors stood wide open during the meetand one of the gates, though another near the street was closed, and men with seem to be ever present outside. One thirteen years old is serving a three years' nce for manslaughter. They do not seem actice capital punishment on the island.
ere are so many things here that we don't in the north. Pumpkins and the like on trees, as does bread (bread-fruit); on bushes higher than one's head, goose-s (in taste) though shaped like tomatoes small) grow in strings on trees, bushes em to a tree, and doubtless many things e neglected to note which were observed ch as the lumbering pelicans, which we only between Mayaguez and Aguadilla, a number of them. The land birds seem
; I fear they have been killed. The rock ations, so far as I have observed, are ly limestone.

San Juan, Second Month 3d. — It appears the contagious nature of leprosy is not reat as is supposed. The man who is in e has a family—wife and children—and to them every week; and a colored woman leper does the laundry work for the y.

ocean's waves breaking on the rock-e island kept up such a continuous roar one could not be heard from afar, and ept on the windward side of the patients, was also the safer side. Words cannot e in language too strong what it is to be er. . . Finally the vital parts are reached e disease and then comes relief. Is it s a relief? That it might be such was bject of this visit.

accompanied Dr. Baez and the presiding
r, who with long dusters and rubber shoes their rounds. It appears that only one e women's ward could read, a colored n who had to use crutches. How ace lighted up when she heard that a l message was likely to be given them.
licism seemed strongly entrenched here, ver, and most of the women were afraid "Protestant priest," but they did come in the porch, and evidently found solace e words of comfort and cheer which W.

C. A. was favored to present to them, and were thankful.

The reception at the men's quarters was quite different, as there seemed no prejudice; and I know of no better way to express their appreciation of having the gospel preached than in comparing them to a nest of hungry young birds, with gaping mouths, having heard the flutter of the parent laden with food for her flock.

The two buildings are perhaps one hundred and fifty yards apart. When the men were informed of the proposed service there was a stir.
The most apparently helpless man, a black man, shouted the message with keen animation, his face lighting up, and with his mere stumps of fists and bare apologies for feet, all doubled up, he worked his way over to the edge of the corridor. The others came promptly, and it was surely an affecting scene.
W. C. A. had such an encouraging, comforting message for them; and how happy will it be if they, poor creatures, may find solace in their sufferings, and when the time comes to put away those wretched bodies and be called on high!

Fourth-day morning we went out to Rio Piedras to the Normal School of Porto Rico.
There are good reasons for great care being observed regarding religious instruction in the public schools, but it does seem a pity that no Bible reading is allowed. The Superintendent, Paul G. Miller, of Wisconsin, asked us to be present at the afternoon opening. So we visited schools in the normal department, also in the preparatory school on the same campus, where the prospective teachers do teaching work. These and other Porto Rican youngsters are being treated very differently from the practices in use before the American occupation. Prior to this the children studied aloud, expecting the teacher, who was regarded as a servant, to do their thinking for them; and the Alcalde as he went his rounds largely gauged his teachers by the racket in the school-rooms, and the instructor who had a quiet room was in danger of losing his salary.

At the Normal, noon came soon enough.
We accompanied the principal to the mid-day meal, the rain pelting our umbrellas, which,
by the way, are most important appendages,
—the natives use them sometimes to keep off the moonshine. At the opening of the afternoon session we had an opportunity with the prospective teachers, and a serious talk with them regarding their influence in moulding the character of the children of Porto Rico later on. It was really a religious meeting, and I am sure it did not, and will not, hurt any one.

It is such a pity that so large a percentage of Americans down here give so little heed to religion, or to endeavoring to raise the moral tone among the people. Pleasure and money seem to be the aim. The almost utter lack of bitter feeling among the military forces, which are more in evidence here than in any city I ever visited, is indeed sad. Perhaps the boys are no more to blame than the brutalizing system under which they have trained. If one is stirred by the Saviour's love, he is taunted so cruelly that practically almost without exception the poor fellows have led godless lives.

Yesterday afternoon (Second Month 2nd), we lunched by invitation at Judge McLeary's, then went out to his plantation on the trolley line near Rio Piedras. We walked over the place among the acres of young orange trees and pineapples, and on avenues of cocoa palms intersecting at various places. To secure these the ripe coconuts are buried very slightly; they sprout in from six to eight months, then they are planted, nut and all, where they are to remain, the nut not being quite hidden. We saw the peons planting trees; they can't wait until they reach the dormant stage. A group of women were washing scale insects from the leaves with brushes, and they receive twenty-five cents per day, and it is tiresome work. But they seemed happy, and of course know no other life.

Second-day, Second Month 5th. — The Serran came in this morning and we are to start somewhat after four this afternoon. We shall have plenty of room, as her capacity is one hundred or more. There seems to be a very comfortable feeling all round. W. B. H.

Animals' Instinctive Sense of Character.

That celebrated trainer of wild animals, and manager of a great show for many years, F. C. Bostock, has written a thrilling book about animal-training; and he makes this assertion, that the first requisite of the animal-trainer is good personal habits. "In some curious, incomprehensible way," he says,
"wild animals know instinctively whether men are addicted to bad habits. It is one of the many problems that are beyond human understanding. For those who are in the least inclined to drink, or live a loose life, the wild animal has neither fear nor respect. He de-spises them with all the contempt of his nature, and recognizes neither their authority nor their superiority. If a man has begun to take just a little, or deviated somewhat from the straight road, the animals will discover it long before his fellow-men."

This is certainly a strange fact. But that it is beyond human understanding is not so sure. Bad habits mean lack of self-control and of strength. The quality in the trainer which dominates the animal nature within him is precisely the quality that dominates the animals he trains. If he yields to the brute within him, no matter how little, his perfect poise and mastery are gone, and the keen instinct of the wild beast recognizes it instantly.
Before the slower perceptions of men find out his loss of dignity and control, the beasts understand his degradation to their level, and his life is in danger every moment he is in their cages.

"Absolute personal integrity" is the first condition necessary for the successful lion-tamer. He who rules his own nature, and he only, can have dominion over the beasts, as Adam before the fall. Self-mastery is the distinction between man and the brute. Sin is not a gain, a strength; it is degrading weakness, always. It is a pity that, while the wild beast recognizes this fact so surely, we sometimes forget it; and this leaf from the trainer's experience should help to remind us all.
—Forward.

Those who make the religion of Christ their business, never go into bankruptcy.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In the Ninth Month, 1860, Thomas Evans as clerk of the Committee wrote as follows to Abel H. Blackburn and other Friends at Tunesassa—"The attention of the Committee was turned to the propriety of seeing that the natives who can read should be furnished with copies of the Holy Scriptures, and it is probable we shall forward some more copies to you for the purpose. Every family where there are persons who can read, and who would be disposed to make a right use of the Bible we think should have one." He also added the following encouraging and sympathizing words, "We are sensible that many difficulties and discouragements, as well as privations, attend the prosecution of the work in which you are engaged, and that nothing but a lively exercise of spirit can prevent their producing a state of weakness and indifference of mind.

"It was not from any motives of interest that our worthy forefathers engaged in this benevolent work, but from a sense of religious duty, and a measure of that universal love which desires the welfare and happiness of the whole human family. We crave for you, dear friends, the animating and cheering influences of this precious love, which will enliven your spirits and keep them closely engaged in the service before you, make your labor pleasant, draw the minds of the natives more and more to you, as like begets its like, and from day to day yield you the sweet incomes of heavenly peace, while you will have the cheering hope that the blessing of the Lord will crown your diligent and honest efforts for the welfare of these poor and down-trodden people.

"We tenderly sympathize with you and desire to offer you the salutation of our affectionate regard."

In the First Month, 1862, Abel H. and Caroline Blackburn having been released on their own request, left the Institution, and Catharine Lee, Thomazine Valentine, and Catharine Battin (the latter of whom had previously been acceptably engaged there for a time), joined Abner Woolman and his daughter Abigail in the management of the school and care of the children.

Ebenezer Worth and Joseph Elkinton accompanied two of the women Friends above mentioned to Tunesassa, and spent some days in visiting among the Indians in different parts of the Reservation, who treated them with kindness and appeared willing to hear all they had to say to them. These Friends remark in a report of their observations made upon their return home. "The great increase of white people who have settled within the past few years on the Indian lands near the railroad stations is a cause of sorrow and discouragement, as there is reason to fear if a check is not put to it, it may result in the loss of the Allegheny Reservation to the Indians, of the danger of which some of them appear to be in a degree sensible."

In 1863 John Wood, Richard B. Bailey, Samuel Bettle [Jr.], Marmaduke C. Cope, Jacob Edge, Samuel Morris, Aaron Sharpless and Joseph Scattergood were added to the Committee by the Yearly Meeting.

The following extract from a letter from a young Indian woman who had spent some years at the Boarding School, and had also taught among her people, is interesting as showing the religious experience of the writer. It was addressed to the late Joseph Elkinton: "Old Town, June 6th, 1863.

"I received your letter some time ago. I am glad to hear that you are in your usual health, and also your family. We are also blessed with good health, so that we can be about our work, we are getting along very well. We have a man who does the work on our farm, we are very well satisfied with him.

"I do not wish to be any better off than I am now, for I believe our Heavenly Father is with us. He takes care of us, and gives us everything we need; we have all our bodily wants, and He is very willing to give us our spiritual wants if we ask Him for it. I wish I could say that I desire it more than anything else, that I do really try with full purpose of heart to love Him and to do his will at all times.

"But I am afraid I am too forgetful to entertain such thoughts in my heart always; very often I find myself going backward, the adversary gets the advantage of me, and this gives me pain and sorrow, and then I do not feel like praying because I think I break his commandments too often, and that He will not forgive me, but through adorable mercy, these thoughts go away, and I feel willing to pray and ask for forgiveness, through Christ Jesus our Saviour."

In 1864 a tax was levied upon the inhabitants of South Valley Township, Cattaraugus Co., New York, in order to refund money which had been borrowed to pay bounty to soldiers, who had enlisted during the war then just closing. As this was a demand which Friends could not comply with, payment of the tax was refused by Abner Woolman, in whose name the bill was made out, in consequence of which three cows were taken to be sold at public sale.

Joseph Elkinton, Joseph Scattergood and Samuel Morris were then at Tunesassa, and upon appointment by the Committee, and apprehending that these persons who might assemble for the purpose of purchasing the cows might not understand why Friends refused to pay the tax, the following statement was prepared, which Abner Woolman read at the time of sale, viz: "This company may be informed that the cows now about to be sold are not the property of Abner Woolman as advertised, but of the Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends that meets in Philadelphia, on whose account this farm was purchased, and the school established for the benefit of the Indians. The cows have been seized by the collector to pay a tax for the exclusive purpose of raising money to hire soldiers, which the members of the Society of Friends cannot consistently do with their religious principles. They believe the precepts and commands of our Saviour forbid all wars and fightings and they are therefore conscientiously restrained from promoting or conniving at war in any way, and it is for this reason, and this only, that payment of the tax has been refused." Two cows only were sold. They brought twenty dollars more than the demand. The excess was tendered to Abner Woolman but he refused to receive it.

The Friends above mentioned made a report to the Committee on their visit to Tunesassa, from which the above account is taken and in which they also made a statement of their observations upon the condition of Indians at that time, which contains some interesting particulars. The following extracts are taken from this report: "On the Allegheny Reservation the white settlers are now numerous, and the interest of the public connection with the railroads upon it is great, we cannot expect a diminution of the number or the bad influences arising from them. But on the contrary there is a strong probability that on the northeastern end of the Reservation, and especially around stations and depots of the railroads they will continue to increase.

"By the census taken last month by Harlow Half-ton, for the purpose of distributing United States annuity the number of Senecas is 842, viz: 220 men, 230 women, and 392 children. It is estimated there are 150 Cadagas residing on the Reservation including them, the whole number is 992, and since an increase since 1845 of 209. The number of families is about 180 and it is believed there are at least 300 children of age to go to school."

An Appeal to First Principles.

The principal of one of the public schools of Chicago has long been a favorite with the pupils because of the whole-hearted manner which he enters into their school life. Debates, junior city councils, clubs of various kinds bring them into intimate relations with him and add interest to their studies. During the early days of the war between Russia and Japan it was suggested that each power should arm privateers and send them out to destroy the other's commerce. The principal, while discussing news of the day with his eighth-grade boys, brought up the question of privateers and said, "Shouldn't we stop it?" demanded an answer in a front seat.

"Why?" asked the principal.

"Because it would not be right."

"Why would it not?"

"Debate! Debate!" came a cry from the front quarters. The principal smiled and acquiesced and was at once chosen first speaker for the affirmative. The boy who raised the question was selected to defend the negative.

The principal is a large and pompous man but has a great and saving grace of good humor. Standing before the roomful of children, he leaned forward, placed his hand on the top of a desk and began, impressively, to deliver his argument.

He based it chiefly on history. How much of the history of war and of privateering brought the boys down to the Revolutionary War of 1812, went into the story of Alabama and the Florida, and assured the pupils that when two nations were at war each of them was justified in taking whatever means it could to injure the other. They were manifestly impressed. Their patriotic spirit was roused. They applauded enthusiastically.

men the boy rose to reply. He was not a great lad in his studies, but, as the issue ended, he had convictions for which he was afraid to argue. Unconsciously imitating the principal, he leaned forward upon his desk began impressively. "Children," he said, "how many of you go to church and Sunday school?" There was an immediate and general uplift of hands.

How many of you have been taught the commandments?" Every hand remained raised.

How many of you remember that one of ten commandments is, 'Thou shalt not kill?'"

Every one remembered it.

How many of you remember that another commandment is, 'Thou shalt not kill?'"

That, too, was generally known.

"Children," said the youngster, as if he were an old man addressing them, "the business of a privateer is killing and stealing. It goes out to kill the sailors of the other side and to steal what they have got. It does not say, 'Thou shalt not kill except me of war.' It does not say, 'Thou shalt not steal unless you are a privateer.' It says only you shall not kill or steal at any time. There is no question of right or wrong to be decided here. You all know that. It does not matter whether one is a privateer or a regular soldier or sailor. His business, when it comes to killing or stealing, is wrong, and the Bible is so."

That said down, and the vote was taken. It was overwhelmingly in his favor. The principal to his feet and smiled.

"Boys," he said, "I am proud of your decision. The ten commandments are not donele."—Youth's Companion.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Neglected Duty.

There is a duty now becoming much needed, of calling on our neighbors, especially near ones. A very common excuse is that we are too busy; but if we have health and strength, we can spend a few minutes, and not as has become so common among us, that they are sick. Very often a call is made at other times than in times of sickness. I believe that we should look after our neighbors, and also those that are not of our party. There are those among us who are alone on account of a loved one having been taken from them, and others who feel left alone in the world. The lack of this has caused many a heartache, and is as stumbling-block. John Estuagh's example is good one for us to follow, that of being just to the poor and neglected, and also fulfill the second commandment of Christ toward them, viz: to love our neighbors as ourselves.

COLUMBIA, Ohio, Third Month 6th, 1904.

THE FAITHFUL WITNESS.—When the Sun of righteousness makes daylight in the soul, judgments which it makes of what is good and evil are clear and correct. It sees the true nature of things, and into the character of all temptations, and does not let the evil for good, or bitter for sweet, be detected.

Science and Industry.

Autumn leaves containing sugar, such as the maples, sumacs, gums, etc., easily oxidize, and thus form the rich reds, purples and violets so beautiful to the eye. That is why these, especially the hard maples, give the most beautiful autumn leaves. Autumnal oak leaves do not attract admiration because they contain much tannin.

BRAN WATER.—A subscriber desires us to publish the following for the good of many.—

Overworked women who have the "nerves" should drink bran water between meals instead of tea, and instead of eating factory made biscuits or crackers or white bread and butter or "anything that is handy," when they feel faint.

The phosphates in the bran will develop a steadiness of nerve that will enable them to work out their life in such a way as to make overwork no longer necessary.

Bring three pints of water to a boil. Add a coffee cupful of bran—just ordinary bran such as the horses eat. Have the water actually boiling when the bran is put in and let it boil without a cover until the bran no longer floats on top of the water. Shaking the saucpan helps to settle it. Cover and boil slowly for ten minutes. Strain into a pitcher. Let it stand and settle for several hours and then pour off the top and drink it. It is best to repeat it if convenient. Drink two or three cupfuls a day.

Bran water does not taste particularly good, but it is not really bad either, and in this age of white flour it is just what every system needs.—Maxwell's Talisman.

"I SAW that a humble man, with the blessing of the Lord, might live on a little; and that where the heart was set on greatness, success in business did not satisfy the craving; but that commonly with an increase of wealth, the desire of wealth increased. There was a care on my mind, so to pass my time that nothing might hinder me from the most steady attention to the voice of the true Shepherd."—John Woolman.

"How dare I read Washington's campaigns," wrote one, "when I have not answered the letters of my own correspondents?" Self-culture is gained first by fulfilling scrupulously every daily obligation of duty, and next by study and thought. To reverse this order is not to be cultured, but only varnished with a selfish and surface knowledge. Culture means sincerity and completeness, and the young man or woman who neglects common daily duties will never win.—Forward.

Items Concerning the Society.

Anna B. Thomas is engaged in preparing a biography of her late husband, Richard H. Thomas, of Baltimore.

The death of John Wilhelm Rowntree, of York, England, on the 9th instant, of pneumonia, four days after he had arrived in this country, is a loss keenly felt in his own Yearly Meeting, where he was one of the most prominent and representative members, and by many who have highly appreciated him in this country. He had paid other visits to America, where he was widely known for scholarly attainments, and a deep interest in religious and social problems. He has of late been engaged on an extensive historical work, dealing with the development of Quakerism and its relation to the religious movements of the nineteenth century. For a young man of great wealth, talent, and university culture to come up from the state of an agnostic and espouse the cause of Christ, holding all things that were gain to him, "but as loss for Christ," denotes a genuine work of Divine grace submitted to as in such a quarter it is not usual to expect. Service not cut off, but transferred to larger development, seems the providence to be acknowledged under such disappointments of large expectations on earth.

Notes in General.

Lady Wimborne, wife of the millionaire iron master, has opened a book store in London, to meet the demand for "sound religious literature by society people."

Washington Gladden says: "Let us stop preaching about the gospel and begin to preach the gospel. Whether we are new theology men or old theology men let us send our unbelievers to the rear."

"The religious revival," the Outlook declares, "which would make Christian morality luminous must at the same time spirit ascend the care of moral barbarism, in whose darkness, mistaking respectability for morality, enormous evils flourish within hearing of church anthems."

"Ask the wine merchants and the grocery-men," says the pastoral letter of the bishop of New Jersey, "to those houses they carry spirituous liquors, and they will tell you to the homes of the rich and exclusive social set." But now that liquor merchants can carry the means of indulgence to the homes of our citizens under cover of their dry-goods delivery wagons, the domain of the private saloon in the home is spreading.

Extraordinary scenes were witnessed at Liverpool in connection with the annual Church of England Congress.

As a procession of bishops and clergy neared the Cathedral there were shouts from the great crowds in the streets of "Down with Popery." "Oh, for another Luther."

When the venerable Archbishop of York appeared, his silver cross of office held up before him, the crowd hooted and shrieked, "Traitors," "It is Popery in the streets." "Send them all to Rome."

Amid a storm of hissing and shouting the Archbishop passed into the Cathedral, unmoved by the uproar.

COURAGE IN WAR.—In the great naval battles that have occurred in the east, as in the great land battles, no doubt the Russians did game. So did the Japanese, so do the common soldiers and sailors of the most civilized peoples and of many semi-civilized and many barbarian peoples. No people in the world meet death with more nonchalance, or more grim stoicism, than the Turks or our North American Indians. To die recklessly in battle is a common trait, and argues no special nobility of character. Least of all does it give any indication of the righteousness of a cause, or possession of the traits that make for the glory of a nation in peace. To have a bulldog's fearless pugnacity does not demonstrate the possession of Christian, or even of moral, virtues. Bad men have it in common with the best men.—Boston Herald.

A writer to the Evening Telegraph wants a true revival. Why, for instance, says he, should business men who snatch a half hour at noonday to hear some prominent speaker, be compelled to listen to two or three long-drawn out solos by some who think they have a gift for song? What business men desire to hear is something that was promised to them, and not be compelled to wait thirty or forty minutes listening to solos and tedious announcements. Neither do they want any baby talk. Less than a week ago at a special service several hundred adults listened to an appeal which affected many hearts, but they were not allowed to leave until ten minutes or more had been wasted by another speaker who tried to be funny in his baby talk, which completely destroyed the impression made by the previous speaker. Avoid everything likely to divert the attention from the real work of the Christian teacher, and there will soon be a revival of religion.

Cornelius H. Patton, secretary of the home department of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, has made an investigation of the conditions under which the foreign missionaries of the board have been converted, asking two questions:

When and where were you hopefully converted? Was it in a revival of religion?

His replies show that between 1885 and 1895, 103 missionaries stated that they were converted in revivals, while 210, more than double that number, stated that the Christian life began unconsciously. In the next decade (1895 to 1905) 67 confessed a revival origin of their religious life, while 187 said otherwise. For the past twenty years, then, out of 567 appointments, 170 were converted in revivals and 397 not in revivals. "We have come almost to expect," says Secretary Patton, "that candidates to-day will say: 'I do not know when I became a Christian.'" The contrast of these figures with those for the first twenty years of the board is instructive. Up to 1836, of the ninety-seven missionaries whose life memoranda were being kept, 15 were converted in revivals and thirty-eight not in a revival. These figures, limited as they are, are said to plainly indicate that the nurture idea of the Christian life is gaining ground steadily. The fact that these persons are foreign missionaries, and hence have stood the test of the most exacting demands for Christian consecration and character gives additional weight to the conclusions."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In his recent inaugural address President Roosevelt said: "Much has been given to us, and much will rightfully be expected from us. We have duties to others and duties to ourselves, and we can shrink neither. We have become a great nation, forced by the fact of its greatness to relations with the other nations, and we must behave as becomese a people with such responsibilities. Toward all the other nations, large and small, our attitude must be one of cordial and sincere friendship. We must show not only in our words but in our deeds that we are earnestly desirous of securing their good will by acting toward them in a spirit of justice and generous recognition of their rights. But justice and generosity in a nation, as in an individual, count most where shown not by the weak but by the strong. While ever careful to refrain from wronging others, we must be no less insistent that we are not wronged ourselves."

The members of President Roosevelt's Cabinet are the same as during the administration of the late President, with the exception of the Postmaster-General, who is now Geo. B. Cortelyou. The President has sent to the special session of the Senate, now convened, the proposed treaty with San Domingo, which referred it to its Committee on Foreign Affairs, which, it is said, has amended the proposed treaty, striking out all declarations of general policy and all unnecessary provisions of a general nature, and retaining only the engagements. Thus amended, it is said, the treaty is a simple agreement on the part of the United States, at the request of San Domingo, to aid that country in the adjustment of its foreign indebtedness. The debts of San Domingo are said to be about $25,000,000.

By a unanimous vote the Senate of California has passed a concurrent resolution requesting and directing California's Senators and Representatives in Congress to call the attention of President Roosevelt and the Department of State to the menace of Japanese immigration. The resolution urges immediate action by treaty or otherwise, to limit further immigration of Japanese into the United States.

Governor Hanley, of Indiana, has signed an Anti-Cigarette bill, which prohibits any person by himself, clerk, servant, employer or agent, directly or indirectly, to manufacture, sell, exchange, barter, dispose of or give away, or keep for sale, any cigarette, cigarette-paper or cigarette-wrappers, or any paper made or prepared for the purpose of being filled with tobacco for smoking, or to keep or own or be in any way concerned, engaged or connected with any person by himself, clerk, servant, clerk, etc., in the manufacture, sale, exchange, barter, disposal or wrappers. For the first offense a fine not exceeding $50 may be imposed, and for a second offense a fine not exceeding $500, or a jail sentence of six months. It is to go into effect Sixth Month last.

A strike of employees upon the rapid transit system in New York City began on the 7th inst., by which great interruption to travel and annoyances resulted to a million or more people dependent upon that system for transportation to and from their business. The strike lasted but a few days, and was overruled by the national organization of the Brotherhood of Engineers, which has also expressed its disapproval of the course of the local union in changing its charter and excluding a number of the men formerly employed who failed in securing their late positions.

Dr. Leonard Pearson, State Veterinarian in Pennsylvania, has announced that a method of vaccinating cattle against tuberculosis has been carried out successfully for the first time in this State within the last two weeks. He said: "We have experimented with one hundred cows on one Delaware County farm. The results of our experiments show that by repeated operations cattle can be so highly vaccinated that danger of disease is virtually out of the question. Now we feel we are ready to begin to vaccinate animals on farms, and are confident the disease can be prevented at a comparatively small cost."

A program from Washington says: The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia has decided that a Porto Rican in this country possesses the necessary qualifications as to citizenship under the civil service regulations to make him eligible for employment in the Government service.

The Ojage Indians, who number about 1800 persons, have on deposit with the National Government nearly $9,000,000, the proceeds of land sold. The income from this money at 5 per cent. is $450,000 a year. They still own over 1,500,000 acres of land, or nearly 1000 acres each, which is valued at $20 an acre. Land valuable oil 75 cents a barrel. The income on the land last two weeks is receiving an income from this source, which is increasing with great rapidity.

The Senate of the State of Delaware has abolished the pillory by a vote of 14 to 2. The pillory was inherited by the American Colonies from England, which abolished the institution in 1837. It has been in use in Delaware since 1717. In urging the abandonment of this form of punishment, one of the Senators branded it as a relic of barbarism.

The astronomical observatory at Harvard is mounting a sixty-inch telescope on the east side of Observatory Hill. When it is completely fitted up it is said it will be the largest telescope of its kind in actual use in all the world. The observatory was the work of the late astronomer Dr. A. C. Cotton of England, where it was successfully used by him for private observation.

The effort to check the operations of the Standard Oil Company in unfairly competing with other oil producing companies made in various States has been begun in Cleveland. The Ohio Commission on the subject has been requested to examine into the conditions in that State, where the independents claim they are hampered in all efforts to compete with the Standard Oil Company, and that a serious situation confronts the producers who will not persist in the terms of the trust.

FOUNDED.—The results of the late defeat of the Russian Army in Manchuria is said to be that an enormous impetus has been given to the reform movement, but the immediate result chiefly dreaded is the effect on internal disorders, not only in the capital, but also, since St. Petersburg is not Russia, upon the millions of peasants in the vast agricultural regions, among whose spirit of revolt the struggle and arena in the district of Mukden. The number of Russian troops in the neighborhood of Mukden is said to have been 225,000, and of Japanese 400,000. These were engaged in furious fighting, more or less continuously for seventeen days, which resulted in the retreat of the Russians from Mukden, which they had occupied by the Japanese. The latter extended their line of operations to the northward, and to the westward, and in their retreat to the northward, they were pursued by the Japanese. Statements indicate that probably 90,000 men in the two armies have fallen. A dispatch says: In spite of the signal defeat of Russian armies at Mukden there is no disposition to take peace. The Government stands committed for war, the people have not yet found the voice bestowed them by the Tsar's rescript. It is stated on good authority that Japan twice has approached Russia through informal channels on the subject of peace negotia but in each case the proposal failed.

According to the Ontario mining bureau the produce of the Province of Ontario are not excelled in extent any country in the world, and are of ancient date, the basis of a large fuel supply. Also that fifty south of James Bay—past covers the land for hundreds of perhaps thousands of square miles and stretches w Hudson Bay.

A despatch from London of the 9th says: "Benckendorff, the Russian Ambassador to Great Britain, had paid $225,000 to the Secretary of State for settlement of the North Sea claims, and the incident thus closed.

A despatch of the 9th from Calcutta states that deaths from the plague last week numbered 30. Statistics show that the deaths from bubonic plague in India within a four years reach nearly 3,000,000. In 1903 the mortality in Bombay from the plague alone was 850,000. The infection recently spread to Bombay where it is making rapid strides. The Indian Government is making every effort to eradicate it, death by fire whole sections of towns and segregating the inhabitants.

It is stated that the great coal fields of China is a 600,000 square miles—twice the area of France more than seventy times the aggregate extent of the coal fields of Britain. The German geologist, Baron Richthofen, reported many years ago that both the anthracite and bituminous varieties were equal to the product in Europe.

It is stated that President Castro of Venezuela has issued a charter, granting important concessions to a colony of Boers and Irish to settle in the tract of land, which contains 76,000 square miles, and it is said to be covered with forests of mahogany and rubber trees; the minerals consisting of anthracite coal and gold.

DIED, at his home "Oaklands," Oaklyn, New Jersey, on the 23rd, 1904, WILLIAM BUTLER, in the seventh year of his age. A member of Haddon Monthly Meeting of Friends. "To him that overcometh I will give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name, which no man knoweth, saving he that receiveth it." He was born in Pasadena, California, on the morning of the 30th of First Mo., 1905, at the home of her son, J. W. Patterson, ASENATH H. EDGERTON, in the second year of her age. A beloved elder and member of Pasadena Monthly Meeting of Friends. A sympathizing and compassionate friend to all who came under his influence, especially such as were in distress, and in need of a kind friend, true and faithful in all their trials of life—manifesting, through a long and painful illness, remarkable patience and resignation to the will of God. Will frequently say: "Not my will but thine be done." On the morning of the 25th, she quoted in a clear and audible voice, the language of the Psalmist: "My soul is in the hands of the Lord, and he will not suffer my soul to be visited him." The last words that were spoken were: "Mark the perfect man and behold the light for the end of that man is peace."

Composure.

When a man is reposing his confidence in the Lord he is in a state of repose indeed. This does not mean that his industry ceases, or that his exertion is not strenuous. But it means that his industry and his exertion are the more effective because they move on a state of repose. The more critical the emergency, the more is this confident repose before the Almighty needed, a grace which we cannot compose. It may look like indifference, it may be thought to be insensibility, in its supreme calmness is the highest gift of faith. He that believeth doth not in haste, and so he makes more speed.

The basis of peace is trust. The secret of being kept in perfect peace is a mind stayed upon God. But the mind does not love to stay upon God unless it is reconciled to Him. A sense of reconciliation between the soul and God is essential to peace, not reconciliation. To have guilt is to be ill at ease in our Father's society. Peace is impossible under a sense of sin. The manifestation of Himself as "God with us," bearing our sins and tasting the wages of sin, led us into the extreme in death, overcomes the repenting soul in a sense of his love, and reconciles us unto Him who so loved us and who so much more saves us by his life. Estrangement is then gone, a drawing close to Him is its place. The mind loves to be stayed upon God; where the Treasure is there will our hearts be also, and abiding there will be kept in perfect peace. This state is the Christian's rest—the repose and composure in God to which all sabbath days were made to point.

To borrow trouble from the future is not to borrow it from our Heavenly Father—there is no such borrowing from the morrow as is regarded as not of faith. But to borrow comfort for the future is hope, springing from confidence that He doeth all things well; and we are saved by hope, which is a waiting on the Lord for things not seen as yet, because we are saved by faith which is a reliance on and compliance with the Witness for truth, "the evidence of things not seen." Both hope and faith repose on the unseen as true, because told by the Word. "There shall be an accomplishing of that which hath been told her of the Lord." Faith comes by hearing the inspeaking Word of God.

This staycdness of mind because of rightly placed trust is not for composure merely as a spiritual accomplishment, but for efficiency. The light of grace is not to be placed under a bed comfortably to be slept over, but mounted a-top of the framework of all our talents, to give light to all within the circle of its shining. The best things are to be done in the composed and trustful way, in the healthy and not the violent way, in a contented and not spasmodic way. Patient continuance in well doing reaps "glory, honor and immortality," while those who jeer the steadfastness of trust as a slow coach will dash themselves past on their automobiles, soon to be found by the wayside, out of gear and demoralized. Restless industry outlives bustle, and outstrips it in the long run. What better off than idleness is the go-fast that so soon is stuck fast? Let our speed come up to the limit of that God-speed which will not tear the engine, but abides "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

William Wilberforce.

William Wilberforce was the son of a wealthy merchant of Hull, and was scarcely more than of age when he was elected member of Parliament for that town. But he was not long to occupy this station, for a higher awaited him. Immediately after the Hull election, he attended the county election of York; where, to the vast assembly collected in the castle yard, he made a speech on the popular question of the day—Fox's India bill. His eloquence, especially in the earlier stages of his course, was, as I understand, of a most animated and diversified character; and his voice sonorous and mellifluous. The speech produced an almost magical effect on the assembled multitude; and under strong and apparently unanimous impulse they cried out: "We will have the little man for our member." In short, though without pretensions from family or fortune to the honor of representing that vast county, he was elected by acclamation.

Wilberforce was now one of the most popular of men. His fine talents, his amiability, his wit, his gaiety, adapted him for the highest worldly circles in the county. Happily, however, that Heavenly Father, whom his pious parents had taught him to love in early life, was preparing for him better things than the blandishments of the world, even things that accompany salvation. Not long after his election he was traveling through France, in order to visit a sick relation at Nice, in company with his friend, Isaac Milner, afterwards Dean of Carlisle, a person somewhat older and more serious than himself. In the course of their journey the conversation turned to a clergyman in Yorkshire, who, having been impressed with evangelical views, was remarkably devoted to his parochial duties.

Wilberforce said: "That man carries things a great deal too far in my opinion." Milner replied: "Do you think so? I conceive that if you tried him by the standard presented to us in the New Testament you would change that opinion." Important, indeed, were the results of this conversation. The two friends read the whole of the New Testament together as they journeyed toward Nice; and this perusal was so blessed to Wilberforce that he became a new man. His opinions and feelings underwent a rapid revolution. He found himself to be a sinner, and rejoiced in the discovery of his Saviour. He renounced the world, and devoted himself to the fear and service of Almighty God.

When he arrived at Nice he found in the chamber of his sick relative a copy of "Dodridge's Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul." This useful manual of religious experience he read with great eagerness, and it appears to have been the means of confirming his change of view. The news now flew into Yorkshire that their popular young member was gone mad. Wilberforce followed the report in propria persona; threw himself with noble boldness amongst his friends and supporters, plainly told them of his change of sentiment; and with good reason (it may be presumed), adopted the words of a yet more eminent convert, "I am not mad, most noble Festus—I speak the words of truth and soberness."

From that time his influence in the county was constantly extending; and many years after a contested election took place between Col. Lascelles and Lord Milton. He polled almost double the number of the votes of either of the other candidates; and a voluntary subscription flowed in of about £40,000 to defray his expenses. A great part of this money was returned. Wilberforce voluntarily retired from the representation of the county, feeling the weight of business too great for his health, though he labored in the anti-slavery work until near the close of his life.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Items from "The Converted Catholic."

In the extreme northern part of the presidency of Guatemala, very near to the borderline of Campeche, is the strongly Roman Catholic town of San Martin. In a recent letter received from one who is spoken of as "Brother A. E. Bishop, an earnest and devoted servant of Jesus Christ," laboring in that land, an account is given of the way in which the light of the Gospel is said to have first reached San Martin. It happened, about five years ago, that a man by the name of Elias received a tract entitled "Thirty Reasons why Rome is not the true Church." Unable to read it, he took it to his brother, and when he heard through him what the tract had to say, the "Reasons" adduced took such strong hold upon his mind that he went off into the timber, far from any human being, and falling upon his knees, pleadingly cried to the great God that if the statements in the tract were true, he might be favored to know it. He then communicated with his sisters, and a great desire took possession of them all to have a Bible. But the priest, to whom they confided their longing, told them that even a look at a Bible would be worth a thousand dollars. They were poor and how could they ever obtain the coveted book. Six months later, a colporteur, having slept one night just outside of San Martin, resumed his pack in the early morning following, and, entering the town, wandered through it until he reached its opposite side. Here he came to the home of the Elias family, who, filled with joy and gratitude that they could purchase a Bible for so small a sum as a single dollar (worth less than half that much in American money), eagerly bought a copy, and prized it accordingly.

The same Brother Bishop narrates in his letter a further interesting circumstance. He was forty-two miles from San Martin when he was impressed to return home rather suddenly, accomplishing the journey in the course of the day, though he had to travel along bad mountain roads made doubly difficult by great wash-outs. "That morning," he says, "one of our most faithful believers, an employee of the electric light company for fourteen years, while fixing a live wire, a block from our home, suddenly received the whole current. A cry, a moment of suspension in the air, and he fell, crushing his skull. For nearly fifty years he had lived in the darkness of sin and Romanism, spending his wages on periodical Sunday spees, but the last five years were years of joy, peace and victory. No home nor life in Guatemala showed a more marked change than his. Large numbers of people attended his funeral next morning, many of them hearing then for the first time in their lives the Gospel of grace, that saves both from the guilt and power of sin. His employers testified that they had no other man in whom they placed such implicit confidence. In his testimony he would frequently say, "Where would I be to-day if the Gospel had not come into my life?"

The Roman Catholic tenet concerning substantiation—the full and absolute presence of Christ's body in the so-called "holy wafer" of the sacrificial mass—would appear to be held in all its grossness by adherents of the Papacy of this day, the same as it was in the days of Tetzel and Thomas Aquinas. Thus, at the consecration lately of a new bishop, in New Hampshire, the officiating priest, a Jesuit, and the head of the largest Roman Catholic college in New England, declared in "a great sermon," that "when, officiating at mass, a priest or bishop utters the words 'This is my body,' instantly there is no longer any bread, but the God of heaven and earth, the Judge of the living and the dead, He who in the hollow of His hand holds and poises the universe, is resting in the hands of His priest." In the same sermon this Jesuit said, that "rich and poor, learned and unlearned, must submit to the priest's judgment and sentence, and that judgment is ratified in heaven, sins are blotted out, the man by the power given to the priest, is received back into God's favor." "It is such teaching in the Roman Catholic Church," is the apt comment of the Converted Catholic, "that has made infidels, atheists and anarchists of intelligent, strong-minded men in European countries; and if Christ be not lifted up before the Roman Catholics in this country, and His gospel of salvation be preached to them, they will likewise become irreligious."

The "Los von Rom" (Away from Rome) movement, in several provinces of Austria, notably in Bohemia, Moravia, Styria, Salzburg and the Tyrol, appears to be still making some progress, though not so markedly as two or three years ago. During the last five years, it is stated that fully forty-five thousand Roman Catholics have declared their change of faith to various forms of Protestantism, in which may be included the old Catholic dissent and separation. Much aid has been extended the movement by the Evangelisches Bund, a vigorous Protestant society of Germany, yet (it is stated) a decree of Emperor William, through the Prussian Minister of Public Worship, forbids the appropriation of any funds of the State Church of Prussia for such purpose. In essaying to counteract this trend away from Rome, some of the Romanist ecclesiastics, and the papers which they influence, have gone beyond the mark of just and judicious defence, and will probably have endangered their own cause. Thus, the most influential Catholic paper of Bohemia, having arranged from Luther's works certain passages taken away from their context, makes the great Reformer appear as a drunkard and a libertine, and the Protestant faith to be not at all the faith of Jesus.

In the latter part of this month's issue of the Converted Catholic, is a letter, one of a series, addressed by its editor, James A. O'Connor, to Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore. Pastor O'Connor recalls the fact that, some years ago, a student of St. Mary's Roman Catholic Seminary in that city (the same institution, as it happened, in which both O'Connor and Gibbons had received their theological training), renounced the Church of Rome, and witnessing a change of heart—partly through the instrumentality of James A. O'Connor—united with the Methodists. The letter which this seminarian, J. W. Holmes, addressed to the priests in control of the institution, explanatory of his reasons for leaving it, is given. Following is an extract, declaring against the unscriptural inculcation of Mariolatry:

"My knowledge of the practices of Church had been derived wholly from the logical writings of the Fathers. With however, I learned very soon that the practicing of the Church is different from what I had supposed. I learned that the Virgin Mary alone is invoked, together with Jesus, and that our dear risen Saviour is not proached in prayer. Not one prayer had heard addressed to Christ. Yet, are we directed to do so in God's Word—Heb 14-16?"

"Nowhere in the Bible are we directed to pray to the mother of Jesus, and I can longer continue to do so. She occupies the Roman Catholic Church, the place God has given to his Son Jesus Christ. Can alone be mediator between the Father and man. 'If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, the righteous, and he will propitiate for our sins,' etc. But, all taught us to go to Mary and gain her intercession with her Son. This is unfounded Scripture, and is directly opposed to the 'unto Me [Jesus] all ye who labor and are laden, and I will give you rest'—Matt 11. In the seminary, however, every one is to have a 'spiritual director' to guide him in advice and counsel. God says: 'If any one lack wisdom, let him ask of God that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and he should be given him.' Through our dear risen Saviour we have access to God, who offers Himself as the 'spiritual director' to all men. 'But,' I am told, 'you have no one to interpret Scripture for yourself.' This is an invention of man inspired by Satan. He gave all men a free will, intelligence and a desire to arrive at truth. Chains may be put on the limbs, may deprive the hands of their motion, but, thanks be to God, no chains can restrict the operations of the mind. Man will no longer submit to be influenced by any inventions of man in religious matters." J. W.

THE BOY IN SCHOOL.—If I were asked to state in a single word the secret of a good state for a boy in school, I should say without the slightest hesitation that such a secret lies in the word "honesty." A narrow definition of that word proposes that an "honest person" is not a thief, that he does not steal the property or possessions of some one else; but a truer definition includes all that we mean by "truthful," "upright," "diligent," and many other like words. An honest boy will not attempt self-deception that accompanies bad habits; he will not be the deception of fellow-students or teachers that accompanies open sin; he will be straightforward, earnest, manly; he will exhibit those fine qualities of human life which everyone admires; he will please God. To grow in the grace of honesty means the development of a character that is great and good. I commend to every schoolboy that he be honest in all circumstances and in view of any consequences.—Eugene Allen Noble, in Christian Advocate.

MEN remain the same slaves they have always been, and always will be, while they continue to be guided, not by religious consequences, but by passions, theories, and external influences.—Tolstoi.

A Visit to Porto Rico.

San Juan, Second Mo. 4th, 1905.—Secondly we had a meeting with about six hundred in the penitentiary, some two hundred of whom are in for killing. Amongst them, I had all together, were a few boys, one thirteen years old, for manslaughter. I had good interpreter. The forgiveness and love of God in Christ, dependent upon repentance, and forsaking our sins was depicted. During speaking the passage was produced about forgiveness of the sinning woman, who loved much. This seemed to affect the women a great deal. When they were told that God was everywhere, and in their own hearts, and that they could pray to Him, and they were asked to engage in silent prayer. It is a solemn scene. Then at the close of the meeting, when I knelt in prayer, they all likewise; and then the silence, awe, and accompanying evidences of contrition, all showed that the promised visitation of the Holy Spirit was indeed in our midst. What privilege to be able to preach glad tidings to sinners. To show them that Christ is a Saviour for those who listen to his voice and obey it! And that his blood was shed, not for the righteous so much as for sinners!

Third-day we went to the Lepers' Island the entrance to the San Juan bay. I could feel clear of this locality without making any effort, so we secured the necessary permission from the Insular superintendent of charities, who introduced us to the Doctor. He went out in a sail-boat with him. He had his assistant made some provision for protection, as they had to walk amongst the lepers. But we were careful simply to keep away from the doors, principally on the ground, and the windward side of them, as much as practicable. We had an excellent interpreter. The island has two good sized houses, for men and women. The outlook seaward, and across to San Juan in the distance, is beautiful. But the poor lepers! It was the most sorrowful sight I ever witnessed. I dare not look at here of their appearance—sightless, speechless, eaten up, as many of them were. I wonder why such suffering should be permitted to exist. They spend much of their time in crying, we are told, partly from disfigurement, partly for their absent families and friends.

It would have rejoiced your hearts to see our gladness when told a minister wanted to speak to them. Only once in a few years do priests go to see them. They called out with delight, and eagerly gathered as quickly as their afflictions permitted. Then they were told of God's love, how they could have companionship, how then He could prepare a home for Heaven, where they might see loved ones, and where sickness never comes. They were thirsty for the Gospel, and I was almost broken down myself, on concluding. They lived unexpectedly alive to spiritual thought, given in simple language, and exhibited such tenderness. When we parted, they, with many smiles and gesticulations expressed their gratitude. Our kind interpreter was also much affected, remarking as we left, "This is an age and of mercy." And the doctor, who apparently had not cared much to listen to me, said, "After all, religion is a great consolation."

On leaving, we all felt that it was a deep blessing to be made a means of comforting those who are in trouble.

The next Fourth-day, we passed much of the time in the Insular Normal School. We had considerable work there, a special opportunity being granted us. The responsibility connected with the calling of instructors as applied to moral and religious conditions, was largely our concern.

Fifth-day was spent a good deal in the Naval Hospital, talking to the sick boys, etc.

Sixth-day, we had a meeting for the American colony, but it was rainy, and a small meeting resulted. A good part of this day, also Seventh-day, A. M., was devoted to conversations with people who desired more knowledge regarding religious matters, or whom we wanted to see, because of their courtesy in aiding us in the past few weeks.

We have had a busy week and this afternoon, concluding it by going out to Judge MacLeary's farm, looking at orange tree groves and sitting on his porch. The country air and relaxation gave us a grand rest. It is also a relief to think our labors are almost concluded here, and seem to have been so blessed to many. I know it all is of God, and give Him all the praise.

First-day, Second Month 5th.—We expect to go to the Naval Hospital for a meeting, while Second-day must be devoted to urging the early construction of a reformatory for boys, instead of putting them in jails with old criminals. To do this, we hope to see the Governor and others in authority.

Then Second-day, P. M. to Bardadoes.

6th.—Yesterday we had a meeting at the Naval Hospital. I had been amongst the boys quite a little in regular personal work; and they were very kind to attend the meeting. Those that could get about, came into the hall between the two wards, and were very attentive, as were also the poor fellows on their cots in the wards. We spoke up loudly so all could hear. We had a season for a Bible reading, and a good many of them had not heard it read for months or years. Then I spoke, and it was the same old and glad theme of the love of Christ, and the forgiveness for those who repent and amend their lives. We had a tendering time—how the Holy Spirit has wonderfully reached our meetings on this island! To-day called on the Governor, etc., in reference to a reformatory for boys.

I wish I could detail our personal experiences as we have gone along. There has been fruit through these labors, and seed has been sown; for this we thank our Father in Heaven.

"MANY times hath my soul bowed in a humble thankfulness to the Lord, that He did not choose any of the wise and learned of this world to be the first messenger in our age of his blessed truth to men; but that he took one that was not of high degree or elegant speech, or learned after the way of this world."—William Penn's Preface to G. Fox's Journal.

"A HEART that fears God cares not for the threats of the world."

A Testimony of Thaxted Monthly Meeting, Concerning Priscilla Green, a Minister, Deceased.

We think it right to preserve a brief record of the devoted life of our late beloved friend Priscilla Green, and of her work in the ministry of the Gospel, with the desire that it may animate and encourage others to yield their hearts to the same loving Lord, by whose grace she was what she was, and thus to bring forth much fruit to his praise.

Priscilla Green was the third daughter of our late friends Joseph Markes and Mercy Green, and was born at Saffron Walden in the year 1802. Her parents were earnestly concerned to train up their children in the right way of the Lord; and her mind, yielding to the convictions of the Holy Spirit, was early given up to her Saviour, and her subsequent course was one of remarkable dedication to his service. Frail and delicate from her childhood, she knew much of physical infirmity, and we believe that she learnt many lessons in this school of suffering, which fitted her, in her frequent loving visits to her friends, to enter into deep feeling with them, and to evince her earnest concern for their present and eternal well being.

For several years before she first spoke in the ministry she felt that such a service would be required of her, and great were her searchings of heart in connection with so solemn an engagement, desiring, on the one hand, not to be unfaithful to the call of her Lord, and, on the other, not to move before her Guide. Several memoranda made during this period strikingly evince her earnest concern on these points. One of these is as follows:

1832, Third Month 4th. "I have passed through another severe conflict at meeting this morning, and felt consequently depressed since. I think I am preserved from much reasoning on the subject; but such a fear attends lest I should move before the right time, and thereby bring reproach on the precious cause; also lest I should be depriving myself of the sweet reward of peace, by too long withholding, that I truly go bowed down. Still it is a mercy to be permitted to lie low before Him, to wait his direction, and to be made sensible that of ourselves we can do nothing. Oh! may I endeavor to hope that a way will yet be made through these conflicts of soul, acceptably to offer a prepared sacrifice, and that the Good Shepherd will continue to lead about and instruct, though it remain to be in paths I have not known. Through all I have much to be thankful for, and most of all for the frequent breathings of my spirit to Him whom I desire to love above all."

She first spoke in meeting while on a visit to Berkhamstead in 1833, and was recorded a minister by this Monthly Meeting in 1836.

Priscilla Green travelled extensively in the service of the Gospel through many parts of England, Scotland and Ireland, and in 1856 she was liberated to visit some parts of North America. In this engagement she was accompanied by our late friend Mary Nicholson.

She was frequently led to visit Friends in their families, and on several occasions those not in profession with our Society, especially some of her own neighbors; and we have reason to believe that many of these visits, as well as those of a more public character, were to the edification and comfort of those amongst whom she labored.

In the exercise of her gift in the ministry she was enabled clearly to set forth the truths of the Gospel with much feeling and power, so as to reach the hearts of the hearers. She dwelt largely on the love of God in Christ Jesus, on the surrender of the heart to Him, and on the need of living as becometh the Gospel; also on the importance of deep spiritual exercise in our meetings for worship. Her public approaches to the Throne of grace were marked by great solemnity and reverence.

During the last few years of her life she was unable to go much from home, but was often acceptably engaged in her own meetings, and also frequently had words of affectionate counsel and encouragement for those who called to see her. The last time she was at meeting was in the autumn of 1876, when, in something like a parting salutation, she addressed those present in solemn words referring to the uncertainty of life.

Although her health became increasingly feeble, it was not until within a month of her death that symptoms arose which caused her friends special anxiety, during which time she passed through much bodily suffering, but her mind was preserved clear to the last, and her patience and resignation were very instructive to those around her. She seemed constantly in the atmosphere of prayer, and gave utterance to many expressions of her feelings at this period, a few of which may be interesting to record.

Third Month 13th. In allusion to the comfort of sympathy, she said: "Yes, it is very precious; there is one fountain ever open, and one river of love ever flowing from our Heavenly Father towards us, and sometimes I think it reaches us through the hearts of our friends." At another time she ejaculated, "The depth of Thy mercy in Christ Jesus is my only hope; Thy righteous will be done. Thy time, not mine."

The next day, on its being said, "Thy dear Saviour is with thee," she replied "Yes, I shall soon see Him. Oh that I might fall asleep and awake in his likeness; I shall be satisfied." "I am lying in the dust, waiting till the most merciful call comes, only feeling that there is special cause for regret that I should ever have known anything like unfaithfulness. I wish you all well on your way. Keep very humble, and very close to the Good Shepherd; there is no other path of safety."

Third Month 17th. She prayed in broken sentences: "Into Thy disposal, oh, gracious Father I commit myself and my all, and those I love; make them willing to give up all Thou art calling for from them, and give them more and more humility."

Again, on the 20th: "Gracious Father, if it be Thy will, grant me a little relief from suffering. Great and marvellous are Thy works, and that my soul knoweth right well; marvellous have they been to me all my life long."

On the following day her purified spirit was released from its suffering tabernacle. She was in the seventy-fifth year of her age, and had been a recorded minister about forty years.

In thus testifying to the Christian walk of our dear friend, we would express our thankfulness in having had one amongst us whose character shone so brightly through the trials permitted, even to the end evincing her desire to live up to the injunction of our blessed Lord, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in Heaven is perfect;" yet withal she had nothing to trust to but the mercy of God in Him who died for our sins, and a precious assurance is granted that, through this boundless mercy she is now forever with the Lord.

In Defense of Birds

The great dodo has become extinct within the memory of man, and most likely by reason of its ruthless waste of life. The great auk is another. Sixty or seventy of its eggs yet exist, and one was sold in London this year for $1,000. Thus two types have been lost. Once in Indiana the sky would be darkened in the early autumn by the vast flocks of passenger pigeons; but now not a specimen remains, though a few have been reported as having appeared in the Adirondacks this year. The Carolina parakeet and the ivory-billed woodpecker are extinct in Indiana. The wild Turkey, raven and pileated woodpecker are almost extinct. The beautiful egrets are very rare. A few years ago they were common here, but they have been killed in their nesting places in Florida. One man said that he had made over a hundred dollars in one day by killing them for their plumes. The stately white heron, standing almost as tall as a man, is one of the lovely recollections of my childhood. The woodcocks from everywhere over their wide range from the Atlantic to the Mississippi River are disappearing. The noble bird is to be found no longer in the swale or in its love-dance above the alders. The woodcock, the most gentle and confiding and beautiful of the ducks, is vanishing from its nest in the hollow tree and its haunts along the woody streams.

Wanton love of killing is responsible for much of it. In 1862, when the negroes of the South first began to use shotguns, the destruction of the Southern mocking-bird began. It seems incredible that anybody could murder so sweet a singer. The bird fanciers began to trap them by thousands and exported them, though they mostly pine away and die in captivity. Were these poor ignorant people all the murderers of birds we might to some degree excuse them; but when we remember that a professing Christian and even a preacher of righteousness will shoot such creatures for target practice, it seems beyond belief. I knew one minister to shoot twenty-six larks one afternoon for practice with his new Colt gun.

It is more astounding to discover that fashion in women's hats is far more destructive still of the gorgeous bird of life with which the beneficent Creator has endowed us. That women, usually so tender-hearted and sympathetic, should so far repress their nature as to occasion such a awful slaughter—how strange! Surely they would say:

"'Twas never in my soul to act so ill a part,
But evil is wrought by want of thought as well as want of heart."

One consignment of birds to a prominent feather dealer in London included 6,000 l of Paradise and 400,000 humming birds. E nesting place of the sea-gulls from New Fo lard to Florida is visited by the hired gang the milliners, and huge piles of their poor b are left upon the ground, many of them their wings torn off while still alive, and are denied the mercy of death. On the r islands their starved nestlings can be fuddled in the slow torture. Some of the tims are skinned alive, that the feathers ma tain their brilliancy. Others are put alive hot ovens for the same purpose. Nearly are killed in nesting season, for then the ent birds are easily taken, when they c home to feed their little ones. It rejoices naturalist's heart to witness the return the swallows in the spring, but in Fra when they are weary with their flight ac the Mediterranean, electric wires are sus ded for them to rest on, and the deadly b sent through thousands at once. Hu used to kill in the duck season just th of St. Louis thousands of ducks for th feathers alone, and leave the bodies to r heaps. Judge Banta once told me that v he was hunting sage hens in Idaho hun could be killed in a day, they were so pl and so easy to hit, and he found piles at the roadway decaying—killed for sport! the hunter must yield the palm for cruelty wastefulness of creature life to the mil and her patrons.

I am happy to record that the tide has tu and almost a revolution has been effec public sentiment. The Audubon socie for bird study and protection deserve the dit for taking the initiative. They work a three lines—legislation, education and p sentiment. They have given us a model law, which is now on the statute books nearly every state. They have wro through the public schools until multitu who were "thoughtlessly cruel are thoughtfully kind." They have devel public sentiment, until farmer and citizen discovered alike that the birds are their n allies, and not their foes. Even every o a blessing to the farm. And Michelé, French Naturalist, has shown that if al birds were destroyed the earth would soe uninhabitable. Sanctuaries, public and pri are now being prepared for the birds whic they can come and be safe. The Merc Milliners' Association of New York has a year declared a truce, to run for three ye by which they agree not to import, manure or sell the plumage of gulls, tern grebes, humming birds or song birds. On January 1st, herons, egrets and American icans will be added to the list. Perhaps it because of this fact that wild pigeons we peeped into the Adirondack region after absence of nearly half a century. Let us in this Christian effort to preserve C creatures which he has given us for com ionship, assistance and good cheer. Let us by the utmost hospitality entice into our lawns.

"That blithe spirit,
That from heaven, or near it,
Pours its full heart
In strains of unpremeditated art."

—J. W. Frazer, in Herald of Truth

The Cruise of the "Arabic."

The steamship Arabic sailed from New York the Second of Second Month last for a cruise of the Mediterranean ports. Of the more than 620 passengers over twenty were members of the Society of Friends. The following extracts from a journal kept by one of them are given here to have enough of general interest to justify their publication in THE FRIEND.

After eight days of very pleasant but rather uneventful sea travel, on Second Month 10th record begins:—
The day of arrival opened fair and warm. We were skirting the Islands at daylight. As a beautiful sight after eight days of sea. We dropped anchor just after breakfast opposite Funchal, the capital of Madeira. A babel that greeted us was deafening. The crews in small boats swarmed about the ships, leaped to the waist, ready to dive for coins. Most of the boys did not look to be over six or seven years old, and they never seemed to miss a coin but would disappear under the water and reappear up with it between their teeth. Only a few coins would tempt them. The water was twenty fathoms deep!

As there isn't any harbor at Funchal, landings were made in tenders, and these were very busy all day between the ship and shore. We had to go down thirty-seven steps to get to the launches, but the sea was quiet and it is not much of an effort. The first thing interested us in landing was the native drawn by oxen and holding four persons. The streets are very steep and narrow, and all paved with smooth stones on end and in most artistic designs. These are, of course, very heavy, and with the addition of a greased wheel which the goader of oxen occasionally uses under the runners, make the sled slip very nicely. This mode of travel is universal, and costs three shillings an hour for a man and his ox.

We took in the city this way the first day, in company with Timothy and Anna. Of course we were charmed with the natural features of the Island, the flowers and the architecture being similar to Mexico. Embroidery, red, inlaid woodwork, reed chairs and baskets are the native souvenirs. The natives seem quite intelligent, and we have several instances of honesty displayed in the market. There are not half the beggars here that appear in Mexico. The island belongs to Portugal, but English and American tourists are liked. We had a consul here, and our flag is quite prominent. We lunched in the city at the "Arabic," a restaurant kept by a man from Philadelphia, a resident eighteen years! Rather interesting it struck us. They have several beautiful flowers, and the roses, heliotropes, geraniums, and the roses like trees. The sweetest of all was the great borders of blooming geraniums, and the purple and white sweet violets sold six bunches for a shilling. We did not see the M. E. Mission, but they have not been attached, and it was not very interesting. The shops were odd and the men very odd. The day passed all too quickly, and we turned to the ship for dinner.

Second Month 11th.—"We left the Arabic this morning, so as to have as long a cruise as possible ashore. We first took the tram to the Funicular Railroad Station. Those who have been in the Alps will know what we had in store. Such beautiful views of tropical gardens, the sea and open harbor, with our brave ship riding at anchor, flying flags of every nation, and numerous other craft, some coaling, and others just calling like ourselves! At the top of the road is a hotel with beautiful terraced gardens, in fact, all the gardens are terraced or they would be washed away when the torrents of rain which come down the mountains, and this is the reason for the curiously paved streets mentioned before.

"After visiting the 'Church on the Mount,' a very commonplace Roman Catholic edifice, we decided to take the mountain slide. It was the most unique experience of our lives. There is a heavy basket arrangement placed on runners, and it is guided by two men in the most skillful manner. The street is narrow and tortuous, and we frequently met trains of loaded donkey or ox carts (bully carts, they call them), but passed them safely, and when the way was clear we coasted like the wind. Half way down our men stopped and demanded wine at a shop, but as for this part of the programme, we were prepared for it, and refused to treat! We walked back to the square and took a bully cart to ride up to Reid's Hotel. The location is grand, overlooking the sea and the most exquisite gardens extending down to the water's edge. The native canaries keep up a perpetual chorus, and add greatly to the effect. By the time we were back to the dock it was 12.30, so we concluded to return to the ship, as we were to sail in an hour. It was astonishing the number who visited the 'Arabic,' and the natives were allowed to display their merchandise on deck. I counted thirty small boats alongside; each contained one or two divers, some small children, who vociferously shouted for coins. Such feats of diving I never saw. Some of the boys would climb to the bridge and dive off, at least a distance of sixty feet. The water was so deep, too. Five tugs kept up an awful din, and amid waving of flags and 'America' by the band, we slowly turned around and left beautiful Madeira in the distance. We are due at Cadiz in the morning.

Second Month 16th, 1905—I believe I elapsed my last at Cadiz Second-day morning, and mailed it there. We arrived at 8 A. M., but there seemed to be a great many preliminaries before we could land, and then, too, the 'Granada-party had to be gotten off first. It must have been eleven o'clock when we finally reached shore, where we found carriages waiting for us with guides. We were hurried around to the different objects of interest. First the museum, which seemed to be such in name chiefly. It contained one 'priceless treasure,' a Phœnician sarcophagus said to be twenty-eight hundred years old, and the best preserved one in existence. It contained a skeleton complete, and was unearthed at Cadiz a few years ago. Second, a small collection of paintings, one by Murillo and a number by Zurbarán. The Botanic Gardens, very disappointing, but containing a dragon tree three hundred years old. The Cathedral (modern but large), with a wonderful echo in the crypt and an elaborate tabernacle of silver, which is paraded in special religious festivals.

Finally, we saw the bull ring, one of the largest in Spain, but dilapidated-looking, and of no interest to us. This ride consumed two hours, but did not include all of the sights of the city. The streets were narrow and rough, and the people in the shops not at all friendly, in marked contrast to our reception in Madeira. No doubt the war is too fresh in their minds to receive us with open arms. The city has a beautiful situation, nearly surrounded by water and is a great fishing post. We returned to ship for lunch, and did not return to Cadiz that day.

Third-day the 14th we breakfasted at six A. M., and the party landed as soon as possible and took special train for Seville. We left Cadiz at about 8.30, and the ride was very interesting and varied. The train passed for some time along a narrow strip of land, and the view on one side looked very much like the beach at home, the other side like the marshes. We soon came to great pyramids of salt and many salt works, herds of Spanish cattle, sheep and goats. The wild flowers thickly covered the banks, and we finally passed through great orchards of olive, almond and orange trees. The country seemed well cultivated, and there wasn't any evidence of Spanish laziness during the one hundred miles to Seville. We reached the city at 1 P. M., the grand tower of Giralda standing out before us for some time before our arrival. We had been supplied with lunch boxes before leaving Cadiz, the contents of which we disposed of on the way, so that no time should be lost. We were taken in carriages to the different places of interest, and were shown the following: a reproduction of Pilate's house, the remains of the old Roman wall and gates, Roman pillars with statues of Hercules and Caesar on top. The statues of Murillo and Velazquez (the birth-place of both), in one of the plazas. Finally, the cathedral, which was indeed wonderful, and is considered by some the finest in the world. It contains many priceless Murillos, the most magnificent vestments, the collection of centuries; jewels, stained glass windows, and we also saw the sarcophagus in which the ashes of Columbus rest. It was a shame to be rushed through at such a rate, but there was so much of interest in Seville and our time was so short. Another small church containing two especially fine Murillos, one, "The Thirst," showing Moses standing by the rock, and the people standing around him. The other, "Christ Feeding the Multitude." Both were marvels, and long could we have gazed if we could have had the time. Lastly, to the Alcázar, formerly a Moorish palace, and wonderfully like the Alhambra, it is said. It seemed like a long step back into the past, and the purely Moorish architecture was exquisitely beautiful. The gardens attached to the palace are a dream, and we gladly wandered through them until called on by our guide. We were sorry not to get up the Giralda tower, which dates from the year 1184. We were, of course, tired of the bull ring, as this city is the "Alma Mater" of bull-fighting, and the building is large and imposing, seating fourteen thousand people. The shops were attractive and the people polite. We dined at five o'clock at the Hotel de Madria, and a fine dinner we had, too. On the whole we were favorably impressed with Seville, though the streets are narrow and crooked, planned so as to keep out the rays of the hot sun in summer. Our train left at 7 P. M., the moon was shining brightly, the people gay and careless, and I, for one, felt glad I lived under different conditions. We reached Cadiz at midnight, loaded into the launches, and were soon on board the Arabic and asleep in our cabins. The ship left Cadiz immediately, and steamed the hundred miles to Gibraltar before 8 A. M. Fourth-day morning. Unfortunately we passed through the straits of Gibraltar too early to get the imposing view of the rock, so had to be satisfied with the one from the harbor. It is truly grand and imposing, and is certainly an impregnable fortress commanding the entrance to the Mediterranean, as it does. We landed soon after breakfast, and felt quite at home in the English atmosphere. We were given tickets outside the gates of the city allowing us to pass in and out at will, and were conducted by Clark's guides to the entrance of the fortress, where we were obliged to register, and were then turned over to a soldier guide, who conducted us through the lower gallery, which is the only one open to visitors. It was a hard climb, but our guide was considerate, and allowed us to rest at times. The galleries are tunneled out of the solid rock, and are damp and chilly. Five hundred and ninety feet above the sea we were allowed to look out one of the gun holes, and a magnificent view repaid us for all our weary climb. We had our first glimpse of the Mediterranean here, and the narrow strip of neutral ground, and then the long line of sentry-boxes of the Spaniards and the little town of Linea, which I fancy the English guns could soon obliterate. The soldiers were quite friendly and social, and we got some pointers from them that were useful to us in the town. We returned to the ship for a 1 o'clock lunch, after visiting the post-office and mailing some letters home. We left Gibraltar last night at eleven o'clock, and those who remained up said they had a fine view as we entered the Mediterranean. The moonlight was perfect, and we enjoyed the evening on deck watching the frantic bargaining for laces, etc., that some of the ladies indulged in before the natives were sent ashore. We have had a lovely day, and are due in Algiers to-morrow. There have been a good many passengers sick with colds, and one lady was left in the hospital at Gibraltar. One lady broke her arm, and one of the clergymen fell and broke his nose, so there has been quite a list of cases.

17th.—We are now at Algiers, and the harbor is full of shipping. The city looks dazlingly white, and the first impression is that we are to have a good time here. These notes give you a very inadequate idea of what we are enjoying, but it is not easy to get much out of the whirl of sight-seeing that will interest others.

Now for our first taste of Africa! Farewell.

SHORT QUOTATIONS.—"Dishonesty is a forsaking of permanent for temporary advantages;" "Barbarism recommences by the excess of civilization;" "If you would live at your ease manage but a few things."

"SEE that thou believeth with thy heart what thou singest with thy mouth, and that thou make good in thy works what thou believest with thy heart."

TEMPERANCE.

The matter under this heading is furnished to THE FRIEND on behalf of the "Temperance Association of Friends of Philadelphia," by Benjamin F. Whitson, 401 Chestnut St., Phila.

DO IT TO-DAY.

That deed of kindness you would do—

Do it to-day.

That word to help your brother be true—

Speak it to-day.

The time is rapidly passing by,

When service is open; and you and I,

If we mean to answer our Master's cry,

Must do it to-day.

That straying one that you mean to seek—

Seek him to-day.

That helping hand for one who is weak—

Give it to-day.

Be helpful to-day—how foolish to wait

Till dear ones pass through the pearly gate,

And then remorsefully cry, "Too late!"—

Help them to-day.

THE SIGN CHANGED.—In a bleak, gray village on the coast, where the contest was especially close, there was one saloon, a cozy, inviting place, very dear to the heart of the beer-drinker. A week before the election this saloon was almost covered by an enormous sign bearing in huge red letters the legend, "If the prohibition law passes, this saloon will be closed." The opposing faction was equal to the emergency. In the night strange noises were heard, and the next day the placard appeared covering the front of the village poor-house.—Copied.

SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION in the public schools had its origin in 1879, when Mary H. Hunt laid before the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in convention at Indianapolis, Ind., the burden of her heart in this regard. A committee was appointed to endeavor to translate the suggestion in a practical method of operation. The next year this committee was merged into a Department of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Since then this educational idea has been embodied in laws enacted by Congress, and in one after another of the forty-five States of the nation. But the task of getting the desired information adequately and correctly embodied in the text books adapted to the schools was a task even greater than that of securing the enactment of the requisite laws. It was like getting an unwritten science incorporated into the public school system of a nation of 80,000,000 people. Opposition has come from various sources—from those who like the drink, from those who trade in alcoholic liquors, and from a class of reasoners such as the self-constituted Committee of Fifty who, while claiming to be "temperance people and total abstainers," yet oppose such instruction on the ground that it is "an excrescence," an "incubus engrafted on our public school system."

A Reply to the Committee of Fifty was prepared by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and, by unanimous vote of the Senate of the United States, has been published as Senate Document 171, and may be secured by any person wishing it upon application to their representative in the Senate. This reply is fully adequate to the purpose intended. It is no longer any dearth of suitable text for the various grades.

TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION IN ENGLAND About one year ago upwards of fifteen it and members of the medical profession Great Britain and Ireland petitioned for pulsory education in hygiene and temperance in their public schools. A committee of the one distinguished physicians, including university professors and members of the press representing these petitioners, has adopted sent to every Local Board of Education in United Kingdom a course of study in physiology and hygiene, including the nature and effects of alcohol and other narcotics. This course is almost identical with the American course of study, now in use, or intended to be it.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE of the Temperance Association of Friends at its last recent meeting authorized the sending of a circular letter addressed to individual members of the Society of Friends who belong to business, educational, and other clubs that prevent the dispensing of intoxicating liquors at club rooms.

The Educational Committee reported it sent to various Friends' schools leaflets of a course of study in Temperance Instruction required by law, also a review of defective and a list of endorsed books. The committee believe that the teaching in the schools throughout Philadelphia Yearly Meeting fully up to the standard required by law in public schools.

THE STATEHOOD BILL in amended passed the United States Senate on 8th Month 7th. The feature of interest to temperance people was the adoption by a vote 55 to 20 of the Gallinger amendment providing for the prohibition of the liquor trade for a period of twenty-one years, and thereafter until the legislature of the State decide otherwise, in the entire territory of new State, which is to include Oklahoma and Indian Territory.

The Local Option Bill was introduced in the Pennsylvania legislature by John M. of Washington County. Many thousands of persons have petitioned the passage of this measure, and even the enemies of the limit that a majority of the representatives would support it if it comes to vote. "organization" is undoubtedly opposed to the bill, so that all the pressure is needed to be brought to bear upon its being reported favorably from committee. A substantial party has been gained already in that territory has prevented all possible liquor legislation, of which much was being arranged before the session opened.

THE CITY OF CHESTER, PA., has elected as mayor Wm. H. Berry, a party prohibitionist, but nominated by the Christian Party and endorsed by the Democrats and prohibitionists. This rather surprising election for law and order in Chester is the public expression of dislike for the leadership of a well-known saloon-keeper and brewer who figured prominently in Republican Party affairs.

LOONS AND LABOR.—If eight laboring spend $800 for furniture, hardware, clothing, worsted and woolen goods and men's shing goods, they contribute $137.43 to it, and at the same time they bring val- uables to their families, they stimulate business, and add to the demand for labor. The $800 is spent in the saloon only $9.84 for labor, the families are made wretched, the men themselves are made worse off, financially and morally, their jobs imperiled and they have wasted their money.—Exchange.

The Pittsburgh Brewing Company shows a decrease of 239,631 barrels of beer produced year. Gross earnings fell off $1,600,000. Men Mahaska County, Iowa, had no saloons, court expenses were about $3,700. She admitted saloons, and last year her expenses reached $23,000. In Washington County, with court expenses of about $100 originally, there has been no increase. Washington County is still dry.

THE PROHIBITION LAW in North Dakota was submitted recently to vote in the Legislature and was sustained by a vote of 67 to 28, showing an increase in the sentiment favor- able to prohibition.

THE GERMAN EMPEROR has made a publica- tion to the effect that "no compulsion is to partake of toasts in alcoholic drink," has expressed the hope that this fact will receive wide publicity. Heretofore it has been considered a form of discourtesy for army officer to "drink the health of his country" in anything else than champagne. The action of the Emperor has created a sen- sation in Germany, inasmuch as his expression is accepted as a strong endorsement of absti- nence. Those students of our own liquor law who think they see in the habitual use of beer and light wines an antidote for whisky and brandy drinking, have much to learn from conditions in Germany, where the temperance movement has at last begun to re- ceive a respectful hearing.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

These Friends near the close of their year- ly conference with some of the Indians on the Allegheny Reservation in which an Address was read expressing their views on several topical subjects. The following extracts were taken from it:—Brothers, when the Great Spirit put it into the hearts of our fathers years ago to seek to do your fathers' duty they found them living in wigwams of they were clothed in blankets and skins, their chief food was what they got by hunting and there was often much want of them. They had little or no land cleared, owned no cattle, hogs or horses. There were no schools for their children, who were brought up in idleness and ignorance. One of our old chiefs once said he used to spend the winter in the woods hunting, sell his skins in the spring, buy whiskey with the money and take it up the river in a canoe to his house, where the Indians would congregate until it was drunk up. Now many of you live in very comfortable frame houses, which are furnished with beds, chairs, stoves etc., you raise various crops, upon which your families live through the year, besides owning many cattle, horses and farm tools. There are now also good schools at which your children may learn much that is useful for them to know. We have found in our visits among you however, that there is a difference in the condition of your people. Some are living upon places that are well cleared of timber and underbrush, they have put good fences around them, planted orchards and are raising good crops and good stock.

"These are thrifty men, and we find they mostly send their children to school, and bring them up to help them on their farms, and so they become industrious, and useful when they grow older. But there is another class, and we are sorry to find it so large, who seem to care very little about their farms or their crops and although they may clear off a little patch, they soon let it grow up again with bushes; their houses and fences are very poor. We find such men often wandering idly about the country, and these are easily tempted to take strong drink and thus soon spend the little they may have, and do no good for themselves or families. We think if you would steadily work on your farms, it would be much better than lumbering and rafting. If you were to do so in a few years you would have pleasant homes around you, which would make you and your families comfortable and happy.

"There is another thing which has given us sorrow, it is to see that many marry when very young. We have seen girls not more than fifteen or sixteen years old the mothers of children. This is wrong. They ought to go to school and learn how to keep their houses clean and comfortable before they think of having families. And young men should have a house and some land cleared and be in a way to make a living before they marry so that they may be able to support their wives. If this care was taken on both sides, we believe there would not be so many separations between husband and wife as we now hear of, for these should feel nothing but love for each other, and nothing but death should part them. We find also that some marry who are very nearly related, this is not good, because the children of too near relations are apt to be feeble both in body and in mind.

"We remember that many of your women have been taught to spin and to knit and some of you years ago had sheep on your farms. We observe but few of these among you now, and we have not seen any of your women en- gaged in spinning or knitting. We are sorry for these things because it looks like going backward instead of forward."

This address was well received and the Com- mittee remark in their report:—"The respect- ful attention given to what was said by us at this and all the other conferences we had with the Indians, indicated we thought that their confidence in Friends was undiminished, and that many of them appreciate to a consider- able degree the feelings of interest and kindness which have actuated us in our efforts on their behalf. Could they but be induced to exert themselves more than they do in cultivating and improving their land they might with the Divine blessing remove many of the causes which now retard their advancement and yet become a prosperous people."

Items Concerning the Society.

On Third-day last a committee of three members from the Philadelphia Meeting for Sufferings went to Harrisburg to remonstrate to the Governor and legislators against certain objectionable bills which have been introduced into the legislature, and to encourage the passage of the Local Option Bill.

The grave of John Wilhelm Rowntree, of Eng- land, is in the burial-ground by Haverford Meet- ing-house, in Pennsylvania. In that house on last Sixth-day, the 17th instant, the funeral was held, his widow being present, who had landed with him in America the week before. His remains are thus left in America in the grounds where he had ex- pressed a desire they should be buried. Two others in recent years coming to America as ministers have left their mortal tabernacles in its soil,—Harriet Green at Guilford, in North Carolina, in 1902, and Susanna F. Pales, from Ireland, buried Seventh Month 11th, 1896, near Pocono, in Pen- nsylvania.

The following language of John Wilhelm Rown- tree, found in the Friends' Quarterly Examiner for First Month, 1905, contains now an added in- terest:—

"It appears to me that in insisting that Jesus was merely man, all the real beauty and signifi- cance of his life, and our own, is missed. If I give up external authority I do not want to know only what man can be, but what God is; and I want to see within the limits of human consciousness an identification or meeting-point between the soul of man and the unseen Spirit. If Jesus is that meet- ing-point or identification—a movement not merely of man towards a God who never answers, but of God towards man—then, with Jesus as the Gospel, witnessed in the conscience of a civilization in- fected by his Spirit, I see the balance-wheel to the doctrine of the Inward Light."

Again: "If the Society of Friends is to have a wider and increasing service, if it is to hold its young people, if, indeed, it is to have a continued existence at all, it must produce a modern inter- pretation [does he not mean a revived interpreta- tion in the newness of the Spirit?] of its original conception, and lead the world of thought to a deeper understanding of Jesus Christ."

Notes in General.

AMENITIES OF WAR.—The first Russian paroled officers reached Nagasaki on First Month 11th. They were welcomed by representatives of the citi- zens and the municipal officers and conducted to the Temple Garden, where refreshments were served. On behalf of the officers Colonel Trichakoff said that it was impossible "to express adequate thanks for such a cordial reception of men who were recently enemies of Japan." He believed that after the war "Russia and Japan would be fast friends, and that the treatment they had received showed that Japan holds the highest ethical position among the nations."

The observance of March 4 as inauguration day, says the Christian Advocate, instead of April 30, as some have urged, has been responsible for many deaths. In one year we took the pains to trace them up as reported in the papers. The number of serious illnesses, with a very large proportion of deaths, ran up to nearly one thousand. This year has been no exception. Among the most distinguished men who owe their death to exposure at this time is Senator William Brimage Bate, of Tennessee. He caught cold on inauguration day while sitting on the stand at the east front of the Capitol.

A PORTO RICO ITINERANT PREACHER.—Vidal Garcia lives on the island of Vieques, out in the Caribbean Sea, and is an exhorter in our village church of the island port. He was converted nearly twenty years ago. Wonderful peace came into his soul and marvellously transformed his life. Immediately he became a personal worker. He longed for others to share his religious comfort.

In Ninth Month, 1903, while working on a large chimney being constructed on a sugar-cane plantation he was the victim of an awful accident. The tall chimney, almost completed, suddenly fell to the ground, and six men were precipitated 106 feet. Three were killed, but Vidal lived. His arm, leg, and hand were broken, and for two months he lay in the hospital slowly creeping back to life and strength.

On recovery he entered into closer covenant with the Most High, and from that time has been a blessing and means of power to many lives. He believed God spared his life for a specific work, and that work to instruct the children and those older who are unable to read or write in things spiritual and material.

THE FASTING SEASON.—Very little fasting is done now-a-days by Protestants, and less than that of old by Catholics. There are now so many indulgences granted that no one need go hungry, no matter how faithfully he obeys the rules of his Church.

It is not wholly from greater lack of religion that we fast less than we did. Jesus never asked any one to fast. His disciples neglected that custom so long as they were with Him, but began it again when by themselves. Fasting is no part of religion; it is one way to get at one's religion when one has lost it. The purpose of it is to give time and thought to repentance when one has gone astray. . . .

But why should there be an overdose of worldliness to be followed by an overdose of piety? Why cannot there be a continual Lent, not of the forty days, but of the fifty-two weeks, ever

"To show a heart grief-ent;

To starve thy sin

Not bin

And that's to keep thy Lent."

—The Independent.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The ratification of an agreement with San Domingo respecting its indebtedness has been postponed by the Senate for the present. It is stated that in view of the expected adjournment of the present extra session of the Senate without favorable action upon the pending Dominican treaty, it is understood that the State Department has determined to proceed with the collection of customs at Puerto Plata and Monte Cristi under the terms of the arbitration award of last year.

In a recent address to a Congress of Mothers, lately holding their triennial convention in Washington, President Roosevelt said: "In bringing up your children you mothers must remember that while it is essential to be loving and tender, it is no less essential to be wise and firm. Foolishness and affection must not be treated as interchangeable terms; and besides training your sons and daughters in the softer and milder virtues you must seek to give them these stern and hardy qualities which, after life they will surely need. If you mothers through weakness bring up your sons to be selfish and to think only of themselves, you will be responsible for much sadness among the women who are to be their wives in the future. If you let your daughters grow up idle, perhaps under the mistaken impression that as you yourselves have had to work hard they shall know only enjoyment, you are preparing them to be useless to others and burdens to themselves. Teach them that work for themselves and also for others is not a curse but a blessing; and to do their whole duty before God and to man."

In an address before the Mothers' Congress, Senator DuBois, of Idaho, declared that Mormonism is a decided, if not the greatest single, menace which confronts us as a people. It is known that new polygamous marriages are being constantly entered into. The political strength of this organization has vastly increased, and in addition to absolutely controlling Utah, they hold the balance of power in Idaho and Wyoming, and are spreading over and threatening Oregon and Nevada, and have a following of no inconsiderable importance in other Western States. Their great aim is political power, so as to protect their new polygamous practices. The construction of the Bergen Hill has been awarded by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. It stipulates that the work shall be completed in less than two years. The tunnels will be part of the Pennsylvania Railroad's extension on the New York division intended to connect with the tunnels under North Street, and the tunnel which is under way. The Bergen Hill tunnels will be about 14 miles long.

Secretary Taft has expressed in a late letter the intentions of the Government in regard to the Philippines. He says: "The policy of the Administration is the indefinite retention of the Philippine Islands for the purpose of developing the property and the self-governing capacity of the Filipino people. The policy rests on the conviction that the people are not now capable of self-government, and will not be for a long period of time; certainly not for a generation, and probably not for a longer time than that, and that until they are ready for self-government it would be a violation of trust for the United States to abandon them."

In Wisconsin an anti-cigarette bill makes unlawful the sale, gift or importation into Wisconsin of cigarette or cigarette materials. In a debate which preceded the ballot the Tobacco Trust was charged with being the sole objector to the bill.

A newspaper correspondent recommends hot skim milk, not lukewarm, but boiling hot, as the cheapest and the best of drinks on a cold day, not only for the child on its way to school, but for anybody needing a nourishing stimulant to withstand the cold.

An educated Apache Indian, Dr. Carlos Montezuma, who for some years has been engaged in the Indian school at Cudahy, Pa., has objected to the disposition lately shown at Washington to change the character of this school and turn it into a military academy. At the recent commencement exercises, he was not allowed to present these views in a speech which he had prepared, but which has since been published. In it he says: "Let the younger generation of Indians be scattered here, in the same way, where, and receive freedom to work and to play as individuals, with the same privileges and subjected to the force of necessity as other men are, and in a few more years there will be no more need of Indian reservations and Indian bureaus."

A despatch from New York of the 10th says: The spread of the deadly epidemic all over the world is meeting with which the medical profession admits it knows little beyond the fact that it kills and that it is now epidemic, brought Dr. Darlington, president of the Board of Health, before the Board of Estimate and Apportionment to-day to ask an appropriation of $5000 with which to defray the expenses of a medical commission to investigate the cause of the epidemic plague. During the past week there were eighty-seven deaths from cerebro-spinal meningitis; 286 deaths from it are reported since First Month last.

In a recent report published by the Census Bureau on street and electric railways it is stated that at the present time the use of the cable car is confined almost exclusively to the city of Chicago, San Francisco and Green Bay, while the trolley, which was not used to any great extent prior to 1885, has practically superseded all other systems. In several instances even the steam railways have introduced electric motive power on their lines.

Recent rains and mild weather melting the snow have caused floods in many of the streams in this and neighboring States.

A. F. Spawns states that fifteen different dishes can be made from the banana—first dried and ground into flour. These include breakfast food, crackers, biscuits, cakes, bread, and "coffee."

FOREIGN.—A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 17th says: "The Japanese, with the remnants of his army, had evacuated the last fortified position in southern Manchuria. Northward into wintry wastes the beaten, shattered, disorganized army trudges on, its fate and its destination only matters of conjecture. It is reported that to save his dwindling ranks Kuropatkin will direct half of the stragglers toward Vladivostok 600 miles away; the other half toward the sea. It is estimated that one-half of the straggling horde may never reach its destination. Starvation may claim thousands on dreary, winter-locked wastes."

The Japanese report having captured great numbers of prisoners and vast stores of ammunition. General Kuropatkin has been superseded by the appointment of General Linvitch to the command of the Russian Troop Manchuria.

An attempt by Russia to obtain a new loan in France has failed, and the difficulty of raising money to prosecute the war, it is said, is tending to bring about cessation. The internal troubles of Russia are represented as very serious, rising in part from revolts of the peasants in the southern part of the empire, and strikers' labor in the various large cities.

It is stated that in the new province of Alberta, Canada there are thousands of Mormons who have tattered the Dominion from the United States within past five years. It is estimated that one-third of the polygamous. The Canadian prosecuting officers of the people have decided to act decisively before the scandalous case is issued. Prosecutions have been "by wholesale," and it is announced that notice has served on all polygamous Mormons that they must give up their plural wives or leave the territory.

A despatch from Egg Lake, Alberta, of the 16th in the Public Ledger of this city says: Oil of the highest quality ever discovered in the history of the world gushing from the earth in the Canadian North. Practically all the country to the north of Montana is a vast oil well, the richness of which is beyond known fields. In the extreme southwestern section Alberta, five miles from the American boundary, the people have sprung up within the past few years.

The valley in which these wells lie is described by geologists as an enormous crevice, caused by a volcanic action cross-cutting the formation of the Rocky Mountains and forming a basin into which the oil has seeped. It has formed enormous lakes underlying the rock formation at a depth of 1000 feet.

Mount Veatouris is again in a state of activity and explosions from it are heard at long distances.

Wanted.—Mother's helper, to assist with care infant. Address, D. J., Office of The Friend.

Tract Association of Friends.—The annual meeting of the Association will be held in the Committee of Arch Street Meeting-house, on Fourth-day evening 29th inst., at 8 o'clock. Reports of Auxiliary Associations and an interesting report of the Managers will be read. All are invited to attend.

HENRY B. ABBOTT, Caretaker.

Westtown Boarding School.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage motor train leaving Philadelphia 7.16 and 8.18 A. M., on 2nd and 3rd days of the month, will stop at the West Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, West Chester, Phone 1144. EDWARD G. SNEDELL, Agent.

DIED, at her home, near Tacoma, Ohio, on the 27th of Twelfth Month, 1904, TARIETH PATTERSON, seventy-three years. She had been a sufferer for years from rheumatism and a cancerous growth. Her mother, a kind and sympathizing friend, her paternal selfish life, and thoughtfulness for others was a wonderful example. At different times she expressed a hope her only Father would enable her to bear her suffering patiently to the end; and she leaves the assurance prayers were answered, and the purified spirit of a true Friend was called home. A meeting of some of our Sisters' Monthly Meeting, held at Ridge, Belmont Co., Ohio. The interment was at Ridge burying ground 22nd.

—, at her home in Media, Pa., on the thirteenth Second Month, 1905, SARAH L. SNEDELL, widow of N. S. Snedley, in her sixty-seventh year; a member of Co. B, Monthly Meeting, Pa., through many years of her life. Her husband was afflicted with much pain many privations and often in suffering, not only in mourning, but also with cheerfulness, enjoying a grateful heart which remained in the outward to rest and comfort her. Though expressing but little of her religious feelings, she was not unmindful of the presence of her Father, and she said in a conversation: "I found myself whenever it should please her Heavenly Father to say, 'It is enough.' She was sensible her own approaching and desirous to be released, and her husband had the consoling belief that through adorable love mercy, she has been admitted into that city, where she can say, 'I am sick,' united to her Father, and she found relief from all her pain and tribulation and from their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." "To him that overcometh will I give to sit on the tree of life which is in the midst of the Paradise of God."

trouble with us in bringing up our children that we prefer our own spirits to the Spirit.

present forty days' abstinence from indulgences as being diversions from spirit of Christ is an acknowledgment they have that effect in the other days of year. They can be spiritually harmful in only because wrong all the year round.

There is the moral difference between selling his vote for money and selling it for place? It is not to see a contingent of well-dressed men in a legislative hall, who privately apologize through some of their spokesmen that their conscience disapproves of a certain vote, but they must vote for it, or their former honest vote, else their managers will cause them to fail of reelection.

Why this is selling vote and conscience alike and power, a power which must result in weakness. "Ye shall receive power of the Holy Spirit has come upon you," never by disobedience to his witness in the world. For "so is the Holy Spirit witness, to God hath given (for power) to them that love him."—Acts v. 32.

It has been said that revivals must not be "got up," they must "come down." And indeed, "every good and perfect gift cometh down from the Father of lights," and many more revivals come down than are "got up," as the people get up into them, or revive them. Too many and too frequent are the revivals and the individual states that do not the day of their visitations, but yet visitations have come down to them, and they have been waiting upon them, but the visitation has not been waiting on the visitation. The life of man is not far from every one of us.

"Whither shall I go from thy Spirit?" All day long has He stretched forth his hand to a disobedient people. It is we that need to get up and surrender to the Holy Spirit that has come down. When men are ready to open their hearts and lives to Him, He is found to have been at the door waiting and knocking for admission. He enters, and revival is known, whether in the individual or in the community of hearts so disposed.

People of Wales, according to glad tidings now going forth, have seemed so disposed; and so may it be with any who are a willing people in the day of his power. That which is needed to discover a day of his power is the willingness of the people to come under it. In that yielding of themselves to his will, they discover that it was not the power that was far from any one of them, but it was themselves that had been far in their hearts from it.

The getting up of a revival is not the getting up of a willingness on our Father's part to bless us and to revive his work in us, for that He delights to do when we will let his work have free course in us and be glorified; but it is the getting up of a willingness in men to come into that condition in which He can revive us. "I persuade men," is the apostolic part assigned to the faithful. He would have us help make each other willing. He would have us minister to, or even through, one another's prejudices or peculiar conditions, so as to gain their hearts for his kingdom. It is the willingness of men that needs to be sought. Of our Heavenly Father's willingness we are sure.

So the getting up of a revival which really, to be a revival, must come down, is the getting up of men into that which does come down. And this uplifting of our fellow-beings, this work of persuasion of them Godward, itself comes down into the hearts, and lips, and exercise of the persuaders, from Him with whom they thus co-operate. Methods of persuading men may vary according to the eccentricities of the men, but whatever gets them up to go to the Father, co-operates with His compelling and drawing Spirit.

The revival which reveals to Christians their privilege and power in God, is that which also opens the sight of sinners to the movement and might of the Spirit. The keen vision of the new heart alone appreciates the needs of the sinning.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Explanatory Letter from Wm. C. Allen.

My friend Wm. B. Harvey and myself have received some of the portions of letters to our families which have appeared in THE FRIEND. They represent the lighter part of our work, and rather incidentally refer to the religious exercises and some of the trials or triumphs connected therewith. They were hastily penned to cheer loved ones at home, and not with the literary exactness desirable for publication. The hasty penmanship, doubtless, contributed to not a few errors when transferred to print. Some of my own serious comments were left out, doubtless for a wise purpose. I feel these explanations are due us.

Nevertheless, when engaged in the solemn work of traveling as minister of Christ, a certain humor and interest in new experiences is allowable. The unabridged journal of even George Fox proves that he could speak in lighter vein of some of his traveling experiences. Tired nerves require change of thought, and Christ's workers are like unto other men.

My dear friend and myself have had many trials, and now seem physically depleted, but we also have had many blessings. I want our dear young friends to know that Christ opens apparently tightly-closed doors, softens stony hearts, when we are favored to go into his work trusting Him alone. And I want them to know that the great harvest fields need their consecration and sacrifice of business, social enjoyments, or even health. The reward is sure,—it is not earthly, but heavenly. Will some who read these lines turn into God's highway and go forth and work in his field?

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

BARRADOS, Third Month 14th, 1905.

AFTER alluding to the death of his friend Mercy Comfort, Henry Wood wrote under date of Twelfth Month 20th, 1881: "As we see one after another called from works to rewards, I hope we shall be admonished of the great uncertainty of life and be incited to know the work of preparation to be going forward. And if we find there is a work yet to be done, let us be encouraged by the remembrance that with the Lord there is mercy and plenteous redemption, and that He will redeem Israel from all his iniquities."

It is not only the worldly and unrighteous man who fails to find peace, until he turns to Thee; but the soul which Thou hast freed from the bonds of sin can enjoy no peace if it still resists, by any reserve and delay, those piercing pricks of Thy Spirit which urge it on to renunciation, childlike docility and self-denial. Without this utter sacrifice there can be no peace, no progress; nothing remains but the uneasiness of a soul which is solicited by God, and which fears to see how far God will lead it.—Fenelon.

The Cruise of the "Arabic."

En route to Malta.

Second Month 17th, 1905.—We have had a fine time in Algiers to-day, and enjoyed it beyond telling. We were landed right after breakfast, and found carriages waiting for us. You can imagine the commotion that six hundred of us make scrambling for vehicles at one time. The ease with which it is accomplished speaks well for the management.

The first thing that struck us was the varied types of humanity, including Moors, Arabs, Turks and Jews, all in native costumes, the women veiled and the men with their bare legs. This, with the combination of cultured French life, made a strong contrast. We were taken into a mosque first, and were obliged to put on huge slippers over our shoes. It was a problem to keep them on. The building is hard to describe, seemingly being rows of Moorish-looking arches. There is a fountain in the courtyard used for the ablutions of the Mohammedan worshippers. We saw one Arab scribe copying the Koran, and he did it very neatly. The greater part of three hours was consumed in driving to the beautiful suburbs, past charming villas and imposing hotels. We stopped at the Governor's palace and were shown a portion of it. The gardens were extensive, and the tropical palms and flowers very lovely. The road wound around the hills in terrace fashion, and at the top we had a magnificent view of the city, suburbs, and the harbor filled with shipping. Our driver was quite skilled in gathering wild flowers from the slopes, especially after he received sixpence. On the way down we drove to the famous gardens, containing fine specimens of palms, aloes and orange trees, and also some ostriches. The old Arab quarter was probably most interesting, as showing their life. The streets are narrow, with long flights of steps, and exceedingly dirty. Unfortunately the sun was hidden all day, and I could not get any snap-shots. We had luncheon in a French restaurant, very good, and a change from ship fare. The fish was delicious, and I had my favorite chocolate. There were many tempting things to buy, for those who had plenty of money! The natives were allowed to display their goods on deck as usual, but their prices were high. The time was all too short. The usual gay scene was enacted on our departure; the natives were hurried off, the gangway hauled up. Several little torpedo-boats kept darting in and out around us as we left, which made it quite exciting. They ploughed through the water like the wind. It is quite damp and cloudy so far tonight, and we have not felt it any warmer in the Mediterranean.

Second Month 18th.—We have been steaming along the coast of Africa all day with the shore in plain sight, and an occasional building on the top of a high hill, the use of which we could not conceive. Now we are passing Cape Bon, which you can find on your maps, and will soon be out of sight of land for awhile. We had the excitement of two whales spouting nearby to-day, the very first I have seen.

Second Month 19th.—This morning found us in the harbor of Malta surrounded by English warships, eight in number. We were quite near the landing, so we went off in small boats, a rather nice experience. Malta impresses one as even stronger than Gibraltar, and every two miles there is a fortress of some kind. Timothy Hussey arranged a special program for the Friends, instead of following the crowd. This consisted mainly of a trip to St. Paul's Bay, a distance of seven or eight miles from Valetta where we landed. There was every prospect of a rainy day, so we dressed accordingly, and to our disappointment, Timothy and Anna Hussey gave up going on account of the weather. We were assigned to a carriage with two others, and a Malta cab is rather a restricted affair. Fortunately it was covered, and we were protected from the occasional showers. The rainy season not being over here, we were grateful that it did not pour. The ride was very interesting through the very fertile country, which is highly cultivated, and produces two crops a year. The gardens are protected by rather high stone walls, and the total absence of trees gives an odd effect. The frequent hurricanes account for the lack of trees. We were kept in delighted exclamations over the wild flowers, and gathered as many as we could. The old city (Citta Vecchia), about six miles out, was passed, and we had a very good view of the ruins.

Arriving at the supposed scene of Paul's shipwreck, we had the twenty-seventh chapter of Acts read to us. As we were conjecturing on the exact spot, a beautiful rainbow appeared over the beach and seemed to point the way. It was an impressive picture, long to be remembered. We could imagine St. Paul gathering the fagots, and see the viper fastened to his wrist! A popular legend explains the present absence of venomous serpents by saying that Paul put a curse upon them. There is a statue and a chapel upon the supposed spot, and from time immemorial Paul has been the tutelary saint of the Island. The sun was nearly out by this time, so the drive back was more comfortable. Our guide was overanxious to take us to a certain café for lunch. We found the menu in Italian and the price piteous. We ordered chocolate, as it was the only thing that we could understand. It was hot and good, so filled the bill, as we had supplied ourselves with crackers and malted milk tablets. We saw the milk-talked-of act of milking goats at the doors of dwellings. The milkmen, or boys, and their goats were very numerous. After lunch we visited the Governor's palace and saw some fine tapestries, representing different countries; also Armory Hall, with its great collection of armors and old cannons. The cathedral of St. John was a remarkably over-decorated building, but very impressive, with its marble memorials of the Grand Knights. It dates from 1573. We went to the chapel of bones, a most grotesque sight, which reminded us of the catacombs of Mexico. When we reached the ship we found the Maltese merchants displaying their goods, and the frantic bargaining of the ladies. These people must get a rather poor impression of Americans, and one often feels ashamed. The Maltese lace is certainly beautiful. We were sorry that we did not see a cat! Our ship was off by five o'clock amid the shrieking of whistles and salute of guns. The harbor is full of torpedoes, so a pilot set us out into the open, and Valetta was soon left in the Second Month 20th.—A beautiful day after our long restful night we feel quite enjoying the "blue Mediterranean." "blue" in parenthesis, as it is what you a hear, but as yet I have not seen any differ The clouds are heavy and the sun much clo which perhaps accounts for it. There i a particle of pitch or roll on the ship This afternoon we have been skirting shores of Greece, and the mountains are and rugged, and look through the glass though covered with snow. It may b rough to land at Phaleron Bay when w there to-morrow; if so, we have to go to other landing-place. So far we have no any difficulty, but last year the ship coul land at either Algiers or Malta. The ca is on duty day and night now, going th these difficult places.

Second Month 21st.—At last we are in. The sunrise was beautiful, and we so excited at being so near the classic s that we could not stay in bed.

Sea of Marmora, en route to Constantinople.

Second Month 23d, 1905.—Our time Athens was memorable indeed. I had expected to stand on those ancient ruins it all seemed quite natural, after all. We favored with fine weather, and were land Phaleron soon after breakfast on Third The bay was lovely, and we had a fine vie the Acropolis and the snow-capped moun as soon as we came on deck. It was the fair day that they had had for a month while quite cool in the morning, the sun very warm when we began to climb the Phaleron is three miles from Athens, a fine electric road runs to the city (third equipment). Carriages were provided for whole distance. The driver was pleasant we were soon in the remains of our first temple, Jupiter Olympius. It is the se largest Greek temple known, and was fin 130 A. D. Twelve of the magnificent col are still standing, one having recently fa we had a good idea of the construction. is the Corinthian architecture. The ar Hadrian leads to Olympius, only a po being left. A short distance on we can the Theatre of Dionysius. The seats or ally ran up to the very edges of the Cliff were of marble. The first rows were ch and we sat down to meditate! It could accommodate thirty thousand people, and the inscriptions were plainly to be read by learned. Don't tell us Greek is a dead language! The only English we saw in all Athens was "Thomas Cook & Sons." and every French and Spanish signs were missing. The Acropolis, of course, was the main point of interest, and after driving as near as possible, we climbed the steeper parts. The of the temple, Athena Nike (the Winged Victory), has eight ionic columns, and of the frieze is preserved. Some of it is of the British Museum. The view from here is very fine. Still ascending over rocks and fallen debris, carved vases and bits of columns, which would look very nice on a lawn at home, we get our first near view of the Parthenon. On the north side of the Acropolis is the Erechtheum, with its porch of the maidens. Some of the figures are well preserved, and

Whereas Hannah Barnard, of the City of Hudson, in the State of New York, having been a favored member and acknowledged minister amongst us the people called Quakers, endowed with talents and qualifications for service in the Church of Christ, and had she continued to experience an humble abiding, under the influence of the precious principle of light and grace in her own heart which would have preserved her in that humility and meekness and self-denial, that beautifies and ever should adorn, a minister of Christ, and in conduct consistent with the dignity of our profession she might have been eminently useful; but unhappily, by giving way to an aspiring, exalted mind, she hath so far become clouded in her understanding, and been led away by the spirit of diversion, as to call in question the authenticity of various parts of the Scriptures of Truth, both of the Old and New Testament, which, in common with other professors of faith in Christ, we have always acknowledged to be of Divine authority and most surely believed in by us; particularly she does not unite with the Society in acknowledging the truth of that part which relates to the miraculous conception and miracles of Christ; that she hath not only imbibed these erroneous and dangerous sentiments, but is assiduous in disseminating them among others; hence, it evidently appears that she is not one with us, in principle or in practice, and having had abundant labor bestowed upon her, by Friends in a private way, as well as by divers meetings in Great Britain, in order to convince her of the dangerous tendency of the sentiments she entertains, and if possible to avert the evils which appeared to await her; but all their endeavors proved unavailing, she still continuing to promote the ideas she had formed and strenuously defend the ground she had taken, and although we deeply lament her sorrowful declension from the unerring standard, the Spirit of Truth, yet, apprehending we had done our duty in the extension of our care and best endeavor, under the influence, we trust, of peace, love and unfeigned desires for her welfare and recovery, and there appearing, at present, no prospect of advantage to result, from further forbearance or labor, we therefore, for the support of our Christian testimony, and in order that as a religious body, we may acquit ourselves with propriety in the sight of that being, who is perfect in all his ways, by bearing our testimony against a spirit of infidelity, which appears evidently to have gained too great an ascendancy in the present day, hereby testify that we can no longer hold religious fellowship with the said Hannah Barnard, but disown her from being any longer a member of our Society, until by attending to the convicting operations of the Spirit of Truth in her own mind, she may become sensible of her deviations, and evince a change of heart and sentiment, and manifest a disposition of mind to become reconciled to us.

On the way down to the hotel stopped at the Temple of Theseus, the best rved of the ancient temples, and while frieze is mostly gone, the Doric columns e perfectly preserved. You can easily im- ge how difficult it was to take in all this in a large company. I never saw such chandeliers in my e, and it must be a blaze of glory when the e tric lights are on. King George is very eocratic, and last year came down to the e, and they tell a story of one of the pas- sengers going up to him and saying, "Good- morn, sir, I understand you are the King e Greece. After a visit to the e- office and telegraph office and some shops, e drove to the station in the heart of the e, and took the train for Phaleron, where e ship lay. It has astonished me how much e stance the few Spanish words I learned in e- icio last winter have been. At the post- e I found them useful here as in Spain. We e quite weary, but were in time for dinner, which refreshed us somewhat. A great many people remained on shore over night, as it is "the thing" to see the Parthenon by moon- light. It is a disadvantage to be without a man, as we do not like to intrude on other parties for such excursions, and two ladies cannot go alone. Fourth-day bright and early we left the ship and took the train for the city, determined to stroll around the Acropolis at our own sweet will, regardless of guides. We overheard another lady say she would like to join a party, so we invited her to go with us. She proved to be a "Jones" too, but from St. Louis, and a very pleasant companion. We left the train at the Theserons station and walked a very short distance to the temple. From here we engaged carriages to drive up to the Acropolis, and were joined by two other ladies from the "Arabic," who agreed to pay their share. We certainly enjoyed the morning, and had ample time to get acquainted with the great ruins. We had the mountains pointed out by Dr. Lorenz (author of the Guide Book), who happened on the spot. Hymettus, haunted of the bees and muses, on the east, and beyond, Pentelicon, where they obtained all this beautiful white marble. Away off we could see the straits of Salamis, and the way the natives sell the strings of shells from the beach, I should think they would not last many ages more! We invested sixpence, as it was easier than gathering the shells at that distance. On our return to the city our carriage fell in with another funeral procession, plainly of a prominent person, a long procession of marines and military personages, the band leading, playing a dirge. The driver got us through before we came up with the body (which proved to be an Admiral), for which I was thankful. It is such an odd custom. The street near the church was simply jammed with people. We left the carriage at Hotel Bretagne and inquired for letters, and then strolled on down to the station, shopping on the way. We made close connection, and were on the boat by 12.30. After one o'clock lunch we got the glasses and went on deck. Our ship sailed promptly at 2 P. M., and we watched the Parthenon in the brilliant sunlight until no longer visible, and we were soon wending our way among the islands of the Grecian Archipelago. This morning early our good ship stopped at the Dardanelles until sunrise, when we were allowed to proceed. This is a cast-iron rule of the country (or seas) to which all must comply. Those that were up had a good chance to see the site of ancient Troy. It seemed very cold, such a stiff breeze was blowing from the northeast. I took the thermometer out, and it registered 48°, a drop of 12°. The temperature has been about 60° for some time. We have our courier on, and as he wears a fez cap, he looks quite like the Turk he is. We are due in Constantinople at 4 o'clock this afternoon, where the ship will dock. As the passport business consumes a great deal of time, we are advised not to go ashore to-night. To-morrow we are to spend sight-seeing, as usual. To-night there is to be a lecture on Constantinople by a member of the Faculty of Robert College, and no doubt it will be a treat.

Can the Theatre be Called Safe?*

[On the Depth of the Impression left by the Iroquois Theatre Disaster.]

In the pages of a religious serial called the Burning Bush, a young girl recounts how she was warned in a dream against attending the theatre. The circumstance occurred soon after the burning of the Iroquois Theatre, in Chicago, last winter, that fearful incident making a vivid impression on her mind because some neighbor children were among the victims. She had then said to herself that if ever she went into the world, nobody could induce her to enter the doors of a play-house. Being at Los Angeles soon afterward, she dreamed that she listened to the persuasions of a certain person to go with her to a theatre. It seemed as though she had never been in so dismal a place. She had thought that people in theatres showed themselves at least, to be a happy set, yet she beheld quite the reverse. As she went in, the word "Iroquois" kept ringing in her ears, making her so miserable that she saw nothing of what was going on on the stage, her one thought being that if happily she got out of there alive, she would never again set her foot inside a theatre.

"A few days after this," she says, "while staying all night with my grandmother, who was a Christian, my parents being out of the city, some ungodly relatives asked me to go down town to see some moving pictures. I did not just approve of it, but I went with them, thinking all the time that I would not go in. On our way they said, 'Everything in the afternoon is called a matinee.' I knew what it was then, and firmly said that they could not entice me into such a place. They told me that my mother would not care; but they knew in their hearts that she would. I think we stayed on the corner discussing the matter about half an hour. They tried to persuade me just to go in, and then if my conscience troubled me, we would come out. I told them that it troubled me before going in, and also that I was a Christian; but if I went in I would come out a sinner. I was not sorry for standing up for Jesus, and I give Him all the glory for keeping me out of that wicked place. I think they are the trap-doors to hell."

Was the characterization of this girl-witness wrong? Was it ill-judged, hasty, unsupported by the facts? We will take up the theme just where she left it, and, reverting to the Iroquois Theatre and its fateful afternoon "matinee," read what the Christian Witness relates as occurring on the stage a few minutes before the wild bursting forth of the death-dealing flames:

"An outcast woman applies to one and another for refuge. No one will receive her. Then she applies to Bluebeard, Junior, who also rejects her. In despair she takes a dagger and plunges it into her heart, saying, 'Then I will go to hell.' She falls; a trap-door lets her down out of sight. In a few minutes she is thrown up as the trap-door opens. She is clad in a fireman's suit with a placard on her back, saying, 'No room for her here,' while the flames of hell are represented as bursting out and up and all about her. Then it is said by some one, 'Is there any danger of hell? No, the place was full long ago.' A few minutes later, after this sacrilege, flames burst forth in reality, and hundreds of people are ushered into eternity, struggling, praying, shrieking. The extravaganza is all over. The tragedy has followed. Reality begins. Preachers and prominent church-members are in that throng, witnessing that (so-called) 'innocent play,' that travesty on decency. Do the leaders of religion in the land improve the opportunity which God has thrust upon them, to warn the church of the nature of the indecent, immoral, Sabbath-breaking institution called the theatre. Scarcely one."

And so this Methodist paper, earnestly deprecating the talk of a lowering of their church discipline in the matter of worldly amusements, pleads with the membership that they turn not aside from the terribly direct lesson of the so recent calamity. To the relief of many, he it said, the General Conference, gathered at Los Angeles several months later, decided to leave the discipline in that regard unaltered. Their board of foreign missions likewise, rejected a bequest of many thousands of dollars left them by the will of one of their "prominent church members," who had been present and lost his life at the Iroquois Theatre burning. This successful business man, it was said, had repeatedly rejected the counsel of friends who had cautioned him to let the theatre alone, not only for his own soul's sake, but because of the young people among whom he appeared as a leader, and as the head of a church organization. "Therefore shall his calamity come suddenly; suddenly shall he be broken without remedy" (Proverbs vi: 15).

It was on a night near the close of the year 1811, that there occurred the burning of the theatre at Richmond, Virginia, when two hundred lives were lost. An English clergyman, Robert May, visiting this country at the time, published afterward a volume of addresses to young people, in which there occurs a graphic description of the Richmond disaster. He beseeches his readers to shun the theatre as a destroyer of souls, to seek for real pleasure where it may be found, and not to "pursue the phantom of imaginary happiness." The like exhortations were heard, for long, all over the country. In Richmond, the council of the city forbade all public amusements for the space of four months. "It was also determined," says the narrator, "that a day should be set apart for fasting, humiliation and prayer in commemoration of an event in which all who had any sense of piety could not but see and acknowledge that the hand of God had been most strikingly and affectingly displayed."

Should we ask ourselves whether the Iroquois Theatre disaster of a little more than thirteen months ago, has left a similar sobering impress on the community, I fear we would need to reply in the negative. In Chicago itself, in New York, Philadelphia and all the large cities, there was a general and a most careful inspection of all the play-houses, and in many cases alterations were ordered that they might be made perfectly "safe," but the road of sensuous and debasing spectacles, alas, goes on just as it did before. Meanwhile, a specious scheme is abroad to ally the Church with the Theatre—but let the dren of the Light stand in their own lot.

"I have received the box containing the books, and I have begun to give some of it to my best friends, able to understand the doctrines of Truth and to fight for peace.

"I am pleased in saying to thee that my work of congregating all the people who desire work for peace is doing it the right way. We are going on and in a few days, after other public lecture, we will constitute Society of Peace. I am astonished to see people happy to go in this way, even an Roman Catholics. A great friend of mine, Elder in my church, who has resigned his commission as colonel in the army, given his name and thou canst understand that this case shall be very useful.

"I have begun also my work outside church as an Evangelist. Last week we for a week, in a city in the mountains of Center Masamet and I succeeded in bringing together the pastors of three antagonistic churches to have a peace union meeting, we had the most magnificent service in church larger than the Bethany. My study in my college are also very interested in that I have to tell them. All desire that may be the means of a serious revival of true spirit of Jesus. Naturally I am the want of the Lord. He will do with his servant He will. And if I suffer some persecution, I know that the Spirit has given me command to go and preach. If I had only means of leaving the established church, it my work would be blessed. I would go, and moment is propitious. The religious ideas discussed. The position of the Government in proposing the separation of Church and State has brought the religious problem in front. Now we have an opportunity equal to that of the 17th Century, if not better. Woe to us if we do not go and give to the people the message God has delivered to us through his Spirit. We have organized with two friends here a series of six public meetings, calling Roman Catholics and free thinkers to listen to our reason and asking their criticisms in order to establish the Truth. I will tell thee more about that in my next letter.

"The Minister Combes is fallen down. I have not yet the new cabinet. I hope that they will succeed in making the discipline."

"My kind regards to thy wife and children, and to the dear friends I know. I love you in the Lord the more I think of all I owe you. You have been the means of a true comfort and I now feel that my preaching is more powerful. It comes of my having found that God was merciful and would lead me to the way. ## From Porto Rico to Barbados.

Royal Mail Steamer Seyern.

St. Thomas, Second Month 7th, 1905.—We find that it may be truthfully said that we did not as we could for Porto Rico; and though there is very much to do that has not been done, and that it is suffering to be done, the way seemed clear to leave, and this ship was going when and where we wanted to go. In the retrospect of language is, "What shall we render unto the Lord for all his benefits?"

We went right to sea, around the big rock, with its walls seventy-five feet high, and immediately were in the swell of the great Atlantic. I felt as though I had been in a whirlwind at the last, but soon settled down to life. Got out my things so as to have them dry and shipshape, and was ready for dinner at 7 P. M. It was delightful to have English cooking, and to forget the grease. Our room was a good one, about six by eight feet, with two berths, a long sofa, two washstands, and plenty of racks and hooks. The ship is old-fashioned, but clean and comfortable. There is no open deck almost the whole ship's length. We had anchored in the bay during the early morning, so soon went ashore. This harbor is a charming picture: the blue water, the red-roofed white houses on the hill-side leading to the wharves, with high, grim hills behind, make a beautiful scene. St. Thomas is a Denmark colony, but the people are nearly all black, and mostly speak English. I climbed a hill to "Blue Beard's Castle," which commands an extensive view. Then we wandered round the town, and by noon were quite willing to come out to the ship and rest for the afternoon. The boys, in spite of the sharks, would dive from their boats for the pennies which we dropped from the ship, and they got them, too.

St. Kitts, Second Month 8th.—We are just starting from this port as I write. We have been here from 11 A. M. to 2 P. M. We went ashore for about an hour. It is a clean little town, looking full of small houses, palm-trees and negroes. Sugar is grown here in the old-fashioned wasteful ways. We were greatly comforted by a troop of blacks following us, being to offer to guide us. They were much our way, so we had to invoke the black prince, then we had the view to ourselves. The river is indescribable, a deep, tender blue, fringed with streaks of green of the rarest tints, translucent Nevis.

This is a quaint-looking old town as seen from the ship. Columbus called it "Nieve," meaning a drifting snow, as its highest peak of thirty-five hundred feet was almost always enveloped in white cloud, and that remarkable feature was true yet, as we saw the clouds hung round the day was fine. We did not stop, as we did not stop long. The industries are practically the same as at St. Kitts. We greatly enjoyed the exquisite tints of the water in this sea,—the pea-greens and indigos. The sunsets are very beautiful.

Guadeloupe, Second Month 9th.—We have just left this port about 10.30 A. M. We went ashore in the ship's boat for about fifteen minutes. We stop at all these ports to put off our take on mail. If there is cargo to move it stops much longer than for mail. Guadeloupe is a French colony. I have seen it from only the ship, with its great mountain in the middle of the island. I saw a little of the streets of Basse-Terre whilst we were a few minutes ashore. Guadeloupe is noted for vanilla beans. They were peddled about the streets by the women.

St. Lucia, Second Month 10th.—To-morrow we expect to be in Barbados. We stopped yesterday at Dominica. It is a rich place for tropical beauty. I have seldom seen such a charming picture as, just before sunset last evening, was presented from the ship. Cocoa is an important crop. We saw the beans—a little larger than hulled almonds—in large trays drying in the sun. The culture of lime forms the chief industry. Many casks of lime-juice and much cocoa came on board for London.

We passed Martinique in the night. There was grim old Mount Pelee, emitting fumes sufficient to hide a bright star. But St. Pierre is a dead city and sadly buried.

To-day we spent at St. Lucia. We climbed a hill eight hundred feet high, behind the town, this morning. The road was shaded most of the way, and alive with men and women carrying packages of one hundred and twelve pounds each on their heads at one cent per package. Every turn was a new scene of nearly novelty and far-off beauty out over the blue sea.

On the citadel, which we climbed, a military force is garrisoned. Other forts are placed lower down, with guns of great power. But all the treasure spent in trying to make this naval base impregnable has to be abandoned. Work has stopped on buildings under way. Port Arthur's experience, it seems, has taught a lesson about bottling up warships, and the British government is taking the hint. Each brick costs sixpence, delivered at the garrison up the heights.

I suppose it will never fall to my lot to see again such a rich and varied assortment of tropical growth as regaled our sight in the Botanical Garden.

Barbados, Second Month 11th.—We got to the port early, and after breakfast landed. We are at a private boarding-house that was recommended to us. Everything in the house is thoroughly English. The house is right on the beach, two miles out of Bridgetown. All is white and clean.

Bridgetown, Barbados, Second Month 14th.—Our room here at Hastings is about two miles out of Bridgetown; here we are quiet and have the fresh air. Our room overlooks the sea, which, at high tide, laps within twenty-five feet of our window. We are right between the kitchen and pantry, which I do not like for various reasons; but other things induce us to remain; and thus the table is fine—straight English in cooking, etc.

Our usual labor connected with opening our way is progressing. Calls are made on various people explaining our views, getting them interested, and securing their aid in finding suitable places for meetings. We did not know a soul when we landed, and only of one person, a missionary, S. Antoinette Esterbrooke. But we feel we have been making wonderful progress since Seventh-day.

S. A. Esterbrooke is a missionary who runs her mission on faith, regarding funds and everything else. I wish some of our friends could hear her preach—she has the gift. She at once, on Seventh-day, asked us to attend her congregation First-day night. When we reached there we found some two hundred and fifty present, white and black, evidently most of them pretty well educated. She desired the meeting should be conducted entirely our way. We had a solemn time of waiting on the Lord; then was presented the language, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock," and both visitors had something to say. A prayer followed. Then A. S. Esterbrooke, after one hour, requested liberty to follow up the meeting herself, which I was glad of. She followed up the exercise that had preceded, urging all who felt the renewed call for open confession of Christ publicly to express it, and their resolve to serve Him hereafter. About seven made this confession—no disorder or excitement—but a deeply spiritual time it was. Others gave their testimony to the preciousness of the opening the door of their hearts to Christ, and to their appreciation of our time of waiting on God. These two things, and the need of the last to secure the former, had been the meeting's theme. It was a confirming meeting to ourselves, as well as others.

Bridgetown is a perfect example of an old English town. It has, however, glaring white streets and walls, from using the coral stone, of which the island is made. The streets ramble around in all sorts of directions, are very narrow, with apologies for sidewalks, some places none at all. There are a multitude of shops, some quite large ones; almost everyone walks in the middle of the street. All are blacks, except about one-tenth, who are white. Most of the white people are English, with lovely homes in the suburbs, and are typically English in dress, speech and deportment. A good many ride round in comfortable carriages with black coachmen.

The black people are of a totally different grade from those of Porto Rico; almost all seem to have more or less education, while some are managers of large commercial concerns, are very intelligent, and perfectly well-bred in manner. Many of these have countenances of a fine type. Of course the great majority look like the regulation negro everywhere. But a few generations of equal chance with white people exhibit the fact that some of the race can develop into men of affairs and race. Some of them we find to be astute reasoners, combined with a subtle imagery in speech, characteristic of this people.

17th.—Our labor has evoked many conversations with people in all conditions of life; we find a condition religiously, vastly different from that of Porto Rico. Here, the Bible is a text-book, taught in all the public schools. So we find lawyers, gentlemen, clerks, teamsters, and boatmen all able to quote the Bible, and formulate some opinion thereon. And some of those in humble life appreciate spiritual truths, as a result of their meditations on texts which they have so acquired in younger years. There is an interest in religion, and a freedom to converse about divine things seriously, which much reminds me of similar conditions all over the rural portions of England.

Yet, I am free to believe what I hear, that some of the most apt quoters of Scripture amongst the negroes may be the quickest to lie and steal, etc., if temptation comes their way.

When we land in a strange country, we do not know anything about people, who will help and who will not. Nor do we know about halls, methods, advertising and many other details—all has to be worked out from the ground floor up, as the saying is. So our week has been one of hard work, trying to get light in the dark. But as in Porto Rico, many things have unexpectedly aided us, and we feel good progress is being made. We have in prospect for the next week work enough into which we feel led to keep us very busy. May the Master bless it, and grant the baptism of the Holy Spirit, who alone can make our meetings of any avail!—for our instrumentality is poor and inefficient, after all.

The weather here is showery—maybe five or twenty showers, or “sprinkles,” per day. Then the sun shines. Often the rain comes from the east, along with the trade-wind, whilst the sun shines overhead right on you. The constant, brisk trade-wind keeps the temperature very bearable indeed.

16th.—We have engaged the Young Men's Christian Association hall for First-day evening, Second Month 19th, to which the public will be invited. W. C. A. has met a colored man who had bought a copy of Barclay's Apology at a sale, and was convinced of the views therein expressed. We have spent near two hours with an old man, Fitzpatrick, who took us to Friends' property long ago on Tudor Street, formerly Quaker Street. The old brick front still stands. A fire some forty years ago swept the main portion of the city. We found what seems undoubtedly remains of an elevated place of burial; also the old grounds adjoining the Jews' synagogue. The Rabbi in charge remembers that a “Quaker” lived there many years ago.

In Porto Rico we saw very small horses. Here the better class of people have nice horses, but the general beast of burden is the little ass. They come about to my hips, and are hitched to tiny carts and carry quite heavy loads. They are cute little things. The braying that they set up when they part with or meet their comrades, is something strange to witness in a large city.

This is far the most important port of the West Indies as a port of call; vessels stop from almost all parts of the world—many of them sailing vessels—to get supplies, though more particularly for orders.

Yesterday we went to an elementary school. It was on the old-fashioned plan,—children around in groups, and not a few readings, some almost to the limit of their voices,—fairly shouting. As we entered the yard the principal who was instructing a large group outside, stopped, and soon went with us inside. The room is 25x50, and has simple little benches strewn round instead of desks. There had been as many as two hundred and sixty pupils in this room, though not one hundred and eighty while we were there. I told the principal that the noise was too great for the children even to think. There are three assistants. We were told that there are one hundred and sixty-six schools on the island, or one to each square mile.

There is much poverty and not much wealth. There is one estate here covering two hundred acres. In the palmy days when sugar industry was good, a purchaser paid eighteen thousand pounds for it; now it would not bring four thousand. Laborers receive ten pence to a shilling a day, boarding themselves.

Conditions for our work here are very different from Porto Rico, but we have things to work up ourselves,—matters which at home would appear quite simple. But very fair progress has been made, and we have much to be thankful for. It appears that there are some twenty different religious sects on the island, and there appears some feeling between them of rivalry. It is so encouraging to meet one person after another who knows Christian truths, and we talk to them, colored and white.

SECRETARY HAY'S HYMN.

That Secretary of State John Hay is an author and poet is well known, but not everybody is aware that he has written more than one fine hymn. The following was written for a Christian Endeavor Convention:

INVOCATION.

Lord! from far-remembered climes we come
To meet at last in Thee, our Home,
Thou who hast been our Guide and Guard
Be still our hope, our rich reward.

Defend us, Lord, from every ill.
Strengthen our hearts to do Thy will.
In all we plan and all we do
Still keep us to Thy service true.

O let us hear the inspiring word
Which they of old at Horeb heard,
Breathe to our hearts the high command,
“Go onward and possess the land!”

Thou who art Light, shine on each soul!
Thou who art Truth, each mind control!
Open our eyes and make us see
The path which leads to Heaven and Thee!

—JOHN HAY.

TRUE TO PRINCIPLE.—Stephen Girard, the unbeliever millionaire of Philadelphia, one Seventh-day made his clerks come the following day and unload a vessel which had just arrived.

One of the clerks who had strong convictions, and the power to act upon them, refused to comply with the demand.

“Well, sir,” said Girard, “if you can not do as I wish, we can separate.”

“I know that, sir,” said the hero. “I also know that I have a widowed mother to care for but I can not work on Sunday.”

“Very well, sir,” said the proprietor; “go to the cashier's desk, and he will settle with you.”

For three weeks the young man tramped the streets of Philadelphia, looking for work. One day a bank president asked Girard to name a suitable person for cashier for a new bank about to be started. After reflection, Girard named this young man.

“But I thought you discharged him?”

“I did,” was the answer, because he would not work on Sunday, and the man who will lose his situation from principle is the man to whom you can entrust your money.

The most valuable part of any country's population are those who are the most trustworthy for conscience' sake. Those whom a government can least afford to spare are those who must sometimes be found holding their loyalty to the will of God, above any enactments of human law. In destroying such governments make the great mistake of destroying the real exalters of a nation.—Ez.

FOR "THE FRIEND." The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Year Meeting.

These Friends also visited the Cattaraugus Reservation, and were pleased with the evidences of thrift and comfort, which they found there. They remark “It has a population about 1550 Indians, 647 are children, 557 these are stated by the Superintendent of Public Schools, of suitable age to go to school. The land of this Reservation is represented by some of the best in the state. A large part of it is cleared and fenced and many of the farms are very well cultivated. Many of the dwelling houses are good, commodious buildings, comfortably furnished and the ground around some of them are neatly laid out. The whole appearance of the thickly settled port indicates a thriving industrious community.

“On both Reservations there are places of worship comfortably furnished, those at Cattaraugus are quite expensive structures, capable of seating some hundreds of persons. They are occupied by the Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist congregations. A council house has recently been erected, at Cattaraugus Indian mechanics at a cost to the Nation twenty-five hundred dollars. There is also an orphan Asylum with accommodations for fifty or sixty pupils. It was established as a home for the protection, care and education of orphan and destitute children from any of the Indian tribes located in New York. It is conducted in an economical yet efficient manner, the children being required to assist in the work of both farm and family. It is managed by trustees, six of whom are Indians and six are whites.”

“The location of the Allegheny Reservation is not so favorable for the improvement of population as that of Cattaraugus, although at one time the Allegheny Indians were far advanced of the latter.”

“Many of those who are now in the most prosperous on the Cattaraugus Reservation have migrated from the Allegheny, being doubt attracted by the better quality of the land for farming purposes.”

In the early part of the year 1865 before the Civil war had closed, demands were made upon the Friends at Tunesassa for the payment of one hundred and eighty dollars military uses, which when refused, property that amount was levied on and sold.

The Friends who made their report of the visit to the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservations from which the above extracts are taken were continued under appointment and with the addition of Ebenezer Worth were authorized to visit the various Indian tribes located within the state of New York, with the view of ascertaining more definitely the condition, and advising them as way may open for it, upon such points as it may appear they would contribute to their welfare. Address introducing them to the Indians was prepared and sent with them.

The time occupied in performing this journey to the reservations of the different tribes lasted about three weeks, and included a visit to the Oneidas, Onondagas, St. Regis, Tuscarora, Tonawanda Indians (the latter a band of the Senecas) and to the Shinnecock Indians on Long Island. A detailed report was made of the ervations, which was afterwards prepared for publication, with some additional matter, order to give a somewhat connected account of the labors of Friends among the New York Indians, and was printed in 1866 by the direction of the Committee for general circulation under the title of, "A Brief Sketch of the parts of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of the virtuous Society of Friends to promote the civilization and improvement of the Indians." Its pamphlet contains valuable statistical information in regard to their destitute condition at that time and was widely distributed, was reprinted in 1879. The following remarks on the character of the Indians and the remedies which ought to be brought to bear on the treatment of them, are taken from this report. "The Indian is susceptible to the influence of kindness, is open to conviction and persuasion when enforced by a constant Christian example; but resents coercion, harsh and just treatment and upbraiding language. He wants a proper appreciation of these things will explain the little success which has attended many well meant plans for meliorating his condition, and most, if not all the troubles which the Government has had in dealing with him.

If we turn to the history of much of the same and more private dealings with the Indians, we shall find them stained by fraud and bloodshed; and as violence and coercion signally failed to accomplish the desirable of civilizing and Christianizing them, as well as securing peace and harmony, would it be well for Government and its officers to try the effect of just and pacific measures; substitute for the sword the benign and persuasive which flows from the spirit of the Gospel, and teaches us to do to others as we would that they should do to us.

We cannot but earnestly desire that those who are associated with the aboriginal inhabitants of our country, whether in an official capacity or otherwise, may show forth a constant and upright example as Christians, actuated by a spirit of forbearing tenderness and mercy may pity them in their weakness and ignorance, and labor to enlighten and assist them; may patiently bear with their superstitions and prejudices; and deal kindly and gently with them, as persons suffering under many serious disadvantages from which we are fully exempt, and who therefore have strong claims on our charity and sympathy. We believe such a just, merciful, and considerate line of action would gradually soften and meliorate the wild and untoward dispositions of the Indians, strengthened by bad examples and manifold provocations; would imbue their minds with higher and better motives and aims, draw them into closer and more enduring alliance with their white brethren; and through the power of Divine Grace prepare their hearts to love and practice the holy religion of our noble Redeemer, which ever leads its sincere and obedient followers to promote and to carry on a life and conversation, the purport of the only anthem which ushered in his blessed life; glory to God in the highest, on earth and in good will to men."

BAXTER ON THE SPIRIT.—It is remarkable that Richard Baxter, whose controversy lay for many years against the doctrine of the Spirit, as it was so prominently held forth by the first Friends, should himself, late in life, have been brought thus far to acknowledge. "I am now," he says, "much more apprehensive than heretofore of the necessity of well grounding men in their religion, especially of the witness of the indwelling Spirit, for I more sensibly perceive, that the Spirit is the great witness of Christ and Christianity to the world."

HAPPINESS IN LABOR.—Three things Ruskin considered essential to that happiness in work which is the right as well as the privilege of every human being: They (men and women) must be fit for it; they must not do too much of it, and they must have a sense of success in it—not a doubtful sense, such as needs some testimony of other people for its confirmation, but a sure sense, or, rather, knowledge, that so much work has been done well, and fruitfully done, whatever the world may say or think about it.

Items Concerning the Society.

As Eastern Friends are somewhat in doubt where they may find a comfortable summer home in the atmosphere of Pasadena, California, we are now able to inform them of rooms to be had in the house of Hannah W. Williams, at 425 Galena Avenue.

Many have welcomed with a sense of relief the return of William C. Allen and William B. Harvey from Barbados safe to their homes on the morning of the 24th instant. A few issues of the account of their experiences yet remain to appear in our columns.

Notes in General.

"Dost thou not fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation?" May this be looked after, which the Independent alleges, if true.

"We feel very much like making an earnest appeal to the British people and to the incoming new Liberal Government for relief to the Zulus in South Africa. Since the war there the colonial authorities have increased the burdens and restrictions of the natives, as if desirous to equal the oppressions of the two Boer republics. They are treated much worse than our negroes are treated in any part of the United States, and the British Government ought to correct it. Where is that Non-conformist conscience we hear of?"

Among the most impressive monuments, says the Independent, found by Layard in Nineveh, was a great bas-relief showing a procession of gods carried in battle and borne on the shoulders of soldiers. Similarly Isaiah tells us of Bel and Nebo carried captive, "a burden to the weary beast." Such a picture the Mikado may put into his palace, for we are told that in the house occupied by General Kuropatkin in Mukden were found all the ikons (images) presented to him when he went to war, and which he was to take with him to Tokyo when he should dictate peace to the Japanese capital.

"NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND—OR LEARN."—Mental activity in advanced years is always interesting. A negro woman seventy-three years of age was graduated from the elementary grade of the Hillhouse Evening School in New Haven, with honors, on the evening of Second Month 7th. She was an ex-slave; for many years she had been anxious to learn to read, and applied at the evening school for instruction. She studied diligently, was regular in attendance, made excellent progress, and is now "very proud to be able to read her Bible and newspaper." She secured the prize awarded among two hundred and fifty pupils.

It would be unsafe to begin flattering ourselves over the disappearance of the lynching habit, yet there is much temporary reason for encouragement in the fact that during the past four or five months only four lynchings occurred in the United States. During the corresponding period of the year before there were twenty-five lynchings. Perhaps the worst has been already experienced.—Am. Friend.

Police Commissioner McAduo said, "Were it not for religion and the faith behind it, there are not enough policemen in all the world to keep order in the city of New York." This may seem somewhat extravagant, but the general principle of it is true. The great, the true, the reliable police force is the conscience in a man's breast. Without that a city would be a collection of wild animals, deceiving and being deceived, devouring and being devoured.

The winners of the three prizes offered by Helen M. Gould for the best three essays on the question, "Which is a better representation of the original of the Bible, the American Version, or the Catholic Version known as the Douay Bible?" were William T. Whitley, a Baptist minister of Preston, England, who received $1000; Gerald H. Beard, a Congregational minister, of Burlington, Vt., who received $500; and Charles B. Dalton, teacher in a New York city public school. The decision was in favor of the American Version.

English is the international language, says the Independent. The negotiations between the Russians and Japanese for the surrender of Port Arthur, were conducted, not in French, but in English. The Japanese generals who took part, and their associates, talk English, and one of them Russian. On the Russian side they brought a young midshipman who had to act as interpreter, because the English of the officers was imperfect. In Russia and Turkey the officials still prefer to use French, but the rest of the world in the East, as well as the West, turns to English.

The Dean of Westminster took up the question as to what form a revival in the Church of England could take that would be in harmony with its religious instincts. He said: "We cannot attempt to organize it. We may pray for it, and I think we should do so, trusting there is nothing in the form of God wills."

That there is need in the Church of England of a revival in its spiritual life, none will deny. Organization is more thorough than it ever has been; we have better approached churches, more frequent services, a larger number of communicants, a better instructed, more diligent, more devout clergy; yet we are not given such a witness for the living God as compels men to fall down in penitence and confess that God is in them. Of a truth something is needed; something of an inspiration. What we want is not a new order or a new method, not a fresh form of worshipping God, but life racing through the limbs of the duly ordered body, life lifting our worship to the spiritual level to which its ancient form bore witness."

To a class of newly ordained Methodist ministers Governor Stokes, of New Jersey, said a few days ago that he would not "Trusts and other industrial evils would be found until the religious element of the country" should take up the question and "spread the gospel of honesty and uprightness until the powerful shall not prey upon the weak." Trusts are not always and necessarily an evil, but (continues the Independent) in dealing with the evils associated with some of them there is no more inviting field for missionary work than Governor Stokes's own State, whose corporation laws have been so carefully adjusted to satisfy the needs of combinations and the promoters of them.

"If," said President Roosevelt to the Mother's Congress, "the average family contained two children, the nation as a whole would decrease in population so rapidly that in two or three generations it would very deservedly be on the point of extermination; so that the people who had acted on this base and selfish doctrine would be giving place to others with braver and more robust ideals. Nor would such a result be in any way regrettable; for a race which practiced such a doctrine—that is, a race that practiced race suicide—would thereby conclusively show that it was unfit to exist, and that it had better give place to a people who had not forgotten the primary laws of their being."

The Christian Register says: "Nothing is gained for the cause of religion, good morals and the good repute of the Church by artificial attempts to 'reach the masses.' The Salvation Army has its own way. Let it keep to it with the applause of all good men for any good work that it may do."

The Christian Register has an editorial on "Religion Without a Church," in which it is said: "There is in the Church itself a growing sense of sympathy and comradeship for the disfigured multitude which has no articulate religion."

Sir William Harcourt, in a speech in the House of Lords, said: "What leads to great expenditure is the spirit of inflation, of annexation, of raids in every quarter of the world, of retaliation, tall talk, appeals to international jealousy, the false doctrines that every good which comes to others is an injury to ourselves. Those are arts which delude ignorant people."

Two hundred and sixty-five essays were entered in the contest for the prizes offered by Helen Gould for the best essay on "The Comparative Merits of the Roman Catholic and American Revised Version of the Bible." The winning essays have been published and are ready for distribution.

Edward Everett Hale has been chosen lecturer at Princeton College. A new departure for both college and lecturer. It is a suggestive sign of the growing friendliness of Christians of different denominations.

AN INTERNATIONAL QUESTION OF MORALS.—Gambling has been the national vice of Siam. Every little town and village has its official gambling house, licensed by the government. The missionaries have been trying to show the king that the gambling habit is inimical to the best interests of Siam. The king of that country is said to be earnestly trying to rule Siam in the interest of the people. He has had his son, the Crown Prince, educated in England. It is the intention to ask permission from the United States, England, Germany, and other Christian nations to raise the import duties in order that a part of the revenue now accruing from the gambling concessions throughout Siam may be thus replaced. The larger part of the revenue will be derived from an increased land tax. Siam is an extra-territorial country; therefore its import duties are regulated by treaty with America and European nations, and cannot be changed without their consent.—Christian Advocate.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In an address before the American Forestry Congress, Secretary Wilson of the Department of Agriculture, said: "The West must have water, and that in a sure and permanent supply. Unless the forests at the headwaters of the streams used in irrigation are protected, that is impossible, and irrigation will fail."

"Unless we practice forestry in the mountain forests in the West the irrigation and artificial irrigation law will be fruitless, and the wise policy of the government in the agricultural development of the arid region will utterly fail. Without forestry, national irrigation will be merely a national mistake."

Secretary Hay has lately left this country for Europe to obtain rest and recuperation.

In the course of the free public lectures given under the auspices of the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, Dr. Albert Philip Francis advocated municipal registration of all cases, that the city authorities may know the localities where they exist, and take the urgent and necessary precautions of disinfecting contaminated houses. He also urged the absolute control and destruction of the sputum. This can only be accomplished if the patient spits into paper spitboxes or paper napkins, which are subsequently burned. Spittoons should never be used.

Cars and cleanliness in the house in respect to dust and dirt and in disinfecting by live steam or boiling water of all articles contaminated by the disease.

Tuberculous patients should sleep alone. The room should have no unnecessary drapery or furniture, and the windows should be kept open, both night and day.

The huge steamship Dakota, constructed at Groton, Conn., by the Eastern Steamship Company, has lately left her wharf in preparation for her trial trip. She and the Minnesota are the largest vessels ever constructed in this hemisphere. Her dimensions are as follows: Length, 630 ft.; breadth, 73 ft.; depth, 56 feet. Her gross tonnage is 21,854. It is stated that the Minnesota and Dakota exceed in gross tonnage any other vessels now in commission.

There have been 307 new cases of typhoid fever in this city during the week ending at noon of the 24th, ut. There are nearly 200 cases under treatment. The carrier, Chief Abbott states, has been traced in nearly every case to impure drinking water that was not boiled. He has issued directions to families to boil all water used for drinking or cooking.

The Department of Agriculture is still sending out free of cost to applicants the cultures containing bacteria for use for growing crops of leguminous plants, such as clover, alfalfa, vetch, cow peas and similar forage plants. These cultures have proved highly useful in increasing the yield of such crops during the past year.

The Ohio Supreme Court has decided that a newspaper guessing contest on votes cast at an election is a lottery and is, therefore, prohibited by law.

The United States Circuit Court of Appeals has held that the act passed at the last session of the Maryland Legislature, commonly known as the "Jim Crow" law, and requiring steam railroads in the State of Maryland to furnish separate compartments for white and negro passengers, is invalid as to interstate passengers, and must be construed as not applying to them.

The United States district court says the Court of Appeals has held that the act passed at the last session of the Maryland Legislature, commonly known as the "Jim Crow" law, and requiring steam railroads in the State of Maryland to furnish separate compartments for white and negro passengers, is invalid as to interstate passengers, and must be construed as not applying to them.

The Canadian Government is putting forth extraordinary efforts to stimulate the migration of American farmers to this region during the present year. FOREIGN.—The policy of establishing by Great Britain preferential duties in dealing with products of foreign countries, which was strongly advocated by ex-Secretary Chamberlain, appears to have been finally rejected by Premier Balfour, and the continuance of the free trade policy, which has been pursued of late years, appears likely to be maintained.

Emperor William, of Germany, has started on a voyage to Morocco. His motive in making a visit to that country is not generally known.

In the Grand Duchy of Baden the planting of fruit trees along the highways is encouraged by the government. The State of America has planted thirty-two feet apart along each side of the road, and when the fruit is ready for market it is sold at public auction on the trees, the purchaser being obliged to harvest it at his own expense. The amount realized from the sale of the fruit is applied toward the maintenance of the system—the propagation of trees and their planting and cultivating are free.

Russia has lately succeeded in obtaining a loan of about $100,000,000 from banks and saving-banks in that country. The plight of the army, together with financial difficulties, are declared to have caused the Czar to yield to the peace party. It is reported that overtures to Japan either have been made, or are to be made, at once, for the retreat of the Russian army has been discontinued. They are pursued by the Japanese and skirmishes have occurred.

One of the prominent Russian newspapers declares that the whole Government of Russia and the whole Russian nation is demoralized by the relentless persecution of the Jews. The number of Jews in Russia is about 6,000,000 and is herding 4,000,000 of Jews in towns where they pay 90 per cent. of the taxes and yet have no share in the municipal government.

A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 27th says: 'A very significant and important feature in connection with the political situation is the fact that the disaster, ruin with which trade and industry are threatened is feeling its way through the mercantile and commercial classes of the city in its policies.' Hereafter, as a matter of business, have carefully refrained from meddling in the labor movement, but the situation is now so serious that it feel compelled to define their attitude, and everywhere they are pronouncing in favor of the liberal demands of the cessation of all commercial and industrial activity. Several questions in which Americans in Venezuela believe their rights have been violated by the government of that country have been under consideration at Washington, and efforts have been made to submit them to arbitration, which has finally been refused by President C. of Venezuela. An agreement has been made by Venezuela and Great Britain, and the latter is to be pledging 50 per cent. of certain custom returns of Venezuela for their payment.

A despatch from London in regard to the report of commissioners sent out by the British Government to investigate the cotton-growing possibilities in East Africa says: "Unless difficulties which at present appear insuperable can be removed, cotton cultivation in East Africa will never be undertaken on any considerable scale." First among the difficulties the commissioners place labor, on account of the apathy of the natives to their disinclination for work. The total area devoted to cotton growing under European supervision can scarcely be estimated, and it is believed that the only solution of the difficulty is indentured labor from India or China.

A new island in the Japanese archipelago has emerged from the sea as a result of volcanic activity. It is 110 to 4800 yards in circumference, and was first observed about Twelfth Month 5th, 1904. It is three leagues long by two miles wide.

By a recent census the population of St. Petersburg, stated to be about 1,500,000. Of these about one-tenth are unable to read or write. Four-fifths are said to belong to the Greek Church. Only three per cent. are classes as Roman Catholics, and two per cent. are Jews.

It is stated that the first patent ever granted by the Chinese Government was recently issued to a citizen of Nanking for an electric incandescent lamp.

France, Germany, Holland and Belgium are encouraging the establishment of gardens for workmen. Although the work is not a new one, it has been considerably tended during the past year. The evil of idleness has so undermined the health and vigor of the workmen that this plan was utilized to interest them in a healthy employment outside of working hours. In order that work may thrive in cities where the majority of operatives have never handled a spade, it is now thought necessary to encourage a taste in children for cultivating the soil by creating school gardens. It is suggested that schools, which are so often ill employed, scholars shall accompany their tutors to these gardens and there learn to use garden implements and acquire a taste for garden work.

War Not the Antidote for War.

The verbal war against war which is now ceaselessly waged in present-day literature, seems to be leaving little for a Friends' perusal to say which others are not relieving of saying, and in no unsparring terms. For centuries and a half Friends have labored, and now many others are entering into their shoes. Our past characterizations of the intensity of war seem tame beside the stigmata which many articles in the popular press are giving to it. This, by Wm. H. Hart, in the Public Ledger, is one of freest specimens:

War is not a conflict of individuals with an attraction, but with other individuals. It turns into fighting machines; it makes them human others; it changes a man who was made in the image of God into a cringing parasite; it not only destroys man's reverence for human nature, but it destroys that nature itself. The mind becomes inhuman and the heart becomes a theatre of crime. It is the concentration of evil whose essence is that which is slain by man. It is a game of chess, with man pawns, in which the players seldom pay even though they lose, yet the pieces must pay even if they win. War is a quarrel of rulers fought by their subjects. Is there anything honorable in this? It destroys popular government, in that it makes the executive practically a dictator. Even war to overthrow an abuse usually leaves behind passions so vindictive that they are almost as strong as the abuse which was overthrown. Every day of war is so much time lost to the extension of virtue. It is so opposed to the spirit of Christianity that many believe it is a prohibited crime.

The amount of good at least is getting done among Western nations by the object-lesson of a war in which they have no part and can do upon it dispassionately, save for its own business. But should a war of their own kind come up, how soon would this state of mind be reversed. For months before our Spanish war was declared, the absurdity and sin of war was set forth in many magazines and papers, as Friends would characterize war. But when once it was declared, editors promptly justified the principle of war which the week before they had condemned.

The peace sentiment now inculcated by a sense of the barbarism of a far-off war, is we trust, making the people slower to enter into wars, and causing arbitrations rather to be chosen. The horrors of the present carnage which so outreaches human imagination, must be helping to fight down all wars before they begin.

But fire cannot be depended on to put out fire, nor sin sin. Men use fire to fight fire by making it burn up the material on which it could feed. So war may blast the material of war, and men can call the exhaustion peace, only because that sort of peace is but the wilderness which the war has created.

Fighting a war out is not fighting War out—it is simply fighting one side down, but leaving War and its spirit only more deeply entrenched in the hearts of surviving men, and more bitterly grinding its teeth for very vengeance and hate.

So wars, though they may fight for a peace, cannot fight for Peace. They more deeply confirm their own passions which are not peace; and they result only in a cessation of hostilities, which is not peace.

Before calling a condition Peace, search it inside and out, and see if it is Love; then might it be named Peace. See whether it is the spirit of Christ. Nothing less on earth can be Peace. See if it is unselfishness and parties are competing to do each other the most good and no harm. Then is it an essential of peace. Peace is a change of heart from beast to Christ, from cursing to gospel.

And blessed are the peacemakers. They have only to plant the gospel by whatever way they are called on to live it, and just so far as Christ is received to reign in men's hearts, so far and no farther is peace on earth assured.

SUCH is the law of life. Practical welfare is attained not when man strives towards this practical welfare, but only when man, without thinking of the attainment of practical welfare, strives towards the most perfect fulfilment of that which before God, before the Source and Law of his life, he regards as right.—Tolstoi.

Annual Report of the Institute for Colored Youth.

The normal training work of the Institute was commenced in the new buildings at Cheyney in the Eleventh Month last.

These new buildings are a dormitory and an industrial building. The former will accommodate about thirty young women. The latter is used for general school purposes and as a dormitory for the young men. A delay in opening of more than a month was occasioned by retarded building operations, and this delay evidently affected the size of the opening class. The enrollment includes ten young women and six young men. These sixteen represent ten States of the Union, one student coming from as far south as Texas. There are, besides these, three West Chester teachers who attend classes one day each week. The maximum boarding accommodation at present could not easily exceed fifty, and as the course of study covers two years a small entering class seemed desirable.

Some high school training was prescribed as a requisite of admission to the class, and as only one colored child out of a thousand in Philadelphia gets into the high school, the field from which to draw students in the whole country is at present decidedly limited.

Six teachers reside at the school, and five of them are occupied only with the work there. The sixth teaches in the colored school in West Chester, and is preparing the way for the second year students to have opportunities for observation and practice in that school. Practical handwork in wood and iron, in agriculture and the domestic arts, is a regular part of the normal training. The special effort is to develop a type of teacher who will appreciate that intelligence is a usable quantity, and as applicable to the hemely arts of life as to the recitation of definitions and formulas.

In addition to a payment of $80 a year to cover board, each student contributes an hour a day of labor to the institution. The Domestic Department has been assigned to a special committee, and they have organized it under the teacher of domestic science, who is a graduate of Pratt Institute. The dietaries prepared by her and her plans for household management have worked out admirably and have not exceeded in cost the estimates submitted by her. This cost is less than $10 a month for each person. The educational value of a daily life in such a well managed household must count for much in the life of the students. This is a thought that was often urged upon previous boards by Fanny Coppin.

The Farm Committee has continued to work the farm so as to improve it, and already marks of this improvement are favorably noted by neighboring farmers. Eventually it is expected that the whole farm will be a part of the educational machinery of the school, but the transition to this condition must be gradual. Allotments of ground for school gardens will be made this spring, and some portion of the farming operations will be under the direction of the teacher of agriculture. A new barn is a pressing necessity, and it is hoped that some friends of the cause will be found to supply this need.

The religious character of the life at Cheyney has had the care of the board. A Bible class is held regularly on First-days, and right methods for religious instruction in elementary schools are inculcated. Each day's work is commenced by Scripture reading, and the teachers are all believed to be well concerned for the higher interests.

Upon the earnest solicitation of Booker T. Washington and others it has been decided to hold a summer school during the Seventh Month at Cheyney. A preliminary announcement of this has already brought applications from forty teachers. Not more than sixty can be comfortably accommodated, and the number must be limited to this figure. It is estimated that the additional furniture and the cost of maintenance for this summer session will aggregate about $2500. The furniture will be required in any event in the Ninth Month.

A very special appeal is made for contributions to carry out this effort to reach a large number of schools and teachers in the South.

The effort to concentrate the resources and activities of the Institute on moral training has had wide approval. The late Dr. Curry represented Normal Training as the greatest educational need of the colored race, and his opinion has so far influenced the Peabody trustees that they are devoting their funds to this end in the South. Such technical training, however, is costly. The accumulated funds of the Institute are wholly inadequate for the needs of a first-class normal school. This statement may arouse the suspicion that an extravagant standard has been adopted. It is most unfortunate that the work of the Institute should appear in that light. Even a few teachers of high grade very quickly represent a large circle of influence. A high quality of work in the school-room is the only true economy. The proverbial thriftlessness of the Negro can be supplanted in no way so surely as by training teachers who will apply a remedy in a better standard of living. A trade school near Cheyney devotes a thousand dollars in three years to the training of a single carpenter or machinist. Can we expect to train a good teacher for less? The people of the United States have manifested a profound faith in the power of the teacher upon civilization in dealing with Cuba and the Philippines. Large sums of money have been used to give several thousands of these teachers some training at our higher institutions and some contact with our ideals of living. The Federal Government, however, never dealt with the Negro problem in the same liberal way. It remains for private beneficence, however, to do so. Money invested in good teachers is quickly multiplied a hundred-fold. It must devolve upon future Boards therefore to enter actively upon a campaign for larger resources, if the present lines of work are to be carried forward to maturity. Your retiring Board have found their faith increased from time to time in the movement to make a high class normal school for the colored race, and the work is committed to the corporation and to future Boards in a hope that a very large fruition of our faith shall be realized.

For the Board,
STANLEY R. YARNALL, Secretary,

Lincoln and the Lake Champlain Quaker.

The people who love it will defy you to find a more beautiful lake anywhere; and, anyway, if the voyagers to the New World had discovered nothing else, it would have been worth all the trouble they took coming over. Big and gracious and commanding as some dear princess, it sweeps to the northern border, and the mountains range themselves on either side, watching and adoring.

The largest island in the lake is long and wide and has several townships of its own. Somewhere about 1785 a family of Quakers came from the south and found the place. "The Lord," they said, "has led us into ways of peace. Here we will live, and the blessing of heaven will be with us." They labored at their wholesome toil and their minds were filled with wholesome thoughts. Sun and storm succeeded sun and storm, and the years passed and they found rest unto the third generation.

In 1861, when the stricken country cried for men to save her, the note of war came to the island, and the great-grandson of the first Quaker was drafted.

"But it will be no use," he said, "I shall never fight. My mother taught me it is a sin. It is her religion and my father's and their fathers'. I shall never raise my hand to kill anyone."

The recruiting officer took little notice. "We'll see about that later," he commented carelessly.

The regiment went to Washington and the Quaker boy drilled placidly and shot straight. "But I shall never fight," he reiterated.

Word went out that there was a traitor in the ranks. The lieutenant conferred with the captain, and all the forms of punishment devised for refractory soldiers were visited on him. He went through them without finching, and there was only one thing left. He was taken before the colonel.

"What does this mean?" demanded the officer. "Don't you know you will be shot?"

The Quaker was a nice boy with steady eyes, and a square chin, and he smiled a little.

"That is nothing," he said. "Thee didn't think I was afraid, did thee?"

The prisoner went back to the guard-house and the colonel went to the President, to Lincoln, who was great because he knew the hearts of men. The case was put before him—of the mutinous Quaker who talked of his religion, the soldier who refused to fight, who defied pain and laughed at the fear of death.

Lincoln listened and looked relieved. "Why, that is plain enough," he answered. "There is only one thing to do. Trump up some excuse and send him home. You can't kill a boy like that, you know. The country needs all her brave men wherever they are. Send him home."

So the Quaker went back to the island, to life and duty as he saw them, and his children tell the story.—Lippincott's Magazine.

En route to Smyrna

Second Month 26th, 1905.—Our visit to Constantinople is a thing of the past! I begin where I left off on Fifth-day. Our approach to the city was somewhat marred the strong wind that made it most uncomfortable to remain on deck during our entrance into the harbor. We expected to be detained here, but owing to some misunderstanding did not get in to the wharf, but the ship anchored off as at the other ports. It is of the grandest, if not the grandest, loca of any city of the world, and if it belonged any other country than Turkey it would be a dream of loveliness. The city presents striking appearance, with its palaces, numerous minarets, and is much larger than expected, having over a million population. The city is divided by the Golden Horn, the part being called Stamboul. The new bridge (five hundred years old!) seems a very rare trap, and everyone must pay toll. A ter brought out the American consul and Turkish officials to examine our passports. We expected that this formality would consume two hours at least, as they generally insist upon seeing everyone. The consul agreed to stand for us, and in fifteen minutes the part was all over. The first time such a thing has ever happened. One is watched at every turn in the Sultan's domain, but we certainly were well treated. We were advised not to leave the ship that night, but some went ashore and remained at the hotel. In the evening one of the professors of Robert College returned on Constantinople very acceptable. Sixth-day we left the ship, and finding a guide and being assigned to carriages, commenced the sight-seeing. I cannot describe the scene that presented itself. The whirl of mass of humanity of every conceivable nationality, the sea of Turkish fezes, the dust of the filth! The reckless driving over the streets, used as much by pedestrians as by the yelling of the men to their horses, utter confusion was nerve-racking! We were thankful our ship was left out in the harbor! We safely reached the first point of the Galata Tower, a relic of the Italian quarter of the twelfth century. It is now used as a watch-tower for fire, and while we knew the view from the top was fine, we did not climb up. Now back again past the bank and post office to the new bridge, over which we rode at a terrific pace to old Stamboul, the old city. We first visited the Imperial Ottoman Museum, which is of great importance and interest. Really the most interesting thing to us was the Siloam Inscription discovered in Jerusalem in 1880, of which Timothy Hussey had told us. It is one of the oldest inscriptions known, and is in pure Biblical Hebrew. It was found in the underground canal between the Virgin's Spring and the Pool of Siloam, the time of Hezekiah. We saw the great Alexander Sarcophagus of Pentelic marble, remarkably preserved and carved; the Tabitha Sarcophagus containing the withered body of Tabitha, the Sidonian king, made in the fourth century B. C.; the serpents held from the bronze serpent column in the Hippodrome, said to have been struck off by Mohammed the Conqueror, and found in the British Consulate kitchen, with as used for breaking coal! This column was up by Constantine, brought from Delphi. The same Mohammed rode his horse into the city, then a Christian church, slayer of the Greek, and high up on one of the towers they show the print of his bloody hand! Now went through the double gates into the Treasury, which were opened to us for the first time on that day of the week. Turkish hospitality was offered in the form of a spoonful of sweet (looked like jelly that hadn't solidified) stirred into a goblet of water. We lined. The collection of bejeweled garb, swords, chairs, crowns and trays of gold was beyond conception. The emerald, large as your hand, spoken of in General Clarke's "Prince of India," a golden tankard filled with three thousand diamonds, rubies and pearls, all displaying the spoils of centuries. Someone remarked the Sultan had bet-sell his gems, and pay his debts and feed the people. It was a barbaric display, and we were not sorry to get out alive. The soldier was on guard at every step, and we were not allowed to take our cameras on shore. Noon, from our time (they count time from sunset here), we had some lunch at a rather nice French restaurant. I couldn't eat a thing, as I lost my appetite coming through the streets! From here we drove across the city again, and went to see the whirling dervishes. This cost one franc each, and was the greatest sight I ever saw. The mosque was rather small, and the crowd large. All the heads of the worshippers were left outside, and looked very odd. The priests, in their peculiar dress, commenced the performance as soon as we arrived. First, turning around with arms extended or folded high up above the breast, then faster and faster, with eyes closed, until you'd think they certainly would drop. All the time the members of this sect were chanting some rigamarole in the form of prayers, I suppose. The high priest had green wound around his turban, signifying his descent from Mohammed. It lasted about thirty minutes, and while we stood quite close to the priests, they seemed to be oblivious of our presence. The entrances to the mosques are thronged with beggars, and the one to Sancta Sophia is called 'Beggars' Hall. Walk across the swarming bridge we went to see the greatest mosque of all, the mosque of Sancta Sophia, once a Christian church, back to Constantine's time. The present edifice was finished in 537 by Justinian. The dome exceeds anything of the kind I ever saw. Eight serpentine columns were brought from Paphos, and eight more from some other temple. It cost sixty-four millions. Since the reign of the Turks, beginning in 1520, all the relics of a Christian church have been destroyed, and inscriptions from the Koran are around the nave. We were obliged to put our whippers before entering. We were sorry to hear the call to prayer, but never happened near at the right time. Our last visit of the day was in the bazaars, which are perfectly bewildering in their wealth of rugs, silks, embroideries, carved woods, and every other article under the sun. We were greatly interested in seeing the rugs made. They are made by hand entirely, without any pattern or design. Beautiful rugs can be bought for lit-

It is said that there are thirty thousand dogs in Constantinople, and one cannot doubt it after once seeing them. They are all one kind apparently, and look like hungry wolves. One cannot step without coming in contact with one. The cabmen are very careful not to run over them, as they would be imprisoned for three years. The penalty for killing a man is seven years! We were told that the Turks regard the dog and the pigeon holy, and believe that Mahomet will come in the form of one or the other. We were very weary, and glad to get back to the ship, which seemed like heaven after the noise and filthy odors of the city. On Seventh-day a number of us visited Robert College, which is situated a few miles north of the city on the Bosphorus. The college was founded in 1863, and is part of the University of New York. The drive was quite interesting, past the Sultan's palace, and part of the way right along the water, where we could see the little fishing boats, the flocks of ducks, and the steamers that ply along the Bosphorus. In our country we'd had an electric road built up to the Black Sea long ago. They catch great quantities of little mackerel here, and we longed to sample them. We were received at the college by one of the professors, who showed us all about. When the college was first opened only four students presented themselves. In five years it was almost self-supporting, and now has about three hundred students. Many of these are Greeks and Armenians. It was a holiday, so there were not many of them around. The history of the founding of this college is told in Dr. Cyrus Hamlin's "My Life and Times." The American school for girls at Scutari, on the Asiatic side, has one hundred and sixty students, and is doing a grand work.

In the afternoon we visited the Friends' Mission by invitation of a Friend named Binns. We saw the work of the women, which is their way of getting at them. They sell $10,000 worth of work a year. There was a lot on the ship, and about $500 worth was sold. Much is sent to England, and disposed of by the Friends there. Friend Binns was born here, and speaks the language like a native. She piloted us around some, too, very skillfully. She returned to the ship for dinner, and we were sorry to part with her. In the evening the Alumnae Association of the Girls' College gave an entertainment on board. The young ladies were in native costumes, Greek, Bulgarian, Armenian, Turkish, and looked perfectly fetching. A collection was taken for the benefit of the school, and I hope they got a large sum. We were treated to "Turkish Delight" afterward, a delicious native sweet. Best and grandest of all was the sail up the Bosphorus to the Black Sea this morning (Second Month 26th). It was foggy at first, and we were afraid that we were not to have a good view. We had not gone far, however, before the fog lifted. Guides were on hand to point out the different places of interest, and when we were opposite Robert College the boys were out in force. Away up the hill we could see the stars and stripes waving, and from every window, a white handkerchief fluttered. They gave their yell, and the hills resounded with it and the echo of our whistle, a march of progress since the battle of ages long past away. This is the narrowest part of the Bosphorus, and the point where Xerxes built his bridge of boats. A short distance on was the Black Sea, and when we reached it our good ship turned majestically around and steamed back again. Talk about the Rhine, it isn't comparable to the Bosphorus! While I was thinking this I found there were others of the same mind. Ruins of mighty fortresses took the place of castles, and the summer-houses of the embassies, with wooded hills as a background, must make a beautiful picture in the summer time. The winters are cold here, and so the landscape was similar to our own, but the country must be lovely in warm weather. We passed hundreds of small fishing boats all out for mackerel. They were quite near together, and we could see them draw in a line with sometimes six or ten on it. They use a feather for bait, and the fish seem no larger than our smelt. The Bosphorus is very deep in some parts, fifty or sixty fathoms. We halted a few minutes opposite the city, while a tug-boat took off our couriers and guides, and then steamed past Seraglio Point, the minarets of the mosque glistening in the sunlight, the dirt, the ignorance-of the Sultan forgotten in the delight of the beautiful sail on the Bosphorus!

7.30 p. m.—We have just left our pilots at the mouth of the Dardanelles, and are out on the Aegean Sea once more. The night is rainy and rather dark, but we are due at Smyrna at 7 a. m. So far we have made every port on schedule time. It is wonderful how smoothly everything works on these cruises. The party divides at Jaffa, part spending twelve days in Egypt and part in Palestine. We will be of the latter number.

Second Month 27th.—Safely arrived at Smyrna this A. M. Farewell, will save this place for the next letter.

The Dew.

During my first trip up the Mediterranean many years ago, we touched at the Island of Malta. We had rain for several days, and when I went ashore to visit an English family, the foremost subject of conversation was the rain. And my friend said, "This is the first rain we have had for three or four years. I said, "How, then, is it that things look so green, and that you produce such superb fruit in the Floriana Gardens, where the oranges hang from the dark leaves like 'golden lamps hung in a night of green.'"

"Well, our copious dew take the place of rain."

It is interesting to witness this beneficent source of fertility at sea. Soon after the sun goes down, the dew begins to fall, and by the time darkness sets in, the watch on deck are glad to put on their oilskins to keep themselves dry. By ten o'clock it is drip, drip, all the night from the rigging, and by the morning every sail is as if it had been dipped into the sea. How gently, silently, secretly the precious dew falls to refresh and renew the earth. But sometimes it happens that no dew falls, and the whole night is dry and parched. How is this? One condition of the dew coming in its bounty is that the heavens must be calm. I recall nights when variable bathing puffs of wind came to perplex and employ the crew; we would trim yards and sheets for the breeze on one side, perhaps just enough wind to make the sails "sleep." After getting all ropes coiled up, while the vessel was going less than a mile an hour, the wind would die away and then spring up in an opposite quarter, and the work would have to be done over again, and after a night spent in shifting sails, perhaps not two miles of progress would be entered in the log.

I have learned to apply this lesson, and want others to share. "I will be as the dew unto Israel" is a precious promise, but it seems that the attitude of the soul has something to do with success in obtaining the blessing.

If the soul is not calm the dew cannot descend; if, as a nautical lesson taught me long ago, there is a puff of worldiness now, and a flurry of sinful wandering then, there is a strife overhead, and the blessing cannot come down.

Oh, to be able to call in wandering thoughts, and concentrate our powers and say, "My heart is fixed, O God; my heart is fixed; I will sing and give praise."

"Thus saith the Lord of hosts, consider your ways, go up to the mountain and bring wood and build the house, and I will take pleasure in it and I will be glorified, saith the Lord." But they were keen to pursue their own interests; they hastened forward, every man to his own house. "Therefore, the heaven over you is stayed from the dew, and the earth is stayed from her fruit." (Haggai 1:10.)

How copiously the dew falls. Gideon wrung the water from his fleece into a bowl; yet the ordinary supply of the precious dew is often equally abundant. How secretly the blessing comes! but how gently, yea, how suddenly; but how much depends upon the calm!

"Calm me, my God, and keep me calm,

While these hot breezes blow;

Be like the night-dew's cooling balm

Upon earth's fevered brow.

"Yes, keep me calm, though loud and rude

The sounds my ear that greet.

Calm in the closet's solitude;

Calm in the bustling street;

"Calm in the hour of buoyant health;

Calm in the hour of pain;

Calm in my poverty or wealth;

Calm in my loss or gain.

"Calm as the ray of sun or star,

Which storms assail in vain;

Moving unrudded through earth's war

The eternal calm to gain."

A Charge Delivered by Samuel Fothergill.

I should like to see in the columns of the Friend, the following language delivered at Horsleydown, England, about one hundred and thirty-five years ago by that eminent and worthy Minister of the Society of Friends, Samuel Fothergill. It seems so full of counsel, warning and love for all, but especially for the parents and children, that I trust it will be read with interest and to edification by the many readers of THE FRIEND.

T. C. H.

WEST CHESTER, Pa., Second Month 6th, 1905.

A solemn summons which the Almighty gave through his prophet Joel, to a people whom he had known above all the families of the earth, (at a time when they had revolted and departed in heart from him) has been revived in my mind; with an apprehension that the same authority requires the republication of it in this day, to a people likewise highly favored of him; and who have in like manner departed from their first love:—

"Blow the trumpet in Zion, sanctify a fast, call a solemn assembly: gather the people, sanctify the congregation, assemble the elders, gather the children; let the bridegroom go forth of his chamber, and the bride out of her closet. Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord, weep between the porch and the altar. Let them say, spare thy people, O Lord! and give not thy heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over them! wherefore should they say amongst the people, where is their God? then will the Lord be jealous over his land and pity his people."

As I am about to conclude (perhaps finally conclude), my labors amongst you in this quarter, I would query with some, with many that are present, whether they have not heard intelligibly the sound of the trumpet, calling them with a degree of certainty, to arise and prepare themselves for the battle.

My brethren and sisters, amongst whom I have been constrained, in the overflowings of the Father's love, to labor in a private capacity, breaking (I hope I may say) a little bread from house to house,—the everlasting gospel has been preached amongst you, with all the force of pathetic energy, with all the tenderness of Divine compassion: let it not be ineffectual! The Gospel message has been delivered with such indubitable clearness, that your judgments have been convinced, you have assented to the truth as it is in Jesus; suffer not the impressions it has made on your minds to be speedily erased. Far, very far, be it from me to think highly of myself, to exalt the officer, the minister. I would not that you should hold any man's person in high estimation. I am deeply sensible that to me belongs blushing and confusion of face, but I magnify mine office, and the power of Him who has seen meet to employ me therein; I would endeavor to exalt in your view, the adorable goodness and condescension of the great Author of all mercies, in that he has caused the trumpet to be renewedly sounded in your borders; hear its important message with suitable attention; let it rouse and prepare all the ranks in the armies of our Israel, to engage in the glorious cause of our God. Let the daughter of our Zion arise from the bed of indolence; from the lethargic stupor of a false forgetfulness; from all the deadening, benumbing gratifications of sensuality and shake herself from the dust of the earth, that she may come up to the help of Him who hath called her with an high and holy calling. The trumpet is blown in her streets, the alarm has been heard by all, Oh! let not its language be rendered unintelligible by the multiplicity of trivial things that too much absorb the minds of many.

I am fully persuaded that the gracious visitation of humbling, melting goodness, has been afresh extended to individuals present in (I had almost said) a very memorable manner; nor will I recall the expression, for if it is not treasured up in your remembrance now, for your profit and advantage, it will be memorable in that awful approaching period, when every neglected mercy will appear deeply engraven, as a dread handwriting on the wall, against us. Let me, therefore, tenderly entreat you with all warmth of unutterable affection, as a brother as a fellow-pilgrim, through the vicissitudes of time, to the unmixed joys of a happy eternity that you will no longer neglect the offers of mercy, or turn a deaf ear to the reproofs of instruction. I feel my mind covered with the boundless love, that wishes, that ardently sires, you may indeed be wise for yourself. For, although I may be deficient in many qualifications of a gospel minister, I am not wanting in that pure disinterested love, which seek not yours but you.

Blow the trumpet in Zion: sanctify a fast. If we were but attentive enough to the sound of the trumpet, we should see the absolute necessity of this sanctified fast; a fast free of every of those delusive pleasures, those slavish attachments, that render the mind insensible of good. Call a solemn assembly. This branch of the summons (may some say) belongs only to a few, and we have no share in the duty enjoins. I confess I am of another opinion. I think every individual has a share in the instruction couched in it. Call a solemn assembly. Oh, you active ones! stop a while your swift career; make a solemn pause; sit collected from every object that can gratify or delight the sensual part; labor diligently to assemble all the powers and faculties of your souls, that they may be sanctified by Him who gave them. I believe there is no useless, dead, unactive member in the Church of God; those that can thus assemble the collected attention of a redeemed mind, devoted to the Divine will, have an undoubted right from the highest Authority, to call an holy convocation. We can do nothing against the Truth, but the Truth, was the language of some former, who had indeed sanctified an acceptable fast. I much desire that those who, perhaps, can be so active in promoting this glorious cause amongst the sons of men, as some who are called into more eminent stations in the church, may, by a circumspect care over all their words and actions, see that they do nothing against the Truth. Call a solemn assembly: gather a people. How scattered are many of the members of this quarter! scattered indeed as sheep without a shepherd! dispersed up and down the dark vale of insensibility and self-forgetfulness many upon the barren mountains of empty profession; lost to all sense of religious fellowship; unacquainted with that holy union in which is the bond of peace! How many are the Gallios I have met with amongst you, who (alas! it may be said) care for none of these things! Oh, you Elders! who are, or might have been, as Pillars in the Lord's house; you delegated Shepherds, who might have adorned the first ranks in the armies of our Israel, if you had not sat down, and taken a rest short of those glorious abodes, who are prepared for them that steadily persevere in the line of Divine appointment—to you I call is, gather the people.

Visit to Barbados.

The following letters of Wm. C. Allen present a few features covered by Wm. B. Harris preceding accounts, but they will not be like a repetition.—Ed.]

Bridgetown, Barbados, Second Month 24th, 1905.—I will, as usual, commence a letter a few days previous to departure of the mail, and to finish later. There does not seem much new to tell about our surroundings. Boarding-house continues comfortable, and there are pleasant associations therein, mostly here for health or rest. Any one desiring a balmy, warm winter climate would find Barbados. But it is very damp, and I would think would eat out the life of tubercular or rheumatic people. A good many Indians come here to escape the severe winds of the North. We have in the house, besides ourselves, Canadians, others from Trinidad, Demarara, Peru, Mexico,—the latter by a German,—and from Boston.

I never knew before that flying-fish are good to eat. Here we have them practically every day and when the bones have been removed, and after cooking, they make as fine and delicate a dish as one could imagine. They are sold everywhere at one cent each. We buy pretty fair butter from Canada at this time, so are eating a little again, particularly butter served up sufficiently hard not to require being dipped out with a spoon. The butter is quite good. Paw-paw is a big, round, squash-like fruit, served like citron marmalade. Guava-jelly is always about. Tamarind is a fine fruit, and its syrup makes a delicious drink. Then they have daily what is called "siling"—a thick sort of molasses taken from the last boiling pan, just previous to the boiling of the syrup or liquor of the sugarcane into sugar. The sugar mills send it into the market for sale by women, and a teaspoon of it is a very good omelette or cake. The native molasses preserved is delicious.

Fowls are poor everywhere in the tropics; but here they are eaten almost immediately after being killed, so are tough. All fowls are sold to housekeepers for the same reason. A great trick is not to buy one that has been "crammed,"—that is, filled with heavy fat just before selling, so as to increase the weight, not of meat, but of cheaper stuff.

We have just been down arranging for the meeting Fifth-day P. M. in the country, and on First-day in the Y. M. C. A. hall at Bridgetown. Whilst I have been writing W. stepped outside to hunt for shells. He has returned, bringing some pretty coral. I can, within one hundred feet of our room, find all the coral, shells and sea-weed we desire. They are tossed up twice a day, at each tide. I also have sea-anemones and other things in my collection.

Some of the strange creatures gotten out of the sea is the sea-egg. It is about as large as an orange, black, and spoked. Inside is a mass of yellowish, soft material, looking like fish-roe. It is very good when cooked, and much like oysters.

On First-day we had a meeting in the Y. M. C. A. hall. Probably about two hundred people were there, representing the solid, thoughtful part of the community, they being generally well educated people, who are interested in religion, and are well acquainted with the Bible. The Divine presence was wonderfully with us, and as a gentleman, speaking about it to-day, said, "You could hear a pin drop all during the address." The silent part of the meeting was strange to almost all present, yet most impressive. There is a great inquiry as to when we have other meetings, also as to the views of Friends. I do not doubt but that, if a heavenly-endowed minister were to settle here now, a goodly number would soon be gathered to our society, as in the past. There is absolutely no question in my mind on that score. The fields are ripe. The inconsistencies of the clergy on one hand, and witness of the "holiness movement" on the other, are making many open to conviction as to our nearness to Apostolic practice. But it is my lot to stop in Barbados only a little time;—I wish there were others to follow.

First-day A. M.—I felt like attempting a meeting under a big tree down near Bridgetown, out on a common. So we bicycled down there, and I announced to some "hangers-around" that we were going to have a gospel meeting. By dint of much persuading, and considerable personal notice in the neighboring houses (it is in a poor part of the town), we had nearly fifty to start with in ten minutes. W. B. H. took a means of settling them into quiet. Then I spoke. Two old Christian colored women, at the close, participated to great edification. One of them made a really wonderful prayer. By the end of the meeting the scoffers were very quiet,—and there was much tenderness displayed on the part of all when we left, nearly one hundred altogether. It was a time of solemn warning to sinners to seek Christ now. I felt we much helped in one serious respect, viz.—it is so difficult to get the uneducated people interested, or quiet, or to feel that a time of worship is in progress, when there is no singing.

Fifth-day evening we went out into the country, and held a meeting under a blacksmith's shed, whilst the people stood in it or around,—quite a large gathering. A big torch made a light in the shed; and out in the darkness I could not see a large part of the congregation. But all were so still—so remarkably quiet during the periods of silence,—not a rustle, or a whisper. We can truly feel it was a strong meeting.

Why do we have such weak meetings at home? Is it because the people are satisfied and critical, so that the word of the Lord does not have a chance to have free course and be glorified?

Second Month 28th.—We held another meeting in the Y. M. C. A. First-day evening, Second Month 26th, 1905. It was also a good-sized gathering, and the burden of the vocal exercise related to the ministry. Possibly the biblical teaching quoted and presented would not suit the feelings of many—but I must do my duty.—I am not here simply to please. This meeting resulted in our about closing out our line of English-language literature, particularly the little booklets about Friends. All this literature counts—it leads to frequent interview with seriously-minded people who are often, I find, influenced by the thought presented to them in conversations. So, publicly or privately, we are employed very closely. After such a day it is often good, as yesterday late afternoon, to bicycle out of town and look at a sugar-mill for a little rest. This afternoon we expect to ride out to Oistin's Town to hold a meeting.

The sea at high tide runs right up against our hotel. At low tide we can go down on to the beach and pick up all sorts of marine life—beautiful shells, sea-weed, coral, etc. We are, of course, close to the constant noise of the surf. Indeed, we have, for weeks, with the exception of one night, been within a mile of the sea.

Our hotel is really like a regulation old-fashioned English boarding-house, such as one finds back in the rural parts of England, where the average American does not go. The dear old lady who sits at the top of the table has the same ruffles and solid physique, and decided manner seen in similar places in the old country.

Bridgetown looks like an interior town of thirty thousand people in England. It has the same narrow streets, queer little shops, and sometimes no sidewalks. But here about nine tenths of the people are black. Women throng everywhere with bare feet, carrying all sorts of things on their heads, from large baskets filled with coal to a hoe or a stalk of sugarcane. They nearly all dress in white, with white headgear. Over in St. Lucia or Dominica they dress in the most brilliant colors, but matched in excellent taste, no matter how humble the wearer may seem to be.

Barbados is not a pretty island; it is rather flat and uninteresting. Miles of sugar-cane grow everywhere, and it is now being harvested. Ox-teams of four or six oxen pull little carts around the fields, and are surrounded by women collecting the cane to place on the carts. Then it is hauled to the mill. Every "estate" or plantation has its own mill run by steam or a windmill; these latter dot the landscape everywhere.

Bridgetown, Third Month 3rd.—We have moved from the first floor to the second, and now have a fine large room, with windows on three sides of it, through which the never-failing "trade-winds" sweep day and night. This part of Bridgetown is known as Hastings.

Fourth-day we had an open-air meeting at Oistin's Town, about five miles away. It was in a broiling hot sun after luncheon that we wheeled there. The chapel was not open, as the custodian doubtless felt shy about us; so we secured permission to hold our meeting on a lot belonging to a colored woman. After letting the people know, there was attracted a large company, who sat or stood mostly in the shade of a tree and adjoining house. Finding we did not sing, some left at first, but others came, and we had a good meeting. After the opportunity part of which had been in impressive silence, the company wanted to be with us and talk, so we finally left them with feelings of mutual interest and love. In the company were several professing Christians who seemed spiritually-minded, and not just in the air, as are so many in these islands.

Fifth-day afternoon we visited the Mission School in Bridgetown. It is just like the public schools we have seen. No discipline, according to our ideas, is observable. The children talk and run around the room about as they please, whilst a class will be reciting before the master. I saw one youngster, about er home near Downingtown, Second Month, 1896, in the eighty-first year of her age. At the meeting of the Committee held Ninth Month 19th, 1867, Joseph Elkinton, Joseph Stergwood and Samuel Morris were appointed to visit some of the tribes in the state of New York. These Friends paid a visit to the settlement at Complanter's and also to several parts of the Allegheny Reservation, but in consequence of the indisposition and finally the death of Joseph Elkinton which took place Second Month 9th, 1868 in the seventy-fourth year of age, no further efforts were made to come to the object of their appointment.

The death of this valued member of the Committee (Joseph Elkinton), was soon afterwards followed by that of Thomas Evans, who died on 25th of Fifth Month, 1868, in the seventy-year of his age, a beloved minister and one of us for many years was clerk of the Committee and in active service on behalf of the Indians had been closely identified with efforts of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting for the welfare of the aborigines of this country during a long period of years.

Albert Scotten also a minister had deceased the 20th of Fifth Month, 1860, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, after a long and valued service in this field of labor. In a report to the Yearly Meeting in 1868, the Committee remark "Owing to the decease of some members of the Committee, and the sad infirmities of others preventing them from attending to the service, we believe it would be a suitable time for a new appointment of the Committee."

His suggestion having been acted on by the Yearly Meeting, the following Friends who had previously been under the appointment were included in the new nomination, viz:—Joseph S. Elkinton, Edward Sharpless, George Satterwood, Samuel Emlen, James E. Rhoads, W. B. Garrett and William B. Cooper.

In their report to the Yearly Meeting in this year (1868) they quote the following remarks in condition of the Cattaraugus Reservation taken from a statement prepared by the Superintendent of Public Schools on the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservations:—"A stranger passing through the Cattaraugus reservation would see but little in the costume of the people or the general appearance of the country to remind him that he was in an Indian settlement. A good road some ten miles in length passes through farms with good houses, many of which have cultivated flowers in the front yards, cultivated fields and vegetable gardens, and a good supply of all kinds of domestic animals. On this one street there are six good school houses, three excellent boarding houses, a flourishing asylum for orphan and destitute Indian children, and a court house. At the annual fair of their agricultural show, they make a respectable show of stock, farm and garden products, and the women make a good display of butter, bread, cakes, and canned fruits, pickles and plain needle work."

The treaty of 1838 as it respected the transactions of the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservations from the Indians to the Ogden Land Company was annulled by the treaty of 1842, which has been previously mentioned. Its provisions however for the emigration of the Indians from New York State to the Indian country west of the Missouri, remained in force. In this distant country a tract of land of 1,840,000 acres had been set apart for them, equivalent to 320 acres for each individual, as a permanent home.

This land in Kansas was regarded by the Indians as the real and only equivalent for which they parted with their Buffalo Creek Reservation, and during the progress of the negotiations connected with the treaty of 1838, whenever they protested against the trivial amount of the consideration money named in the treaty, they were informed that while it was true that it was no proper equivalent, yet that the land made sure to them beyond the Mississippi was amply sufficient to make up the deficiency.

FOR "THE FRIEND"

Woman the Slayer of King Alcohol.

BY G. A. STONTON.

In the days of old and under the Mosaic dispensation, when Deborah was judge in Israel, the people did evil in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord sold them into the hand of Jabin, king of Canaan, the captain of whose host was Sisera. And the children of Israel cried unto the Lord; for twenty years Sisera had mightily oppressed them.

And Deborah dwelt under the palm-tree of Deborah, between Ramah and Bethel, in Mount Ephraim; and the children of Israel came up to her for judgment, and she sent and called Barak and said unto him, "Hath not the Lord God of Israel commanded saying, Go, and I will drive nigh unto thee Sisera, the captain of Jabin's army, with his chariots and his multitude: and I will deliver him unto thine hand."

And Barak said unto her, "If thou wilt go with me then I will go; but if thou wilt not go with me then I will not go." And she said, "I will surely go with thee, notwithstanding the journey thou takest shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman." And Deborah arose and went with Barak. And Barak went up with ten thousand men at his feet, and Deborah went with him.

When Sisera was told that Barak was gone up to Mount Tabor, he gathered together all his chariots of iron and all the people that were with him, and Deborah said unto Barak, "Up; for this is the day in which the Lord hath delivered Sisera into thy hand. Is not the Lord gone out before thee?" So Barak went down from Mount Tabor, and ten thousand men after him, and the Lord discomfited Sisera and all his best; so that Sisera lighted down off his chariot and fled away on his feet to the tent of Jael, Heber's wife, and he said unto her, "Stand in the door of the tent, and when any man doth come and inquire of thee and say, Is there any man here? thou shalt say, No."

And, behold, as Barak pursued Sisera the woman Jael went out to meet him, and said unto him, "Come, and I will shew thee the man whom thou seekest;" and when Barak came into her tent, Sisera lay there dead: he was slain by the hands of a woman, Jael, Heber's wife. So God subdued on that day Jabin, the king of Canaan, before the children of Israel. And the hand of the children of Israel prospered, and prevailed against Jabin the king until they had destroyed the king of Canaan.

Then sang Deborah and Barak on that day, saying, "Praise ye the Lord for the avenging of Israel when the people willingly offered themselves."

Let us look a little at our own condition at the present time: are we not now oppressed by King Alcohol? And is not the brewer the captain of the king's host? When he sees and begins to find in very truth that the Christian voters are all against him regardless of any party affiliations, he will gather up his mighty host and stand against them: although he may fight valiantly, the day is approaching when the captain of this mighty host will be slain, and King Alcohol will be subdued. For the Lord doth avenge, when his people doth willingly obey." Christ came, not to regulate the works of the devil, but to destroy them. "The Lord giveth the Word; the women that publish the tidings are a great host" Ps. 68: 11, R. V.

SPRINGBOO, Third Month 18th, 1905.

NOTWITHSTANDING I have not been so much engaged in the discipline of the church, as might have been best, yet it is like marrow to my bones in my old age, to see the young and rising generation engaged therein; for we have been ploughing and sowing, but neglecting to keep up the hedge, (and) the wild beasts have got in and devoured our labor.—Peter Davis.

Items Concerning the Society.

Hardshaw West Monthly Meeting in England has already concluded to abolish its Ministry and Oversight Meeting as a separate body; that is, to hold the sittings of such a meeting as a part of the regular Monthly Meeting open to all members of the Society—adjournments of the Monthly Meeting being held in the week previous to the Quarterly Meeting for these special duties. It is hoped that this arrangement will tend to a development of the sense of responsibility for the spiritual activities of the Church, and help to train younger Friends in its service, says the British Friend.

The British Friend, speaking of the next Yearly Meeting, which is to be held at Leeds, England, characterizes as a notable "forward movement" the arrangements which have been made for holding special meetings "on the Sunday of Yearly Meeting week," in about twelve of the largest towns in the North. In several cases the largest public hall in the town has been engaged, and "for each meeting two or more Friends have been appointed as speakers." Has the appointing been engaged to be delivered to order along with the speaking? "We congratulate," says the statement, "our Friends in Yorkshire on the faith and courage they are showing." Is man's pre-determination of a set sermon for a set time to be called faith? We concede the name of courage, for it requires much of it thus to break "forward" from the standard of Quakerism as regards preaching, and to attempt "to gain the ear of the people for the message of Quakerism," by practically disowning it where it would apply to public ministry.

But perhaps the language of our contemporary does the project of our Friends pre-engaging public sermons injustice. Our object is not to criticise, but to uphold the standard of Friends' ministry where it seems sinking into lecture-ships. The latter are for information, but "the message of Quakerism" is the Holy Spirit conformed to in practice; and He can be breathed upon the people through ministers by nothing less than Himself, and then not in man's will or time.

Notes in General.

Wm. J. Dawson recently said, "There are troubles enough and difficulties enough in the conditions of life in this and in my own country to make a patriot pray, whether he be a Christian or not, that a new spirit of righteousness may be pressed upon the people."

On "Political Corruption in Connecticut," Newman Smith says, "All this political corruption is part an essence of the mammoth worship which the Church is called to fight in dead earnest. There is needed a voice in the pulpit and a response in the Church which shall cost sacrifice, and which may arouse the enmity of the political world."

—The Japanese have adopted a compulsory system of national education. A boy and girl must attend school as soon as they attain the age of six, and remain there until the age of fourteen. The first four years they teach them the Japanese and Chinese languages, and the latter four years they add English; when a boy and girl are graduated from the Japanese common schools they can read and speak English. By teaching the Chinese and English languages besides their own tongue, they bring up a new generation, prepared to seek knowledge in the outer world, as commanded by the emperor.

A NEW (?) SORT OF TRUST.—A unique trust has been formed in the State of Maine.

It has been customary for the Legislature to call upon the different ministers without regard to denomination to invoke Divine blessing at the opening of each morning's session, but a certain clique of ministers formed a club, and had an order passed by the Legislature allowing only those who have settled parishes to make prayers at the State House, thus freezing out all the superannuated and itinerant.

This order was followed by another, increasing the price from two dollars to five dollars per prayer, and this has especially incited those outside the circle, and they are trying to have the order rescinded.

The itinerant ministers of the three cities of Augusta, Hallowell and Gardiner are incensed over the formation of the prayer trust, and declare that it should be busted.—Richmond Times Despatch.

WILLIAM PENN'S DEED FROM THE INDIANS. — "This indenture witnesseth that We, Packerhan, Jakanan, Sikaks, Partuescott, Jervis, Esenepauk, Feltkroy, Hekellapan, Econt, Machloha, Mettchouga, Wissa Powey, Indian Kings, Sackemakers, right owners of all lands from Quing Quingus called Chester Creek, all along by the west side of the Delaware river, and so between the said creeks backwards as far as a man can ride in two days with a horse, for and in consideration of these following goods to us in hand paid, and secured to be paid, by William Penn, proprietary and governor of the province of Pennsylvania and territories thereof, viz: Twenty Guns, 20 fathoms of Matchcoat, 30 of Strong Water, 20 Blankets, 20 Kettles, 20 pounds Powder, 100 Bars Lead, 40 Tomahawks, 100 Knives, 40 Pairs of Stockings, 1 Barrel of Beer, 20 Pounds of Red Lead, 100 Fathoms of Wampum, 30 Glass Bottles, 30 Pewter Spoons, 100 Hands of Tobacco, 20 Tobacco Tongs, 30 Flint, 30 Pairs of Scissors, 30 Combs, 60 Looking Glasses, 200 Needles, 1 Kettle of Sale, 30 Pounds of Sugar, 5 gallons of Molasses, 30 Tobacco Boxes, 100 Jewellers, 20 Hoes, 30 Gimlets, 30 Wooden Screw Boxes, 100 Strings of Beeds, Do hereby acknowledge, &c. Given under our hands, &c., at New Castle, 2nd day of the eighth month, 1685."

The above is a copy of Penn's deed from the Indians, from a copy "taken from the original, by Ephraim Norton, then living in Washington county, Pa., formerly a clerk in the land office, which copy he gave to William Hutton, and from which it was taken in York, Pa., the seventh of Twelfth Month, 1813.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is stated in Washington that the United States, if opportunity offers, would gladly assist Russia and Japan to begin direct communication on the subject of peace, and thus avoid an international conference, in which complications might arise regarding the maintenance of the territorial integrity of China, upon which the United States Government has insisted from the outset.

President Roosevelt left Washington on the 3rd inst. for a journey to Texas and Colorado, for an absence of several weeks. Arrangements have been made by which it is expected, he will be in frequent communication with Washington, and be able to pass upon matters requiring his attention.

A despatch from New York, of the 31st, says: There has been a great increase in the number of deaths in that city from cerebro-spinal meningitis within the previous few days. One hundred and four deaths from it had occurred during the one half day.

In answer to telegraphic inquiry made by the Public Ledger of this city, it is stated that property unemployed and unparalleled is reported from every section of the United States. Money is easy and capital seeks investment; the wage earner is better paid than for some years, and there are few idle men, indeed, in the broad domain of the country.

Reports from all the centres, from Boston to Denver; from St. Paul in the great Northwest, to the South; from New York and Chicago tell the same story.

Paper milk bottles have lately been proposed by Dr. A. H. Stewart of the Bureau of Health, in this city. It is stated that an important feature of the bottle is that it stands at 212° Fahrenheit, and then baked. This sterilizes the bottle and prevents the milk coming in contact with the paper itself and adhering, as it does, to the glass bottle. Bacteriologic tests with the sample bottles were very satisfactory. They are light, tightly sealed, perfectly clean, and are sterilized and are used, thus doing away with all bottle washing in private houses and in milk depots. Their cost is such that they may be used without increasing the present price of milk to the consumer.

The negro population in this country is stated to have increased from 650,000 in 1880 to 3,840,000 in 1900, or more than 33 per cent.

A bill has lately been passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and approved by the Governor, which enacts that a system of humane education, which shall include kind treatment of birds and animals, shall be included in the branches of the study now required by law to be taught in the common schools, each instruction to be given to all pupils up to and including the fourth grade of the public schools, and to consist of not more than half an hour each week during the whole term of the school. The bill prohibits experimenting with any living creatures in any public school.

On the 29th ult. the temperature in this city was 79°, the highest recorded by the Weather Bureau. In some parts of this State it was still higher, and workmen were obliged to discontinue their labors on account of it.

Seedless apples have been propagated by John F. Spencer, of Grand Junction, Colorado, who, after several years' experimental research, succeeded in producing five trees of pure seedless, colorless, and waxless apples, from which have been budded 2000 other trees. It is estimated that these will have produced about 375,000 nursery trees by the fall of 1905, and the following year 2,500,000 trees will furnish the supply. The tree is without a blossom and it is thus almost impossible for the codling moth to deposit its eggs. The apples, which are of a beautiful dark red color with yellow straw berry dots, are of a goodly size and have a flavor similar to the Wine Sap.

FOREIGN.—The steamship Victoria, which has lately crossed the ocean to Halifax in about eight days, is the first vessel of large size to perform this voyage driven by steam engines, in which the steam sets direct action upon the revolving shaft, with great economy in fuel, and in amount of machinery, and with a remarkable absence of vibration from the movement of the engines. It is believed that an important change in marine navigation has thus been begun.

The Simplon tunnel, the longest in the world, connecting Switzerland and Italian states of railroads, was traversed by trains from each end on the 20th instant for the first time.

But little effort appears to have been made to force the Russian army in Manchuria; the serious nature of the disorder in European Russia appearing to be reason that troops have not been sent there. A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 30th ult. states that the Russian troops in parts of Russia describe outrages committed by the Czar. In answer to a petition of the Privy Diet has conceded the suspension of the conscription in that country until 1908. The Japanese are reported to have taken in hand the administration of Manchuria and to be concentrating their troops in the neighborhood of Kirin.

The Russian Greek Catholic Church has appealed for separation of Church and State. The has been published in the Church Messenger, a special official paper. An ecclesiastical council is proposed which shall secure religious independence.

A Japanese loan of $150,000,000 has been offered to London, and has been subscribed for by the exporters of more than seven times that amount, a large part of this country.

Steps have been taken in Mexico to place the curf of that country partially on a gold basis in order to the pernicious effects of an oscillation in the relative value of silver and gold.

The melting of ice has been observed slowly floating southward in the Labrador current, due to the path of Atlantic liners. It is estimated to be hundred miles long.

President Roosevelt has acquiesced in a proposal by the Government of San Domingo for the collection and conservation of its revenues, pending the action of the United States Senate upon the treaty, to the end that the meantime no change shall take place in the situation which would render useless its consummation or complications into its enforcement. The Secretary of War of the United States will present for nomination the President of the Dominican Republic men to collect the revenues. All the members of the cabinet of the Dominican Government will be deposited in New York bank, to be designated by the Secretary of War, and will there be kept until the Senate has acted. If the action is adverse, the money will then be turned over to the Dominican Government. If it favors the treaty, the money will be distributed among the creditors in proportion to their claims.

According to a foreign statistical return received the average duration of life is as follows: 3 months and Norway, 50 years; Britain, 45 years; 3 months and 44 years, 11 months; Switzerland, 44 years and 8 months; France, 43 years, 6 months; Austria, 39 years and 8 months; Prussia and Italy, 39 years; Bavaria 36 Spain, 32 years, 4 months.

NOTICES.

The Annual Meeting of Friends' Western District Doucas Society will be held in the corner room of Twelfth Street Meeting, on Fourth-day, Fourth Month 12th, after the meeting for worship, and all interested friends are invited to attend.

RIGHT REVEREND (BLANK) D. D."—There is no right Reverend, and "holy and reverend" is his name."

Wrong reverend is every man whose heart is not holy; and the more so as he covets or seeks an appellation not true to the state of his soul.

The more reverend a man is, the more will his spirit revolt from a title of human adulation.

The more he knows of Divinity, as the true nature really is, the more humbly will he realize that none but the Spirit of the Divine himself can teach Divinity.

CHEAP AND THE PRECIOUS BAPTISM.—Ordinary to what is generally supposed, the doctrine of the Friends requires that they should be the strongest Baptists among all Christian sects. They differ from others, not on the necessity of Christian Baptism, but in not treating so cheap an element for it as others do upon. But because Friends believe that baptism ordained by Christ is "with the Holy Spirit and with fire," and "into the name" of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, they are said not to believe in baptism at all. In the fact of Baptism, they are said to rank foremost of all baptismal sects. If composed throughout of devoted members, they certainly would.

Educating Indians.

It was more important that General Pratt should have continued to serve the welfare of the Indians, that he should have used a minority Conference for expressing his opinion to the Indian Bureau.

The pretext thus furnished for the appointment of a successor in the management of the Indian School at Carlisle, has been followed by a change of policy. Instead of following Pratt's plan of educating young Indians into useful men and women, a reversion is now foreshadowed, that of training them for military purposes, a reversion towards former barbarism of heart instead of their conversion to civilization.

Gen. Pratt's concern has been to place Indians as individuals in the midst of our common civilization that each may imbibe it and grow into its advantages, as all of us have been fitted for it, by sharing with others the industries of our time. He would not keep them sequestered in tribal groups, to be government paupers and dependents, but would prepare them for partnership in American manhood and effort, through their learning by working and competing with our better class of working citizens, to follow the same rule and mind the same things.

"It is a great mistake," he says, "to think that the Indian is born an inevitable savage. He is born a blank, like all the rest of us. Left in the surroundings of savagery, he grows to possess a savage language, superstition and life. Transfer the white infant to the savage surroundings and he will grow up like the Indian; transfer the Indian infant to civilized surroundings and he will grow up like the white,—civilized."

This has been a principle of the Carlisle training. In order to become civilized like the whites the Indian youth must do it with the whites,—passing through their experiences in common with them. Returned to their reservation, the Indian is returned to the semi-savage environment, and a relapse into dependence and inferiority becomes natural. And the army life would be still more under the bondage of dependence, temptation, and loss of force in one as a private citizen. "I regard it," said Dr. Montezuma, an Apache Indian, who, though prevented from speaking at Carlisle yet obtained the wider audience of the public press,—"I regard it as an insult to the intelligence of the red man to presume that he can not attain to anything higher than the vocation of the soldier."

Many will regret it if they are to see the wholesome system which was carried on by Gen. Pratt, supplanted by downward ideals, looking towards the profession of life-taking in Indian men, and the peculiar position of Indian women as army nurses. Better have staid on their reservations than be herded in barracks or camp or on slaughter-field. Better remain the untutored Indian and behold "God in the clouds and hear Him in the wind," than see the demon in battle smoke. If we are going to educate the Indian, let us educate him for that which is above all wars and fightings. Else what does he morally gain above that which has sunk all his tribes down to where our forefathers found them?

THE IMAGE BREAKER.—The late Archbishop Trench tells in verse a history of the great Mohammedan conqueror of India, Mamoud the image-breaker, who like others of his religion believed that they had commission from on high to break down the idols and suppress the idolatry of the nations. At one place Mamoud found an image fifteen feet high, and was about to destroy it, when persons interposed, offering him an enormous ransom, if he would but spare this idol. He put their beseechings from him, and, answering that he would rather be known as a breaker than as a broker of idols, he struck the image with his mace. Others followed his example, till it was broken to pieces. As it broke, it poured forth such a wealth of diamonds, rubies and other precious stones as far more than outweighed the ransom he had just refused. So, when our weak heart pleads that this or that which we fear to be wrong should be spared, let us remember that we shall gain greater riches of peace and joy by putting from us what is evil, or even what is doubtful, than we shall by listening to the tempter's voice or accepting the tempter's bribes.—Selected.

MERCY, NOT SACRIFICE.—It was the core of the Pharisaic evil that they put the law of ritual above the law of righteousness, the law of legalism above the law of love. External propriety meant so much more to them than spiritual sincerity and the reality of the life of the heart in God. To this artificial religion the reply of Jesus is sufficient rebuke. Goodness is not to be realized in perfunctory observance of religious ceremonialism, but in a heart bright with God, and a life ordered by the will of God, who will have obedience before sacrifice, and love rather than the fat of rams.

A MEDIATION.—In such silent gatherings as this in which now we are assembled, in such patient waiting upon the invisible things of God, we come into a consciousness of the source of all life—into the very origin of things, we pass from the visible and perishing into the real eternal, that which cannot perish—the realm of spirit the life of all that is or ever can be.

After this manner we grow into the likeness of the first born, walking in his footsteps we enter the silences empty of earthly desire, draw from the Eternal One that which makes us glow in the Divine likeness.

The Cruise of the "Arabic."

En route to Jaffa.

Third Month 4th, 1905.—It doesn't seem possible that you have been inaugurating a President to-day! We recalled it in our carriage on our way back from Nazareth. I've not had a chance to write since leaving Smyrna. We had a right pleasant time there, though we were annoyed by solicitations to buy their dirty figs. There is an Acropolis to visit, and the ride is quite steep and difficult, but the view was grand at the top. This being the second commercial city of the Ottoman Empire there was a good deal of shipping in the harbor, and the Gulf of Smyrna is beautiful. Some one has described it as "an Asiatic city with an European face." French was spoken generally, and one felt as though on the Continent. They point out the tomb of St. Polycarp, second Bishop of Smyrna, and as he was a disciple of the Apostle John, it took us back to near the time of our Lord. There were remains of several aqueducts, the oldest Roman, and built in the third century. The bazaars were almost as bewildering as in Constantinople, but we hadn't much time for shopping. The stop at Smyrna is made for those who wish to visit Ephesus, and quite a number took the trip. We left in the afternoon and steamed through the Greek Archipelago, past Rhodes and Cyprus, and landed at Caifa about noon. Those of us who were to take the Galilee and Samaria trips had luncheon early and were landed promptly in small boats. Here we got our first view of Mt. Carmel and with our glasses could see the snow on Mt. Hermon. We were assigned to big mountain wagons or carriages, each having three horses. The Samaria party rode horseback and will meet us in Jerusalem. There were sixteen wagons and we made quite a caravan when we left Caifa. Our conductor and his agent were in the lead, then the dragoman (interpreter and guide,) with the first party, and the other carriages following with a second dragoman in the last carriage. As we started, we were expected to continue until the end of the journey. Several stops were made to feed and water the horses, and a lunch from the ship was provided, but we always resumed the journey as above mentioned.

After crossing the Kishon, which "ran red with the blood of the prophets of Baal," and through a good deal of barren country, we came to more cultivated places, groves of olive, fig and mulberry trees, and finally reached the Plain of Esdraelon. A scene of great beauty was before us, the like of which I never beheld. It was simply indescribable, and we gladly halted to drink in the beauties of nature. The plain is very broad, and the great brown patches of ploughed ground, the acres of wheat and barley several inches high and the beautiful beds of flowers—red, yellow, pink and violet, with the high mountains towering above all, rich with Biblical interest, were indelibly impressed on our minds. After twenty-six miles' ride we came to the city of Nazareth, eleven hundred feet above the sea, where we spent the night in a monastery. These convents are built for French, Austrian and Greek pilgrims. Our Clark uses them as hotels. We were put four and five in a cell and there was a great deal of dissatisfaction. The only real discomfort was the cold. The bare stone floors and lack of any kind of heat were a little too much for luxury-loving Americans. The food was rather bad, mostly goat's meat and black barley bread, but we made out with the aid of crackers we had brought with us. Breakfast early next morning, and then we were taken to the traditional sites of the cave of the Annunciation, kitchen of Mary and carpenter shop of Joseph, also the fountain on the edge of the village from which the supply of water has been taken from time immemorial, and no doubt where Mary often went. The women were filling their jars and carrying them away on their heads, making quite a picturesque scene. There are hospitals and schools here connected with the English mission, and many of the children spoke English. We were simply besieged on all sides for "bakshish" (gift). That seems to be the first word the babies are taught, and the parents hold them up to the carriages as we drive along, and the children seem to come out of the earth to beg, no dwelling being in sight. After early lunch we proceeded to Galilee. The road was very rough, and we sometimes were glad to walk to avoid the jolting, but the country was cultivated and it was interesting to see the men ploughing with the old-fashioned ploughs and oxen, or even a camel! We stopped at Cana of Galilee, where the water was turned to wine, and the home of Nathaniel. The people were dirty, but we were interested in hearing the children sing in the English mission schools. The streets in all of these places are unworthy the name, and the filth is beyond belief.

Our six hours' drive brought us in view of the Horns of Hatbin and beautiful snow-clad Hermon. Our arrival was timed for sunset, and the sea of Galilee was exquisite with the tints of the setting sun, the mountains reflected in its glassy surface. To me nothing else in the Holy Land will make the impression that this Lake did. Here surely is the same scene that our Saviour saw, the mountains, the sky and the sun. We were put in a convent, and could walk out on the roof to the very edge of the lake, and the view was very sweet and restful after our hard ride. We were rejoiced to find some nice fresh fish when we went down to dinner, and could decline the kid for once.

Breakfast at six o'clock the next morning so as to give us an early start on the lake. We went six or eight in a boat with five oarsmen, four pulling at one time and the fifth acting as relief. It was so lovely to see the sun rise, and the men cheerily sang their boat song in Arabic with an occasional "hip hurrah" to please the Americans. Mt. Hermon seemed very near, and as we approached the northern end of the lake near where the Jordan enters we seemed to feel the cool breath from its icy summits. We rowed about seven miles to the supposed sites of Capernaum, Magdala and Bethsaida were also pointed out.

Desolation has surely visited these shores since our Saviour's time, as the once populous region is deserted and Tiberias the only place of any size, where we spent the night, has only a few thousand inhabitants. Cholera takes the people off by scores and the quarantine had just been lifted a short time before. On the return to Tiberias one of the p from the Gospels very effectively, seemed that by chance we had gotten boat rowed by "Cook's" men, and they determined to out-do "Clark's," so they labored to get us home first, and received "Bakshish" with smiling faces, saying "no good," "Cook very good!" It was pleasing that they can appreciate a joke, for most of the men are so repulsive and such sullen countenances that you do not to be in their company.

After early lunch at Tiberias we next to Nazareth for the night, and the next (Seventh-day), returned to Caifa and our ship. The men in the small boats that us to the shore and back are so menac their demands for "bakshish" that one that they would dump you into the sea minute if you didn't accede to their dem

The Arabic seemed a fair haven after days of Palestine, and after necessary liminaries we joyfully went down to di What a contrast to the meals we had having! Everything was so spick and the stewards flew at our bidding, the tasted so good that with one accord voted for civilization! A few hours' sail here to Jaffa, but it was dark and we were packing to spend our eight days in and Jerusalem.

Breakfast at seven o'clock, Third Month. The sea was rough and we had an excite time landing. Many were seasick and frightened very badly, but somehow it disturb us. We seem a strong combin on sea and land!

At Jaffa is where Hiram, King of brought the cedars of Lebanon to build temple. The house of Simon the Tannee also shown us. This is the great count oranges and we do wish you could have. We had luncheon at a hotel and then special train for the four hours' ride to salem. The road is through the pla Sharon and full of interest. We were i the cave of Samson and the place where S judged the people. At last we reache Holy City, and driving through the gal our hotels, felt that we could say wit Psalmist, "My feet are standing with gates, O Jerusalem."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Faithfulness to the New Life.

is an honor to the citizen to be a faithful subject to the king, and kings in turn love faithful subjects, and bestow honor upon them. To be a citizen by birthright, in order to become one, a man must abjure allegiance to his former ruler, and solemnly protest to serve the new, whose subject he desires to be. Now, the state of nature, other rulers beside God had dominion over us. To be a citizen of the kingdom of God, these we must need grace, ere we are eligible to become a citizen of the kingdom of God. We have served delights and pleasures incidental with the dominion of the Prince of this world, with Self as Prime minister. We lived in forgetfulness of God, and the duties we owed to Him neglected to pay. And as no man can both please and serve two masters, we neither loved nor served God.

But God, our Creator and Redeemer, is Love, merciful. He beheld and knew our state of bondage to Him, seeing us under the dominion of Sin, whose reward for faithful service is only sorrow and death. God first showed us before we loved Him. He sought us out before we sought Him. He so far advanced us that we became conscious of our condition. He drew nigh, and the light of His glory enabled to see ourselves as we were in His Divine sight. He began in His mercy to desire to return, as the Prodigal to His heavenly Father, to seek his pardon and reconciliation. Already had God opened up a way, way by which we, once rebels, might be forgiven. For, had we not been His subjects by nature? Had we not of our own free will yielded up ourselves to serve sin? thus renouncing our proper allegiance to God. We had by our acts of disobedience become enemies to Him who had broken his commandments, and come under the just judgments of his righteous laws. We, ourselves, almighty, having all power utterly to destroy us as enemies. He yet in loving kindness long-suffering mercy approaches us. He, by his prophet promised that "all flesh shall behold the glory of God" (Isa. 40:5), and again "Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined," "the Lord hath led the earth from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof." When men were in darkness, in unconcern of the eternal welfare of their souls, they looked not up to Him, but now they gladly greet the rising of the Sun of Righteousness and behold the dawning of a brighter day. Their hearts are pierced by the beams of his love, and tendered to His visits of compassion. Sorrow fills their hearts when they remember their multiplied transgressions. This is true repentance, the cooperation of the Spirit of God. Like as Aaron the High-priest, the trembling sinner, kneeling, his former King Satan standing on one side claiming his right of sovereignty, and the King of Jesus on the other, rebuking the adversary and commanding that the contrite, humble sinner be stripped of his prison garbs, and clothed in the robes of righteousness, which all who wear who dwell in Immanuel's land. And as all have sinned, all have need of repentance; therefore is the example taken not from the vilest sinner, but from the high priest, who above all men needed to be holy.

How does the Holy Spirit point out to the repentant sinner, the Saviour; who having once suffered for sin that sinners might be forgiven and brought to God, cries, as the witness John did to the Jews, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world;" and what is of the greatest moment to that sinner, "He died for thee." Belief in that word is faith, a faith in Jesus, which brings pardon, reconciliation, peace and joy. Christ Jesus, the Good Shepherd of Israel, now seeks his flock scattered on the mountains and in the morasses of sin, and as He draws nigh, the sins of the penitent one, which hang as the dark cloud on Sinai's Mount, threatening the impending and righteous judgment of God therefore, these sins in the presence of that Holy One, all pass behind his back, to roll away forever into oblivion, and his glory seen irradiates all around. Despair and unbelief are dispelled, and a glad and assured hope fills the sinner's soul. Thus is it true, "All whom the Father giveth to me, shall come to me; and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." Again, Jesus taught his disciples, "Ye believe in God, believe also in me." Here is "faith in God and in the Lord Jesus Christ. This also is Christ by his grace, "the author and the finisher of the saints' faith," for He forgives us our sins that we may forsake sin; He washes our sins away, that we may be by the help of his grace overcome sin, and "Be holy," even as it is a holy God, who hath in and through his dear Son called us to himself. He requires us now to be faithful. He gives us heavenly armour, that we may overcome our spiritual enemies, and in this heavenly canopy are found "the shield of faith," the "helmet of salvation," and the "sword of the spirit, which is the word of God." His command and promise to his new-born subject is, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

But do all thus called prove faithful? Israel in Egypt felt the affliction of his bondage. He cried unto the God of Israel, who heard and answered. He sent Moses as a Saviour, who delivered them from bondage. He lured his people into the wilderness, to prove whether they loved God more than all.

Alas! for man's resolutions and faithfulness. They forgot God, who by his judgments and mighty works had saved them. They turned the back to God and fell down to a golden calf, the work of their own hands, and ascribed to this dumb idol their deliverance from bondage. So alas! do some who have heard and answered the call of God, when the first fruits of the joys of deliverance have been experienced, and the Lord hides himself for awhile from them, that they may seek Him, may hunger and thirst for his manifested presence, in order that He may wean them from trusting in their own arm for deliverance, and trust alone in God, and wait upon Him for a renewal of their strength, these, through impatience depart from their trust in the Lord, and lean upon self or upon other men to guide them. These depart from the true and only guide to blessedness, the Spirit of promise, who is sent to teach us all things and to guide the flock of Christ into all truth, like as God by his pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night, led his people through the wilderness into the promised land, God asking of them nothing more nor less than faith in their leader, and obedience whether to advance or to rest. Those who forsake this guide go into formalism, will-worship and the like, and ceasing to be led by the Spirit of God, cease to be the true born children of Abraham, the father of the faithful, the friend of God.

If these would always remember, that God never leaves nor forsakes those who seek and trust in Him (for has He not engraven them on the palms of his hands?)—would they but believe that God never changeth in his love towards them and his purpose in calling them, and that these changes in the hearts of men are ever found in true believers (for is it not written? "Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God," Ps. lv; 19,) then would they dwell patiently under these turnings and overturnings of the Lord's hand, and wait for the promised power from on high. These things make the heart humble, teachable, and trustful, and if the heart is made better by this work of grace, then is a man's walk and conversation acceptable to God.

The Christian walks by faith, not by sight. And the Word of Grace ever leads in the path of righteousness, manifesting the evil, and giving power to refuse it, and pointing to the strait gate and the narrow way, wherein all who walk take up a cross to their own will, and implicitly follow their heavenly guide.

SILENCE.—The rector of a large church in Philadelphia recently contributed the following to the Public Ledger:

Let us think of some ways in which we can make our worship more real and true and worthy. And in the first place we speak too much. Our part ought to be to listen to God's voice; to look up into His loved face and rejoice in His presence; to bow our heads that He may touch us in blessing; to be still and know that He is God. The finest thing to me in connection with the "Friends," or "Quakers" as we commonly call them, is the observance of silence which is so marked a part of their public worship. And I am thankful that it has entered so largely into all forms of worship. Most of us when we enter the church bow our heads for a few moments in silent prayer, and at the close of the service after the benediction we are again quiet. How blessed those still moments are! We can almost feel the presence of the Holy Spirit. And I love to go into a church and sit down or kneel when the church is empty, for then, too, when all humanity is absent, the blessed Spirit seems to brood over the Sanctuary of God. In our private prayers I believe we ought to keep silence at times and let our spirits commune with the infinite. We are so ready to pour forth our sorrows or plead with God to give us this or that! And He is always ready and willing. But may not His great heart of love long to have us trust Him and listen while He speaks with still small voice to quiet our alarms and calm our anxieties? We often think we shall be heard for our much speaking. They who worship in spirit and in truth know how to keep quiet in the presence of the great Father, while they rest in His love.

A MAN who is too busy to take care of his health is like a workman who is too busy to sharpen his tools.

A History of the Adoption of a Stated Ministry in American Yearly Meetings.

(From Allen C. and Richard H. Thomas's History of the Society of Friends in America, 1894).

After this the subject of baptism and the Supper became of secondary interest and was overshadowed by that of the ministry. With the increase of religious life and evangelizing zeal not only had old congregations taken on new growth and activity, but many new congregations had been formed. To accomplish this many methods formerly unknown among Friends were in various places brought into use, such as congregational singing, and the employment of methods more or less similar to those so familiar among the Methodists. Persons brought rapidly into the Society and with very little knowledge of the methods of Friends or instruction in them, were found not to understand their unconventional ways. With the intense zeal for new converts that had now taken hold of the Society, it often seemed simpler to adapt the meetings to the crude ideas of the converts rather than to adopt the slower process of educating them, and in this way in many places in the West and some in the East very decided changes began to show themselves. Most noticeable of these was the introduction of "pastors," who were at first expected to give their whole time to looking after the congregation, and preaching, but not in any way to the exclusion of the rest, or even necessarily always to preach. In order to enable them to do this, a very slight support was afforded them. This change came very quietly, and has never yet become general. In Iowa, Oregon, Western and Ohio Yearly Meetings the method has attained wide acceptance, and in the first two may be regarded as the settled policy of the body. There is at present none of it in Philadelphia and Baltimore, and but very little in North Carolina and New England [1894, but showing an increase in New England since]. In the other Yearly Meetings it prevails to a greater extent, but by no means universally. It has given rise to much discussion, generally carried on in a very Christian spirit. The movement attained strength so rapidly that it appeared as if the front of the Society would be permanently and universally changed; but the opposition continues, and in the last year or two there have been signs of a reaction in various quarters, and there seem to be grounds for the expectation that the final outcome will be something more nearly akin to the original basis of the Society than is at present seen in the development of the "pastoral system," under which in a few* places prearranged services with choir singing and music, etc., have come into vogue.

It is too soon to say how far this reaction will extend. It was probably started by the conference held in October of 1892 at Indianapolis. This conference was suggested by the one held in Richmond, Indiana, five years previously. A proposition for an authoritative conference was made later by Kansas Yearly Meeting, but not accepted. Finally a committee of the various Yearly Meetings met at Oskaloosa at the time of Iowa Yearly Meeting in 1891 and issued a recommendation for a conference.

This was accepted by the various Yearly Meetings on the Continent, except Canada, yet not fully as to details, most of the Yearly Meetings not considering themselves bound to continue to send delegates to future conferences unless it seemed best. Baltimore instructed its delegates not to take part in voting in case any question should be settled in that way.* The conference was unlike any that preceded it in the fact that the representation to it was in proportion to the membership of the respective Yearly Meetings, and unlike the one of 1887 in having no representatives from Great Britain, Ireland, or Canada. In this conference the great question was that of "pastoral labor," and a minute on the subject was adopted. The delegates from Baltimore, most of those from North Carolina and a number from Kansas objected to the minute on the ground of its indorsement of the appointment of pastors, which they felt was a serious interference with the true liberty of the membership at large and the development of strong Christian character. Probably, however, the strongest weapon used against the "pastoral movement" was forged by those who favored it, for in the course of the discussion the real meaning of it was brought out, and it was stated without contradiction that it placed the ministry on a financial basis and meant a professional class. These statements attracted a great deal of attention and comment, and brought a number to think that the time to review their position had come. The reaction is, however, but slight, and probably is not found in those places where the system has attained its fullest development. It is an interesting fact that statistics of growth in the Society do not bear out the claim that the increase of numbers has been in proportion to the adoption of the "pastoral methods." In the East certainly the proportional increase has been greatest in those meetings (excluding Philadelphia, where special conditions prevail), where there have been the fewest innovations of this kind. In the West there has been great growth in some places under it, and in other places not.

In the field of evangelization Friends have been the most successful, especially in the West. Their work has by no means been confined to their own denomination, but they have gladly labored for others and in union with other denominations. Although they have become a proselyting body, they are still remarkable for their freedom from jealousy of others and readiness to encourage converts to join whatever denomination of Christians they may feel will be most helpful to them.

In places where the system of having a "pastor" is not used, the pastoral work is sought to be accomplished by committees, composed of the more spiritually minded of the members, and this is often followed by most excellent results.

EVEN as Jesus looked to the Father, so look ye! As He sought the solitudes and the silences for the strength of soul communion so seek ye! There is no life apart from God, for, "in Him we live and move and have our being."

*As a matter of fact, no question was decided by vote during the conference.

An indictment of "Yellow Pulpitism," "Yellow" methods are rampant not only in journalism but in religion, if we may accept the statements of a recent writer in the New York Independent, who bases his observations on the perusal and classifications of a year's "Religious Notices" in the metropolitan newspapers. He thinks that the "Saturday" advertisements of many of the churches are "pardonable" in their "vulgarity and flippancy" and adds: "It seems to me that the very principles are applied here as elsewhere, without the same effect. Every trick of successful advertising in other departments imitated, but in no single case is the imitator ever so clever as the original; in fact, it is often clever at all." To quote further:

"There are some special things, perhaps half a dozen, upon each one of which, in particular, stress is laid in the hope that it will attract congregation. In one whole group, for example, all the emphasis is laid upon the music. . . . Matters continue much as they were in the dedication of Nebuchadnezzar's image: people are bidden to 'fall down and worship' what time they hear the sound of the conch flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, all kinds of music." One notice refers to a "new organ," another mentions a "string quartet and organ," another boasts of "string instruments and a chorus choir"; and some "famous quartet will be present and sing; somewhere else 'the music will be under the direction of Professor X, and the singing will be by Madam Q, the favorite soprano, who is still a third place, 'Herr B, the distinguished cornetist, will perform.' One church advertises 'cellist and contralto,' another 'imported tenor,' another a 'basso solo' and still another the fact that there will be 'violin music and euphonious solos,' what they may be."

From the group of "musical" notices, which the name of the preacher does not appear at all, the writer passes on to a consideration of the type in which the minister's address and the subject of his address are given, and in a subordinate position, and finally to the most important features. He continues:

"As regards the actual texts themselves, here are some instances taken at random and set forth in terms of their literal wording. They are all genuine. Not one is my own invention. I could not have invented them had I tried. I am not all sure that I got all were singular, nor even that I have chosen the most startling; for, by the time that I read the list half through nothing any longer looked strange or surprising. When I got out of their setting this is how they looked printed: 'Seeking Grass for Mules and Oxen in Elijah'; 'A Great Guff Fixed, one series of Trumpet Blast Addresses'; 'New Said unto David, 'Thou Art the Man'; 'The Crack Detective'; 'Out of the Frypan into the Fire: A Study of a Recent Suicide.'"

"In most cases where 'subjects' are announced without texts the subject is either ambiguous as to suggest nothing definite or it is so large and general that one is dragged into the discussion of it almost anywhere. "Those that are very large are often overwhelming. For example: 'The Metaphysics of Sociology,' 'The Changes That Have Taken Place in Christianity in the Past Eighteen

*Now not a few.—Ed.

Years. 'What About the Human Race? Men and Women.' Sometimes they are beliering, as, for example, 'An Interview with a Noted Scientist of 900 B. C.' Sometimes they are startling, as, 'The Persistence of Life.' Sometimes they are intended to be practical, as, 'How to Succeed: Get a Good Job (Stick to it)'. Sometimes they even contain pign words and phrases; for instance, a missionary address on 'The Eastern Question (Combien?)' And here is one I do not quite know how to classify, 'Justification, Adoption, Sanctification, with blackboard diagrams.' Special services of special kinds—"from the Feasts and Seances to Carnivals and Festivals"—suggest the following paragraph:

Nothing is either too sacred or too silly to make an 'occasion.' The sacrament of the Lord's Supper is made a function to which 'all cordially invited'; efforts to pay debts are made into 'jubilees'; baptism is advertised as 'spectacle,' while Sunday-schools, Bible classes, and prayer meetings are merest pastimes. There are also varied performances, such as with the aid of a magic lantern, one of which is described as 'intensely dramatic and interesting,' another as 'unique and delightful entertainment,' while still a third has 'an active program with unique features.' Sprite among these during the past year have been the reproduction of scenes from the Motion Play and 'Everyman,' concerning which the theory seems to be that the play's the thing wherein I'll catch the conscience of the crowd."

What earthly purpose can this "yellow pulpit" serve? asks the writer. "The purpose seems to be twofold," he says, "one part of it is honest and one part dishonest." The first is to acquaint the public, by legitimate means, with the hours and places of worship, the names of the preachers and the nature of the service. The second and much more obvious purpose is to "draw a crowd" by means which do not mind "the tone of a street-hawker in front of a dime museum, of which the leading features are braggadocio and dishonesty." The writer concludes:

There are those who urge that it is impossible to arouse the attention of the multitude by ordinary means and that therefore it is permissible to use any means at first to bring us into a position where they may hear something that in itself is really edifying. Ah, but—well, that simply will not work. The reason here lies in the fact that when such an aim is made to justify a means the process proceeds any farther than the means. The sole who come to what they think is going on is a circus are not going to be put off—at least never a second time—with a serious sermon. A crowd can not be collected by a showman's tricks and then appealed to with the solemn truth of God."

It is not only the eye along the sight, but the ear along the sound, which rips up the curtain of the target; it is not only our good intentions, but the spiritual force within the word which brings Christ and his kingdom down into the midst of men.

The passage from the letter to the spirit of the Lord is going on in all churches as fast as preparation is made for it.

Am I my brother's keeper? let it suffice for me that I look to myself, and that my own family is in tolerable order, is a language that too much prevails. But, Oh! that you had the cause of God more at heart! that you were more engaged to gather the people; that you might, with a Fatherly care, overlook those whose minds at present resemble the barren desert, the uncultivated wilderness; that you might comfort and encourage them that tread the gloomy scenes of an adverse allotment, as it were, cut off from every joy, and alive to each painful sensibility; how would it comfort many of these, if an experienced friend was now and then to drop into their families, and at times speak a word, in the opening of Divine Wisdom, suitable to their several states; I believe it would be a great means of gathering the people. Why should your care be circumscribed within the narrow limits of your own families? (although they should certainly be well regulated,) but you might be more extensively serviceable, if thus engaged in the care of the household of God. I am persuaded that the Divine Wing would be over you, and that a blessing would attend your labors. It is not a time for us to dwell unconcerned in our ceiled houses, when the house of God lies waste! We have, many of us, the same tender connexions as you; I myself have the same endearing attachments as some of you, the same ties of domestic love, and perhaps am as deeply sensible of all their force, as some of you; not less attentive to every relative and social duty, than some of you; my nature is not harsh, my principles much less so; yet I am made willing to leave all, to come and labor with you, if so be I might be instrumental to rouse any to a more arduous pursuit of their everlasting interest; and I can freely acknowledge with humble thankfulness, that I never more fully experienced my peace to flow as a river; never could with greater joy say, Return, Oh my soul, to the place of thy rest, for the Lord thy God hath dealt bountifully with thee! than when I have been thus engaged in extensive private labors; visiting the sick; reviving the sorrowful; encouraging the disconsolate; strengthening the weak; watching over and carefully admonishing the giddy, incautious youth; and I doubt not but you would have the reward of peace in your own bosoms, if, as heads of the society, you were more often thus employed in endeavoring to gather the people.

Sanctify the congregation; assemble the elders. I have been deeply concerned to see some of the elders so deficient in filling the line of Divine appointment. If they were more frequently engaged to assemble under the holy influence of that power in which they should move, they would many of them be commanded to blow the trumpet in Zion; but I know of no state harder to speak to, or more difficult to reach, than that of an elder whose mind is overgrown by the earthly nature; Oh! earth, earth, earth! hear the word of the Lord! I do not recollect any other instance in sacred writ, where attention is demanded in a similar manner: Oh! earth, earth, earth, thus thrice repeated, plainly signifying the great difficulty there is in reaching to those who are, as it were, buried in the earth, whose minds are fixed in it.

Gather the children. You that have the rising youth under your care, let me call upon you, let me entreat you, to gather the children; gather them from all the bewitching, enticing allurements of the world; gather their attention to that of God in their own minds. Oh! how have I secretly mourned, to see the poor children so sorrowfully neglected! so unprotected! so much estranged to that holy divine principle, which would so exceedingly beautify and enrich them! but, alas! how few parents are rightly qualified to teach their children the law of Divine love! to instill into their tender minds proper sentiments; to cultivate upon them those impressions that would be of everlasting advantage; and if the children, when the gracious visitation of the Father of mercies moves upon their hearts, warming and animating them with a love of virtue, raising the secret sigh, and hegeting desires after heaven and holiness; O say, if the children should then ask the negligent parent—"What is the secret something which I feel? this principle which impresses my mind with the love of virtue? what is it? what value shall I set upon it?" How, then, can you give them suitable instruction? you cannot teach them obedience to its sacred dictates, when your own example speaks a language quite opposite: Oh! why should the Sea Monster draweth forth the breast to her young, but the daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostrich in the wilderness, that leaveth her eggs in the sand to be hatched by the beams of the sun, and considereth not that the foot of the passenger may crush them!"—"the daughter of my people hath left her tender offspring to the uncertainty of being accidentally benefited, or I should rather say, to the mercy of God, unasked, unsought, exposed to all the dangers of a dreary wilderness, unaided, unassisted by the care of a natural parent! The tongue of the sucking child cleaveth to the roof of its mouth for thirst! the children ask bread, and there is none, in many families, to break it; they want to be nourished by the sincere milk of the word, but, alas! the daughter of my people is become cruel! Oh, you parents! you delegated shepherds! what account will you have to render, when the Lord of the whole earth ariseth to make inquisition for blood!

Bear with me, my beloved friends; flattery and smooth tales may please fools, but they will not please Him whom I desire to serve in the gospel of his Son. All that is within me is moved, while I thus earnestly expostulate with you on behalf of the dear children; suffer me to entreat you, for God's sake, for your own soul's sake, for the sake of the cause of truth, gather the children and those that suck the breast; those that are filling themselves with the world's consolation, with the intoxicating pleasures and amusements of a degenerate age; wean them from these delights; gather them to a knowledge of themselves, to a sense of the mercies that are offered them by the great Author of Mercies, ancient and new. While thy servant was busied hither and thither, the man made his escape, was the vain excuse of the officer to whose custody a certain captive was committed, with this charge, take care of this man till I come, and if thou let him go, thy life shall go for his life. No plea of other engagements, nor even the want of ability to discharge our duty towards our offspring, will stand us in any stead; if, when the Almighty queries with us—“What hast thou done with those Lambs I left under thy care in the wilderness, those tender offspring I gave thee in charge?” We have, through neglect, through unwatchfulness, suffered him or her to go, but we shall most certainly stand accountable for his or her life. I said want of ability, because I assuredly believe that want of ability will be so far from a palliation of the crime, that it will rather increase our condemnation! I can plead want of ability to him who is always ready to furnish us with it, if we are but willing to receive it at his hand?

I am of opinion, respecting many of our youth, that if they had been properly instructed, and carefully watched over; if they could have seen the beauty of holiness shine in the example of their parents, they would not have gone out so widely as they have. Oh, you parents of both sexes! an important trust is reposed in you! Example your children in the practice of piety; example speaks louder; much louder than precept; its influence is far more extensive. And while, on the one hand, you are excited to a faithful discharge of your duty towards them, by the certain hope of a glorious reward; so, on the other hand, the powerful ties of natural affection, the warm solicitude for the happiness of those you love, must stir up to diligence in the work and service appointed you.

Gather the children. If, after your attentive care has been employed for their preservation; if, after, by the forceful voice of example, you have called them to the perfecting of holiness in the fear of God, they will go, they will turn aside into the by-ways and crooked paths of sin and iniquity, they must stand by their own choice; you have [done your part to] redeem your souls, and will be found in your lots at the end of time, a ponderous crown awaits you; you will close your eyes, and open them to the boundless fruition of unmixed joy, in a happy eternity!

We do sometimes with sorrow observe the unwearied labors of a parent's love, bestowed without the desired effect; it is mournful to see children pierce with bitterness and anxiety the breast that has been their support in their infantile years; to fill that eye with sorrow, that has dropped over them the tear of maternal fondness; it is a cruel thing for a child to mangle gall and wormwood, in the cup of a parent descending to the grave; let us be assured, that their own portion of gall and wormwood will be doubly increased thereby, in the solemn hour of just retribution! But, oh, beloved youth! I earnestly desire that you may never thus widely deviate from the paths of rectitude; it is on you that the hope of the present age must shortly devolve; may you wisely choose an early submission to the holy discipline of the cross of Christ, that you may come up as an army for God. Consider the uncertainty of your stay here; consider the important business of life; and let the love of every unprofitable delight be swallowed up in the arduous pursuit of glory, honor, immortality and eternal life. We are daily instructed by the powerful eloquent language of mortality; death invades all ranks, snatches those of all ages from the busy stage of life; she that was yesterday surrounded with nuptial joys, must to-morrow be confined within the cold enclosure of the silent grave! Let the bridegroom go forth of his chamber, and the bride out of her closet! let the young, the joyous, those that are in the bloom of life, leave every thing that tends to retard their progress towards the city of the saints' solemnity; let them relinquish their most exalted satisfactions, rather than neglect to lay hold on the joys of God's salvation; which are unutterably more desirable than all the sin-pleasing gratifications that this world can bestow.

Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord sweep between the porch and the altar; this should not be confined to those only, whose mouths may be opened publicly amongst you, for it belongs to all those who preach to others by the regularity of a Godly life and conversation; although we are favored with a living ministry of divine appointment, who dare not fill the ears of men with a repetition of unfelt truths, nor amuse them with the unprofitable productions of an empty mind, but are concerned to discharge themselves faithfully, as stewards of the mysteries of God, yet let them be joined by all those that mourn for the desolation of Zion; by all that wish peace within her walls, and prosperity within her palaces, let us weep between the porch and the altar, saying, Spare thy people, O Lord! and give not thy heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over them! wherefore should they say among the people, where is their God? If we are thus unitedly engaged on behalf of our Israel, it may be that the Lord will again be jealous over his land, with an holy jealousy, for I cannot think that a people whom He has raised by his own invincible power, and so signally placed his Name amongst, were ever designed to be only the transient glory of a couple of centuries; I am still revived by a secret hope of better times, when our Zion shall again put on her beautiful garments; and as in her, and with her, shall arise judges as at the first, and counselors and lawgivers as at the beginning; let us weep between the porch and the altar; let us intercede for the people, that the land may yet be spared! the gracious ear of our heavenly Father is still open to the supplications of his children, and I believe He will yet be jealous over his land and pity his people. The time approaches, when the great dasher in pieces will more and more come up amongst us, and may all who are broken by Him, wait to be healed by the arising of his love; I shall not live to see it, but I live in the faith, and I believe I shall die in the faith, that the Lord of Hosts will yet beautify the place of his feet, that our Zion will yet become an eternal exchequer, and Jerusalem the praise of the whole earth.

Let us weep between the porch and the altar, with unwearied intercession, for the Lord will yet be jealous over his land, and pity his people. The bowels of adorable compassion yet yearn over his children, with all the tenderness of a Father's love. How shall I give thee up, O Ephraim! How shall I make thee as Admah, and set thee as Zeboim! How shall I cut thee off from being a people before me? By this moving and pathetic language, would the great Father of the Universe, induce you to return to the Arms of everlasting Mercy! And if we, who are placed as watchmen in Zion, faithfully discharge the trust reposed in us, we shall make instrumental in gathering the scattered and dispersed sheep, from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south to the great Shepherd, to the one Shepherd, and finally obtain an admittance into the glorious mansions, where the morning at join in singing hallelujahs; and where all sons of God forever shout for joy!

Now, unto the King Eternal, immortal, invisible, the only GOD, be honor and praise for ever and ever!

FOR THE FRIEND

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Year Meeting.

By far the larger part of the Indians refused to emigrate at that time and remained in State of New York, some however removed the tract of land above referred to, when it is said many of them failed to receive the deed to which they were entitled under the treaty and suffered extreme poverty, and after having been compelled to subsist mainly on the charity of the tribes by which they were surrounded gradually disappeared. Many complaints were received at the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at Washington, in consequence of these events, and the Commission in 1862 called attention to them in his annual report for that year; with the statement of his belief that the Indians who had not removed had a just claim against the United States, suggested legislative action for the settlement not only of this claim, but also of the claims of those Indians who had failed to find in Kansas the undisturbed home and protection which they had been led to expect.

In 1857 an arrangement was made by the United States with the Tonawanda band of Senecas by which they relinquished their claims to the lands in Kansas under the treaty of 1825 and thus obtained the means to secure a fee simple to their Reservation in New York by the extinguishment of the claim of Thomas L. Ogden and Joseph Fellows, who at that time were the owners of the preemption right.

In 1864 an attempt was made to hold a treaty upon the Cattaraugus Reservation with the other tribes of New York Indians for the relinquishment of their claim which still remained against the United States, on account of the lands in Kansas, which by this time had been taken by the Government and sold to the white settlers. This attempt however was frustrated by the unwise action of the Indians, themselves who demanded that the Commissioner appointed by the Government should produce his credentials empowering him to act upon the occasion; a request which was peremptorily declined by the Commissioner, and who then abruptly closed the conference.

In a few years another attempt was made to effect a settlement of these claims by a treaty which was entered into on the Cattaraugus Reservation in the Twelfth Month 1868 by Walter R. Irwin the Commissioner appointed by the Government and the delegates appointed by the different tribes to represent them therein. The council of the Seneca Nation in view of this important conference requested the assistance of Friends, and at a special meeting of the Committee held Eleventh 1868, six of its members were named to present and to render such aid as they may be qualified to give, four of these Friends, viz: Thomas Wistar, Joseph Scattergood, James Whitbreads, and Ebenezer Worth attended the treaty, and conferred freely with both the Indians and the Commissioner in regard to the important subjects claiming their attention. On this occasion the claim of the Ogden Land Company caused a considerable expression of conflicting views. An attempt was made to include in the article relating to it, an agreement for the Indians to pay a large sum of money for its extinguishment. To this the Indians objected. For their objections there were several reasons. Not only did they feel that it was a claim incurred without any action on their part to cause it, and was therefore unjust, but that unjust as it was, it was many believed to be a protection to them against the cupidity of other white men, who would if this were removed, continually harass them, and very likely under one pretext or another obtain a part of their inheritance. In addition to this there was a general feeling prevailing among that part of the nation who were opposed to becoming citizens, that so long as this preemption right exists, the Indians must not be made citizens, or hold their property in fee. Hence they wished the preemption right to remain as it was as a safe-guard for their national existence; and would regret exceedingly to have it extinguished, until at least their people were better qualified to assume the rights and obligations of citizenship which they then were.

In consequence of these and similar sentiments, considerable difficulty occurred in the negotiations, but a modification of the original article relating to this subject was finally proposed which received the assent of the Indians. On this it was agreed that an appropriation from their funds in the hands of the Government of a sum not exceeding $25,000 for the extinguishment of the claim of the Ogden Land Company should be made, if the council of the Great Nation should in future so direct. The element of this subject removed the last obstacle to the conclusion of the treaty, and the instrument was duly signed.

The assistance which Friends rendered in reconciling the differing views was acknowledged both by the Commissioner and the Indians, and in their report of their proceedings the Committee these Friends state:—"that in their opinion the terms of the treaty are as liberal and fair as could have been expected under the circumstances, and it ratified with general satisfaction." This treaty though considered by the Committee of Indian affairs at Washington at different times, was not completed.

We share with Christians everywhere the same certainty that the power which has established this fabric of things is conscious and beneficent. Upon this foundation, in all ages, has rested the hope from which cometh life and nations every gift of noblest origin, and the hope of immortality. In virtue of this we claim our place in the ranks of those who, by whatever name they call themselves, are striving to bring in the kingdom of God, and that His will may be done on earth as it is in heaven.—Senator Hoar.

Science and Industry.

THE SOUTHERN APPALACHIAN FORESTS.—The portion of the Appalachian region under consideration extends from Virginia southward, and comprises parts of north and South Carolina, Tennessee and Georgia, between the Piedmont Plateau on the southeast and the Appalachian Valley on the northwest.

The distinctive factors which give value to this mountain region are a temperate and healthful climate, grand and varied scenery; a plentiful supply of cold water; abundant water power; mineral deposits of iron, copper, mica, talc, gold, corundum, precious stones, kaolin and other clays, and building stone; soils that are generally of good physical and chemical composition; and a vast extent of forest, principally of hardwood, consisting of 137 species of trees, many of which yield lumber and bark. Up to the present time these resources have been developed by individuals in a wasteful and unsatisfactory manner.

The original forest of this region, as indicated by the preserved remnants and by the accounts of old settlers and early explorers must have been wonderful in the extent, density, size and quality of its timber trees, and the variety of its species. The agencies that have wrought changes in these forests are fire, lumbering, clearing of lands for farming, and the grazing of cattle and sheep.

Evidence of forest fires is found over approximately 4,500,000 acres, or 80 per cent. of the entire area. Great damage has been done, year after year, by light fires that have scorched the roots of timber trees, destroyed seedlings so that the forest can not reproduce itself, consumed forest litter and humus, and reduced the thatch of leaves which breaks the force of the rain.

The lumberman is growing more active in this region, going every year farther into the forest. In most places, however, the continuity of the forest has not yet been broken, as only the most valuable of the trees have been taken out.

Surpassing both fire and lumbering in the completeness and permanency of the damage done is the clearing for ordinary agricultural purposes of mountain lands which are not worth cultivating and should forever remain in forest. A few years of cultivation usually exhausts these lands and they are soon abandoned. Denuded of their forests they are rapidly washed away.

Great damage is also done to the forest by grazing cattle. Young growth has been prevented, and the hardening of the ground and the removal of debris and humus have promoted a rapid run-off of rain and water and prevented its percolation into the ground as a reserve for dry times.

If the best methods of silviculture were applied at once, the remaining forest would undoubtedly yield handsome returns. The most pressing need of the region is railroads, which would make the timber accessible. The report on these forests is published by the Survey as Professional Paper No. 37, and may be obtained on application to the Director of the United States Geological Survey, Washington, D. C.

THE history of the Church cannot be traced in the history of sects.—Ex.

Items Concerning the Society.

The safe arrival of our friend, Joseph Elkinton, in Japan was reported last week.

Joel and Anna Cadbury sailed for England last Seventh-day, on account of the health of the former.

The Westonian publishes a very interesting article on the work of "Friends' Reading Circles" during the past winter. Besides four circles in Philadelphia and two in Germantown, there have been classes for the study of Friends' principles and history in Moorestown, Woodbury and Atlantic City, N. J.; in Wilmington, Del., and in Fallingtown, Chester, Downingtown, West Grove, Lansdowne, Westtown and Frankford, Pa.

"NAUTUCKET'S LAST QUAKER."—The death of Huldah H. Bonwill, eighty years old, has removed Nantucket's last resident Quaker, and the Society of Friends, which at one time supported two separate meeting-houses here, has perished from the island. She was one of the few living who actively engaged in the work of the Society of Friends in its efforts to ameliorate the condition of the Indians of Kansas and of Indian Territory a half-century ago.

To this statement, found in a Boston paper, it seems proper to add that the last native Quaker of Nantucket to be removed by death was Mary S. Mitchell, who died there in the summer of 1892, having been also, for some years, a winter resident of Philadelphia in the home of her children, Benjamin and Mary Ann Albertson. But the last resident Friends to leave their homes on the island were James Kite and his sister, in the past autumn; also his daughter Elizabeth and his four grand-children, whom, together with her aunt, Huldah H. Bonwill, she had cared for there. These left Nantucket subsequently to H. H. Bonwill's departure from it, who left them by medical care in a hospital, where she recently died. Quite lately her remains were removed to Nantucket for burial, and Joseph S. Elkinton of Philadelphia, and Job S. Gidley, of N. Dartmouth, attended that service.

Notes in General.

A letter from Rome says that the pope did not create the expected new cardinals lately for reasons of economy. They cost $5000 a year.

The total number of cases against Passive Resisters since the commencement of the movement now approaches near fifty thousand.

The first Friend reported as going to prison under the present Education Act in England was Samuel Southall, at Leeds, last month, on the 16th.

There are in the United States twenty-nine thousand and Indians unreached by any Christian missionary, and there are large tribes who still openly worship their ancestral idols.

Bishop Warne, of India, reports that in the two conferences of North and Northwest India there are 50,000 inquirers who cannot be baptized (!) because of the lack of trained workers trained to care for the applicants.

Campbell Morgan has appeared before the Crodon Bench as a "passive resister." In addressing a very large congregation at Westminster Chapel he gave his reasons for his action. He said: "I went there because I feel it absolutely impossible to contribute the money which belongs to my Lord and of which I am steward, to make it possible to teach the children of this country doctrines that I believe to be deadly and damnable heresies."

Henry H. Hamilton, of York, Maine, writes of the concern he feels for "Keeping New England Christian." He says that the chief distinction of New England has been that she was Christian, It will be her chief distinction in the future. The Christian home, the Christian church, the Christian school and a Christian society will be absolutely essential to have New England Christian and to keep her the power for good in our country and the world, that evidently in the providence of God was intended. Not even wealth, nor educational advantages, desirable as they are, will help New England to fulfil her highest mission.

KINSHIP IN RELIGION.—The following is written in a letter by Wade Koons, a missionary in Korea, to attest a similarity in the beliefs of the Alaskan Indians and the Koreans:—"A dozen of the men of a village attended church in Pyeng Yang, and when they went home they had a talk together and decided they must believe. To prove their genuineness they agreed to destroy the 'Jueesis' in their homes. You know how the Koreans reverence this spirit, which is propitiated from the day the first timber is set up for the building, and to whose favor it is due all domestic prosperity.

"It is devil-worship pure and simple. Mr. Jack London, when he was here last year, told me he had an exact parallel to this among the Alaskan Indians. At any rate, they fear and worship the spirit which lives in a dirty rag of paper nailed to the roof-beam of the house, and they make it various offerings and gifts. So the men yesterday made a pile of their fetiches and the objects connected therewith, and publicly burned the whole business. I saw the ashes, and was told the pile of stuff was as high as a man's shoulder. I went out to visit the village and learned about this movement. I visited homes where the people had not been ready to destroy their 'Jueesis' yesterday, and had the pleasure of seeing them thrown out and burned. We found a couple of places where the people had not made a clean sweep. One man had reserved the roof Jueesi, saying—"It is only a small thing; it won't make any difference." But Deacon Choi, a native, said: 'A little thing. So is an egg a little thing, but the first thing you know it hatches to a chicken that may become a big fowl. Tear that thing down and let's burn it. And they tore it down and destroyed it."

PROMOTION is often dangerous. Many a man who while living in obscurity and humble position lived unselfishly and walked with God, has become proud, vain, and selfish through promotion. His rise was a grievous fall. The honors of the world robbed him of the honor which cometh from God.—Christian Advocate.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the absence of the President from Washington, Secretary Taft acted as acting as the head of the government as respects foreign affairs.

It is stated from Washington that reports received from gold-bearing sections of the United States give promise that the aggregate production for the current year will exceed that of any previous year, and it is supposed amount to 100,000,000 miles are paved with asphalt; 374,388 miles with granite block; 144,118 miles with brick or other improved pavements, and 268,91 with "macadam." The paved streets of Philadelphia would make a continuous highway to Minneapolis. There are, beneath these streets, 1068,75 miles of sewers. There are also 1466,77 miles of water pipes. The streets are lighted by 10,469 electric arc lights, 21,743 gas lamps and 12,817 gasoline lamps.

In consequence of the danger of spreading spotted fever in the community the State Board of Health directed that the health authorities in Pennsylvania "shall immediately place or cause to be placed in a conspicuous place or places upon the house or premises in which such cases may be located a placard or placards upon which shall be printed in large letters the words "epidemic cerebro-spinal meningitis spotted fever and communicable disease." All persons are cautioned against entering these premises except by permission of the Board of Health."

On the 6th inst. snow fell at intervals in Gainesville, Ga., the only instance of snow falling in this month there of any amount.

The British steamship Manchester Corporation recently arrived at Philadelphia after encountering forty-three icebergs. For thirteen miles east and west of the steamship great ice-fields floated, the bergs towering above the water for from 50 to 100 feet.

One of the largest fossils has lately been set up in the American Museum of Natural History in New York. This is the complete skeleton of a prehistoric animal, known as broturosaur, of the lizard type, sixty-seven feet long and fifteen and a half high. It was discovered in 1897 in the central part of Wyoming. Some of the bones weigh from 600 to 1000 pounds each.

Previous to 1880 there were few olive trees in California outside of mission gardens, but in the year mentioned quantities of trees of the best Italian and French varieties were imported. It is now stated that parts of California are now vast olive orchards, and the indications are that in the not far distant future the State will supply a considerable and constantly increasing quantity of olives for export.

A reorganization of the Commissioners of the Panama Canal has been made. Theodore Shontz, Judge Magoon, and John F. Wallace will be chiefly responsible, but other Commissioners and a board of consulting engineers are to be associated with them. The question as to whether it will be a sea-level canal or not is to be yet decided. It is stated that the Commissioners propose to employ 30,000 to 40,000 laborers, and that they are looking towards Japan or China for the supply.

The acceptance of a gift of $100,000, which John D. Rockefeller has proposed to make to the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions, has awakened much interest as to the propriety of accepting it. In consequence of the connection of the donor with the Standard Oil Company. In protesting against receiving it certain clergymen urged "that the Church must not stand in compromising relation to a man who in public thought represents methods that are oppressive, dangerous and wrong; cannot disregard the effect of the association, which his name has given to the cause, is widespread and notorious, unfortunately carried with it. The Church cannot afford to enter into any relation that may weaken or discredit it in the fulfillment of its task."

There are in the United States over 2,000 Jewish farmers, men with families, representing more than 10,000 persons, profitably engaged in tilling American soil. The Jewish Agricultural and Aid Society has been helpful in promoting this movement in order to relieve the congestion in the Jewish quarters of large cities, particularly New York and Chicago, toward which city Jewish immigration is mainly directed. Three hundred and thirty-four Jewish farmers, representing 3,963 persons, have been organized in the United States to till the soil, and through perseverance and tireless industry have succeeded in making them profitable.

FOREIGN.—Despatches from London indicate that the bonds of the San Domingo Republic and those of certain South American countries have greatly advanced in price recently, and it is believed that President Roosevelt will intervene in some way to cause the large debt countries to pay their debts. This idea, it is said, has been confirmed by the remarks made in President Roosevelt's message to Congress and the utterances of Secretary Root when he said: "When we say to the Powers of the world you shall not push your remedies for wrongdoing upon the weak, you are really inviting to the occupation of territory, we are bound to say, wherever wrong cannot otherwise be redressed, we ourselves will see that it is redressed."

King Edward of England has recently visited President Loubet in Paris. Emperor William has had an interview with Victor Emanuel, the King of Italy on board the yacht belonging to the former at Naples, during a voyage of the German Emperor in the Mediterranean.

A general uprising is feared in Russia, in consequence of popular discontent. In the Caucasus rioting by the peasants is reported. A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 5th says: "Official circles are unreservedly wrong, but the great majority of Russia remain opposed to war. The peace sentiment is particularly strong in Moscow and the provinces. The Bourse Gazette publishes the result of an investigation among the business houses of St. Petersburg, showing declines of 30 to 40 per cent. in business. The peasants are unable to grasp the meaning of the war. Special correspondents sent by Ross newspapers to visit the provinces all relate the same story. The peasants invariably ask what the war is about and when it will end. Russian statesmen who consider the situation calmly and dispassionately see nothing is to be gained by prolonging the struggle."

A general meeting of the representatives of the big schools of Russia at Moscow has adopted a series of resolutions demanding a revision of the whole educational system, and a new freedom of teaching and of universities from Government control and declaring for constitutional regime.

It is stated that the total Russian losses in killed and wounded and prisoners at the battle of Mukden, 107,000.

Russia is reported to be making preparations to enlarge numbers of troops to the far East.

Another despatch says: "The stories of suffering and death of the widows, wives and families of soldier the front are attracting general attention, and the pe demands Government aid for the sufferers. The charities are no longer able to cope with the situation. In many places the funds raised for this purpose are entirely exhausted, and the provincial papers are filled with pathetic accounts of starving mothers and children living in the streets."

A despatch of the 5th from Lahore, India, says: "W spread disaster was caused by yesterday's earthquake and great loss of life is reported from Kashmir, Dakh, Dehraun, Patna and Malabar. Thousands of people are reported to have been killed.

Earthquake shocks were felt in Antigua and a others of the West India islands about the 1st inst.

The falling down of a reservoir used to supply water to certain parts of Madrid has caused widespread in and loss of life that city.

A despatch from Berlin of the 6th says: "Spotted fever has been raging for several months in epidemic form in Silesia. Much alarm exists among the people, especially the laboring population, and many have fled from district. The disease is beginning to make its appearance in other parts of the country."

DIED. at her home in Germantown, Philadelphia, September 28th, 1905, ANNA SPENCER, in the seventy-fourth year of her age; a member of Abington Monthly Horsham Pastoral Meetings. She was greatly beloved by her immediate friends and relatives, while to those with whom she came in contact she evinced a sympathy and self-sacrificing spirit that were very attractive. long and trying sickness was borne with great patience and cheerfulness, and her child-like submission to the will of God was sweetly apparent through all. As the drew near she was spared acute suffering, and we were especially beloved peacefully into her eternal rest.

—, on the nineteenth of Third Month, 1905, a home in West Branch, Iowa, WILLIAM D. BRANSON, dear aged father in Israel was born Fourth Month, 1814, being nearly ninety-one years of age. Was a long member of the Society of Friends, and at the time of his death was an esteemed member of West Branch Monthly Meeting of conservative Friends. He was firmly attached to our principles as he early and early, and upheld them unflinchingly; was a meek and quiet spirit, and a bright and shining light in the world. He was quite frail in body for some years before the close, but spiritually bright, and retained faculties in a remarkable degree to the last. He expressed a belief that he was near, and remained to one who visited him a few days before his death he had full faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and he resigned to his will and time. His often repeated the words of the Psalmist that "Once I was young, now I am old and I never saw the righteous forsaken or his seed cut off." We who knew him felt that he was right, and has been gathered as a shock of corn fully ripe into his heavenly garner, and that the text of Scripture quoted so often was applicable, "Blessed are the dead who rest in the Lord; yea, saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

Session of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting for 1905.

Two hundred and twenty-fourth sitting of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting began on Sunday the 17th instant, and was preceded on the seventh-day by a Meeting of Ministers and Elders in which all the representatives were present, and several attenders from other Yearly Meetings. An unusual outpouring of the Holy Spirit began early in the sitting and was continued also through the business session. Especially interesting was the account given on the returning of the credentials of Wm. C. Allen, whose companion was Wm. Harvey, for religious service on the islands of Porto Rico and Barbados, a sketch of which has already been given from week to week in our columns. This brought much cheering and thankfulness over the meeting, and much earnest expression. It was readily acknowledged in view of the favors which attended such a meeting, that this was "no common thing."

Second-day, 17th.—Following a season of devotion in worship, the doings of the Meeting for Sufferings representing the work of the Yearly Meeting during the past year were reported.

Appropriations had been made from the Dymond Fund, of $400 for two meetings, and a building to be built, one in Rich Square and one in Marlboro, North Carolina.

Attention having been called to the awful responsibility assumed in the taking of human life, whether legally or illegally, including the murders of lynching, and a committee having been set apart to produce, if way opened, an address on this subject, one had been prepared and approved, and printed to the number of 5,400. Most of these having been distributed to persons of influence, including men connected with legislatures and government, the courts and religious press, boards of trade, and representatives of religion, some very encouraging letters of appreciation had been received, indicating that the publication has been timely, and that it has strengthened and enlightened many.

Special meeting had been called on account of the appalling state of vice and immorality reported as tolerated in the city of Philadelphia, and a committee was appointed to wait on the Mayor on this account. These attended to the service immediately, were courteously received and given full opportunity to lay before him the concern of this meeting, and to express the exercise of their minds on his behalf, and for the witness for truth and righteousness as the standard of a government that should exalt the character of the city.

On account of bills before the State Legislature aimed at frustrating the good service of associations carried on to assist the laws in the suppression of vice, a committee had proceeded to Harrisburg, and had an attentive and respectful hearing accorded them by the Governor. They also conversed with members of the Legislature on the subject. Widespread opposition in the community has also been a factor, it is believed, in leading to the final failure of these bills to become laws.

Through the Willits Fund an average of 3,269 copies of the African's Friend have been distributed in Liberia, and 2,443 in the Southern States. Testimonials of good done by this reading matter have been very encouraging.

The Committee in charge of interests of the Doukhobors had found no way open properly to apply funds in their hands for the work of Education among that people. Prudence seemed to dictate the holding of the funds at interest until a right opening appeared for their use. The present material prosperity attained by that people without learning seems to foster the idea that school education is not needed.

The Book Committee reported a distribution of 1786 volumes and 13,305 pamphlets,—1265 volumes of these, and 12,581 pamphlets gratuitously, at a cost of $839.87. The reprints issued were Memorials of Debbie E. Cope, of Charles Rhoads, and of William U. Ditzler, Dymond on War, Dymond on Morality, in Spanish; and Letters of Isaac Pennington. There were printed also 15,040 copies of the Address on the Sacredness of Human Life, and 1500 copies of the Catalog of Books for sale. The cost of producing all these has been $932.64.

The visit of Wm. C. Allen and Wm. B. Harvey to Porto Rico and Barbados gave unusual opportunity for the distribution of our literature. Dymond's Essays, in Spanish, were especially welcomed in Porto Rico, and letters showing deep appreciation of the work were received from men of influence in Honduras, Costa Rica, Venezuela, Chili, Paraguay. Gifts of our publications to several libraries, to interested parties in France, and distant parts of our own country were reported. The Elisha Roberts Fund for disseminating our publications, particularly among the young, has been thankfully appreciated.

The following are among the characterizations of Dymond's Essays received from Spanish-

American countries:—"It breathes throughout morality in its highest form." "It is with deep interest I have read this notable work intended to spread the high and sublime principles of Christianity, which deserve the greatest admiration and warmest support." "It is a very valuable book for a Christian of every kind. It is truth, truth difficult to practice, it is true, considering the multitude of prejudices in which we have been educated, but towards which every disciple of Christ ought to strive, cost what it may."

The reading of the varied labors of the Meeting for Sufferings brought out much expression of unusual, some would say unprecedented, appreciation of their value and interest. The pains taken to obviate unsound legislation were learned of with gratitude and encouragement that we had watchmen on the towers round about; and perhaps the major part of the session was taken up with considerations arising from hearing the report of the extension and appreciation abroad of Friends' literature, and with warnings against undermining the faith of our families by receiving as periodicals journals which, though most ably conducted and giving in the most convenient and informing way the world's history of the successive weeks, yet are tinctured or boldly replete with insidious and open expression on religion and the Scriptures, tending to destroy the faith and poison the spiritual life of many. Some desires were expressed for a periodical conducted by Friends which should contain the merits and none of the demerits of these harmful weeklies. But most earnest were the exhortations to drink deeply of such literature as John Churchman's, Thos. Chalkley's, George Fox's, John Woolman's, and Stephen Grellet's Journal, and Penn's "No Cross, No Crown;" and not to disappoint inquirers who would expect to see in us true representatives of such literature.

Beyond these proceedings of Second-day, we can place in print none until next week's number.

AMID all the strife of tongues over words and names in realms theological and critical, is it not well to remember that there is in the world a Being, pervading, omnipotent, all-wise, who is able to lead into all the truth those who seek his guidance? The Holy Spirit is a factor in all religious controversy. Eliminate Him we cannot. The question for us is, Shall we, or shall we not, follow his leadership? Those who accept his guidance will be led into the light; those who refuse it will be baffled and thwarted by their own misapprehension of the truth.—The Examiner.

HEAVEN is your home, therefore often think about it; tribulation is your lot, therefore daily expect it.

Market Street Meeting-House.

An interesting historical picture has recently come to light in the Coates family, which it is believed shows a part of the interior of one of the Meeting-houses at the corner of Market and Second Sts., perhaps that built in 1695 and removed in 1755.

This picture is painted on glass, twelve by fifteen inches in size, and is apparently in a meeting-room in which the ceiling ran up to the roof. This makes it probable that the room shown was in the meeting-house which was removed in 1755, and indicates that the picture was painted before that date.

The ministers' gallery and second gallery, as we are accustomed to call it, are both well depicted, and the scene represented is apparently that just after breaking up of meeting. Three figures are shown, one of them about eight inches in height, and the others of somewhat shorter men. The first is just descending from the gallery, and holding out his right hand as if to shake hands with some one on the floor of the meeting. He is dressed in drab clothes, with a very long coat, knee breeches, and buckles on his shoes. He is without hat, but has a large wig, which overlaps his shoulders. The other two figures are standing in the ministers' gallery, facing each other and shaking hands. Both have canes, and their clothing appears somewhat darker than that of the other figure, though of similar style. Both are wearing large hats with drooping brims, and possibly wigs.

The picture is in admirable state of preservation, most of the colors being bright, and fairly fresh, and the faces so well depicted as to be easily recognizable by any person who had known them.

The picture is one of rare interest and value from a historical point of view.

I have been unable to obtain any clue to who the persons represented are. There was formerly attached to the picture a written description, but in the course of time this has disappeared, and it is feared that the information it contained is irrecoverably lost.

GEORGE VAUX.

SUCCESS HINDERED BY WEALTH.—A boy's character must be exceptionally strong when he is earnest in his endeavors to make a man of himself and to attain some worthy object in life, despite the fact that he knows there is no necessity for him to work to gain those results. The feeling that he can have whatever he wants without any special effort upon his own part, is most demoralizing. It saps his energy and may even make him inconsiderate of others who are less fortunately circumstanced than himself. American life furnishes few examples of sons of rich men who have distinguished themselves in any way that was creditable to them; while it offers thousands of cases of men who have risen from the greatest obscurity to the highest position and to great wealth. No one can suppose that we would assert that wealth need be a barrier to success in other things; for, if wisely used, it can be of material assistance in smoothing the road to a great reputation; but it is in no way essential, and may even prove a hindrance, instead of a stimulant.

The Cruise of the "Arabic."

En route to Naples.

Third Month 21st, 1905.—Our cruise is nearing the end and this will finish up my journal letters. Time has been short for a proper treatment of the great sights we have seen and I haven't tried to give you more than a hint of what we were doing each day, but it has certainly made an indelible impression on our minds. I confess we left Jerusalem without regret. It was all so different from our expectations and to cap the climax, it rained most of the time. We did have two perfect days so that we know what the climate is like under favorable conditions. The cultivated plains were in their spring-time freshness and the great patches of flowers were indeed pleasing to the eye. The ride from Jerusalem to Jaffa presents a dreary contrast until the Plains of Sharon are reached and the great orange groves near Jaffa. The sea was not rough, but the rocks looked dangerous enough when we rowed to the ship. Those boatmen are such a villainous looking lot that I felt my first fear on the water. We reached Alexandria early, Third Month 15th, and found the harbor full of shipping. The beacon light was interesting to me as the direct descendant of the first lighthouse in the world. The English control things here as sort of Trustee for other countries, though nominally the Sultan rules through the Khedive. Everything seemed very European with the Oriental combined and the ride to Cairo was most interesting. The cultivated strips of land run like a ribbon along the valley of the Nile and the irrigating wells worked by the oxen or camels were very picturesque. We reached Cairo in about four hours and were glad to get into a hotel once more. On our way from the station a wheel came off the omnibus and let us down, but nothing broke and no one was hurt. Cairo is perfectly fascinating, reminding one of Paris with the oriental dash of costume, camels from the desert, and people from all countries.

Third Month 16th.—Our first morning was spent at the Pyramids. The drive was lovely, starting at 8.30 from the hotel, through the city to the Nile bridge, which we crossed, and then five or six miles through a beautiful avenue of locust trees. The trolley on one side reminded us continually of modern civilization, but we constantly passed caravans of camels loaded with various commodities. The funny little wagons with whole families, with women in the ugly Egyptian veil and carrying babies astride their shoulders, donkeys of every size, and occasionally the "smart" trap of some European attracted us. As the day advanced the heat became intense and by the time we reached the pyramids we felt the full force of the sun's rays. A donkey was necessary for the last hill as the desert sand was not easy to walk in. Some rode camels, but we took the donkey. I'll not attempt to describe these wonders of the world. The largest pyramid Cheops is 451 feet high, and it is said took one hundred thousand men twenty years to build. The Sphinx is quite as wonderful, and in the Temple we saw one granite slab 16 feet long. The pillars are of alabaster. There is a fine hotel near the Pyramids, called the Mena House, and we stopped there to rest and get some refreshment. It is a very fashionable and popular winter resort. We returned to the hotel in time for luncheon and at 2.30 were driven to the Museum. The Royal Mummies excited most of our interest but they are not very cheery exhibits. Each Empire is represented beginning with the ancient 2800 to 2200 B. C. an ending with the new empire 1600-1100 B. C. and it is a most remarkable exhibit. "Eve six thousand years ago when the great pyramids were built Egypt had a written language, a grammar, literature, religion, school of Art, knowledge of mathematics and of the mechanical arts and an established hierarchy and social system." After the museum we drove independently to the telegraph office and the we drove through the bazaars.

Third Month 17th.—In the morning we were driven to the Mosque of the Sultan Hassan that most interesting as still breathing the spirit of old Cairo. It is quite a ruin but is being restored. From the citadel we obtained a magnificent view. The new and old cities, the river and the valley of the Nile with the great palms, and in the distance the pyramid of Memphis and of course the Gizeh pyramid all make a striking picture. The way back through the Bazaars and we saw many beautiful rugs and embroideries that we should have liked to buy. In the afternoon we visited old Cairo and the Coptic Church, which is very ancient and interesting, though the Copts are fast going over to the Mohammedan faith. Also the tombs of the Caliphs which are elaborate and gaudy things erected in the Thirteenth and Sixteenth centuries were to be seen. Last but not least was the island Roda where Moses was found in the bulrushes. We were ferried across in a little old boat. There is quite a fine garden and it is quite pretty. The Old Nilometer dating from 7 A. D. is situated here. The men filling the goat skins and the women their jars made quite a picturesque scene on the shores of the Nile.

Third Month 18th.—We formed a company drive independently to see the Obelisk (Helipolis). Starting about 8.30 after leaving the city we soon passed troops of the Khedive's soldiers waiting to escort him into the city. We finally saw him coming in a carriage and our carriages were driven to one side to let him pass. We photographers improved the occasion. The grounds and palace occupy a large area and everything seemed in perfect order. It was a lovely drive all the way. This is the place that the obelisks in Central Park and the one on the Thames embankment were taken from, but they rested at Alexandria seventeen hundred years on the way! This is the obelisk of the Bible and this remaining obelisk was built in the time of Abraham at least five thousand years ago. It is a solid piece of granite sixty-five feet high. On our return we stopped at an ostrich farm where there were several thousand birds. We saw them the days old up. Each female lays eight eggs. The males resented our intrusion, but we got several snap-shots. We also saw on the farm the Sudanese cow but failed to get a picture. In the afternoon we visited some of the hotels and finished up our shopping.

Third Month 19th.—We decided to go to the ship and so avoid the rush in the morning. One of our drago men having heard me inquire about the University several times offered to take me before leaving. It was a striking sight, all students sitting in groups on the floor studying loud and swaying their bodies backward and forward. Some were eating breakfast and a water-carrier was going in and out among them. It is said there are six thousand students and it is the great official University of Mohammedanism. Of course we had to put on slippers to go in, and pay a fee of ten cents. The teachers are not paid but are given their food! Tuition is also free. It is the ambition of every Mohammedan to be a priest some day. They are very devout and several times a day I near a minaret you hear the call to prayer. We left Cairo at 12 o'clock and had a most comfortable ride to Alexandria. On the way from the station to the boat our horse fell flat and gave us quite a scare. The man finally got it up and we proceeded in safety to the ship.

Third Month 20th.—The large party reached to ship in time and we set sail after luncheon. It was a beautiful sight, the water was so many colors, green and lovely shades of blue, and the blue hues in the sky! They would have been thought unnatural in a painting. The usual sight of steamers, the people cheering as the port went down the narrow ladder, all added to a most inspiring scene. We feel sorry to leave such an interesting country, but we have Rome before us, and then home! We realize that we are to rush across Europe, but it is the best we can do and reach New York by the twentieth.

Third Month 21st.—It is lovely to-day. The Mediterranean is blue and covered with white clouds. I forgot to mention passing the wreck of a steamer as we left Alexandria. She struck the rock in without a pilot and is a total loss. We heard of it before we left Jerusalem.

Third Month 22nd.—Sea has quieted down and it is more pleasant on deck. We are trying to arrange to take the trip to Capri and Sorrento and the Amalfi drive while in Naples. Are by packing our trunks to send around to Liverpool. It is difficult to get things in small space. It being the last night we all would have dinner on board, we had what they call the Captain's dinner with a special menu card as a souvenir. Since dinner, Dr. Thompson, of New York, lectured on Rome. At sunset we had a view of Mt. Aetna our first active volcano. We passed the straits of Messina, and are in Naples in the morning.

Third Month 23rd.—We are now entering the bay and have had our first look at Vesuvius. Unfortunately 'his raining and the view is somewhat spoiled. We dislike to leave our good ship Arabic, but the time is drawing near. Farewell.

The greatest defect in the modern religion of the churches is, there is too much of man in it; it is too easily comprehended; it is only on a level with brains, and on a par with mere human ideas; it does not strike outward and downward into fathomless infinities. The best part of religion is that which transcends the limits of human reason and moves upon us and through us with incomprehensible force. The cleansing fullness of the Spirit is never contradictory to reason, only it sweeps out a thousand leagues beyond all brain-measuring boundaries—passeth the limits of understanding. The glory of God shining in a purified never stultifies the reason as sin does, but captivates it and holds all the brain forces in harmony with Truth.—Geo. D. Watson.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"With What Measure Ye Mete it shall be Measured to You Again."

How often in the course of life may we see some of the various scripture declarations verified, and at times even to our admiration. The writer, having occasion recently to visit and spend a day in a neighboring village to transact some business, a place from which he and his family had removed a few years back, was surprised to notice the kindness and marked show of respect while there from all persons met with, and had to notice that some, evidently in that feeling, varied from their usual form of "Mr.," and in a respectful manner gave him the first name.

This caused him to look back over a number of years, to the time of his first coming to that place, and how he and his family then fared. From a feeling of requirement they endeavored to demean themselves consistently as becomes Friends. This caused our being objects of notice, and, for a short time, of scolding remarks. But as the same feeling which actuated to consistency of speech and apparel was taken heed to, it preserved our minds above any unpleasantness of feeling toward the individuals, or on account of the remarks or names they, in derision, put upon us, only hoping that we were in a measure worthy, even as our forefathers, of the name of Quakers, and in a degree willing to undergo reproach for the doctrines and testimonies of Truth held by that people. It happened, a few days after our coming to that place, that a relative calling to see us, and not knowing which house, inquired for the person who had previously occupied our residence, and was answered, "There is the house, but Quakers live there now." However, feeling kindly to all, and using all respectfully, with loving desires for their good, the unkind behavior of calling names, etc., soon became things of the past, though being faithful to our principles, and of discouraging all improper words of a mere show of respect, as "Mr.," "Mrs.," etc. The foregoing has been written with a desire that it may be as a little inducement to faithfulness to those who are ready to shrink from the testimonies of Friends, or who hold them too loosely, as not at all times and in all places to be known by their behavior, speech and apparel, as Friends.

—Mary Boerquet, afterwards Mary Fletcher, says, in her account of her life, as one amongst others with the very many of our ancient and later worthies who have left similar sayings in their writings for our reading and profit, which should often be recurred to by us as incitements: "I saw clearly that plainness of dress and behavior becomes a Christian, and resolved to be neat and clean in the plainest things;" and she says, "whenever I thought on the subject, these words of the apostle would pass through my mind with power,—'For so the holy women of old . . . adorned themselves.'"

First Month 22d, 1905.

To most people self-control means the control of appearances and not the control of realities. The control of appearances is merely outward repression. I have not controlled myself until I am absolutely free from that interior desire which was seeking expression.

Boys.

BY ELEANOR COPE EMLÉN.

"And so he bore without reproach
The grand old name of Gentleman."

I can lay no claim to any special opportunities for knowledge of this wide, and deep and many-sided subject, but, I suppose, like any other woman who is the mother of sons, I have had to think a great deal about them.

I believe I can never forget the time when I was told that my little baby was a boy. The principal thing that occupied me all that day was the thought, going over and over through my mind, "A man-child is born into the world." And a great sense of responsibility seemed to take hold of me from that moment, as if I felt that a man had been entrusted to my charge, who would need my help all the time. And as he would be growing night and day there was no time to lose.

How many kinds of boys there are! I have known many, brothers, sons, nephews, all on intimate terms—and no two alike. We can make no rules for managing them or for training that are in the least of universal application, or we should be sure to do some of them injustice. Just a few rules for ourselves, however, will help us much.

We should, for instance, never use force to insist on obedience, unless it be to carry an unwilling child out of the way of fire, or something equally tragic. This may seem a little hard to carry out, but see how it will work. If we tell the dear little boy of four to go to bed now, and he declines, to the point of rebelliousness—if we pick him up and carry him or drag him where we wish, we can probably manage to do it by main force, but with an effort, and his antagonism rises immediately as he feels the effort, and he prides himself on the strength of his resistance. Not so with our moral force and maternal authority if we wield it very quietly and firmly; he has no weapon to match that, and if we begin early and faithfully, he will recognize the force of it as surely as the sight of a policeman brings order to a disorderly crowd.

I was much interested lately in hearing an explanation of hypnotism which bears on this. This mental force, or whatever it may be, is said to be closely akin to the power which a mother exerts over her child whenever she puts it to sleep. I do not mean when it wants to go to sleep, but when her superior will and judgment decide that it is time for sleeping. She makes it very comfortable, perhaps darkens the room, she may sing to it, or rock it, but she wills that it shall go to sleep, and very many times she succeeds. Can we not draw a lesson for ourselves from this, in other kinds of mother's duties? So many people say, "How do you keep the children from teasing and tormenting each other?" and I always feel like saying, "By firmly resolving not to allow that baleful influence in your home life." We are quite determined in our mind that our little ones shall grow up to speak the truth, and to respect the property of others, and we are willing, if necessary, to spend much time and will-power in enforcing these very important things—in short, without any discussion, we insist that they shall be truthful and honest boys and girls. So, I believe we can, with the strength of our will, do away with this great destroyer of home peace.

Some boys are perhaps more prone to teasing than others, from nervousness, but all can be trained out of it in some way. Let the boy who cannot be charmed with a book at the moment, be shown that the kindling-wood pile is low, or that the snow is not entirely taken off the front path, or that some little light duty is waiting for a willing hand—but at the same time make all clearly to understand that teasing is wrong-doing, and never allowed. Let us tell them early and often of the Tender Love that watches over us all the time, the protection of the Heavenly Father, as well as the many little unasked for favors that we receive from Him—and then show them that it must be Satan's own pleasure that finds joy or satisfaction in the discomfort or misery of a companion. I feel very strongly about this. It is not reasonable to expect love and loyalty to be as strong among brothers and sisters when each older one is allowed to torment and taunt the next younger, and I do not think that parents are doing their duty to allow the practice to be spread from one to another. I have seen an older brother bring so much unhappiness into the house with his petty tyranny and interference, that there was open rejoicing when he went away from home, and sighing and dark looks at his return. It struck me that real injustice was done to that boy, and far less trouble would it have been to break up the bad habit, than the cost of time and feeling spent in petting and comforting the rest of the family.

This may naturally suggest to us the possibility of our children wanting to be cruel to animals—of which I am sure there is not nearly as much as there was once, a reform worked no doubt by the many children's books published lately about animals and their interesting ways. So that if we find our children thoughtless or reckless about the cat, or the flies on the dinner-table, or the sparrows on the sidewalk, let us see that they very shortly have some very interesting book which will set them to thinking about such little creatures—or the little ones can have stories told them which will give their thoughts the right turn.

Now, in regard to truthfulness and honest dealing in little ways, we shall probably find a natural difference between our little boys, but I think it is largely a matter of courage or lack of it, though with some, I must say, there seems to be an inborn sincerity and clearness of view which scarcely needs any training in this respect. But we must not be easily discouraged if it takes great faithfulness and tact to establish moral courage and backbone in a little boy, and make him array himself, as it were, on the side of truth. Generally we can track a vein of manliness in him, and get his tendency to Hero-worship to help along. There is always his father, or a particularly-beloved uncle, or perhaps an older boy who is notably strong in truth-telling, who can be talked over quietly, and this beautiful quality explained, and the influence that such people exert by their actions brought out. And then the thought will come naturally, how fine it would be to grow up to be a man like that; and of how it can be done—not in our own strength, but in the strength of the Lord, who is very close to us, wanting to help us if we will only turn to Him, and who will surely listen to the faintest cry for help in the moment of temptation. "Set a watch, Oh Lord, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips!" is a very short prayer to teach just now, but a very impressive one. But suppose we are nearly sure that the truth has not been told us, yet have no proof. It is a most awkward situation—we cannot let it slip by—we must not dare to insist that our boy is a liar, what shall we do?

Of course, the mother whose refuge is prayer will want to lay this burden before the Heavenly Father, for her heart is aching sorely, and let the child share this with her. This is not the time for talking, but with great gravity let her go into a quiet room, and with tightly-closed doors sit silently down, holding the little hand warmly. Do not hurry at all, but maintain the silence—and the prayer for light that goes up in the quiet may be joined in by the little child—who can say? After some minutes let him go, but kiss him and just say, "I have been telling the dear Lord about it; He was there, and He can help us." I have no experience with a child who would not be tendered by this. And although he may make no confession at the time, I believe his power of truth-telling will be greater afterwards.

There is no point that I can lay more stress on than the habit of self-control. It is fully as important for the mother as for the son, and many a mother gets good help herself in this direction by the necessity of setting the right example to her children. A very quick temper is often a distinct trait in our children, and may become a terrible enemy if it is yielded to, but no outbreak should be overlooked or treated as an excusable thing at the time, although at quite another time we may talk it over quietly, and sympathize heartily in the temptation to get angry. And let us never forget to praise, or notice in some quiet way, the valiant effort not to break out in rage, whenever it is crowned with success. Sometimes the right chance to say the encouraging word may not come for hours or days afterwards, but let him know that mother saw it, and mother was glad!

The picture of a lively young colt, half-trained, is very easily set before a boy, and he made to realize how utter ruin will come if it is allowed to run off with the driver, but if a firm hand is held over him he will travel many a mile, and be a useful friend. And so a hot temper well controlled seems to change to energy and force of character later.

And this is only one way in which self-control is to be urged—many little habits which mar the children's manners, or make them uncomfortable companions to older people, may be handled in the same way—little things which spring from selfishness or greediness may be greatly eliminated from daily life by the duty of self-control, and we may be sure that in strengthening our sons' characters in this way while they are young, we shall be helping them to stand in the day of great temptations, "and having done all, to stand." I am glad to recall here the beautiful thought that Professor Brumbaugh gave us lately of the possibility of holding up the character of Christ as a genuine example in our daily lives—

"For even Christ pleased not Himself" has been an unanswerable reminder to a thoughtless child sometimes.

As we wish to draw out our boys' feeling, in right ways in times of stress, so we must be sure to let our own feelings move us to sympathize in their small affairs. All of us are quick enough to pity or help them in an injury to the body, but some have not realized the need of a sympathetic spirit in their smug joys. We are too busy or absorbed to take over a pet game of ball with them, and hear who are going to play, and why this boy is better this year, though we have time to discuss clothes and servants' deficiencies before them, which are certainly no more important. We should see the new hat, and enjoy it for its good points, or do anything else sympathetic within reason, to establish an intimate footing between mother and son—though we may well bear in mind not to let his affair grow more important than the grown-up people.

One thing that troubled me when my foot was young and thoughtless, was the propensity to handle disrespect to me, their mother I felt at first that it savored too much of self-conceit to correct this fault—perhaps I might have brought it on myself. But the Divine command is very definite—"Honor thy father and thy mother"—and should be obeyed. I never passed it over, but never answered back, only saying, "That is not the way to speak to mother; go to thy room and close the door, or else apologize at once." It is only naughty habit, not very hard to break, if thy mother is faithful and the punishment is inevitable. That little rule, "Let the punishment be simple, but inevitable," given me long ago by a wise man, has been a great help to me. And let no one think that putting a boy into a closet and holding the door to keep him there, is worthy of the name of punishment.

I almost fear it may be thought that I have had only troublesome experiences with children, I have been dwelling on grave faults of much; but I am not writing a family history and can only assure you that these times retrospect are all covered over and submerged in the scenes of happy childhood, the boy's breezy love of out-door life, the loyal little men who waited on me, and with whom I took counsel over our small home problems.

Now, when our boys grow older we may have other problems, and must brace ourselves for them. I think there are but few of the who do not, as they grow toward manhood have a period of exaggerated traits, as it were. It may be shown in an irritability over small matters, it may be an excess of modesty or self-consciousness—or it may be the reverse and show itself as bravado and contempt for the powers that be—but, at any rate, we can be ready for it ourselves, and see to it that we are not nervous or fickle with them, and like a wise horse-trainer with a spirited young animal, we must be ready to soothe and "gentle" a little, to show a good deal of sympathy without too much talk—and remember that this is not a permanent condition, but a period of development in many ways, and having tried preach and insist on self-control from very early years, let us exercise faith, and not look for very much fruit just now. I think good companions and good books are all-important time, and though we may not be quite able to maintain confidential relations with our boys, we can be ever on the watch—and study them without their being aware of it. And if we faithfully watching, with a humble desire to help them in best ways, we shall often be able to detect a tendency towards something desirable, before it becomes a fixed habit or vice—and our prayers and our most earnest efforts must unobtrusively be brought to bear, entering this or modifying it.

I feel that a little consideration of the need of courtesy among our young people would be of great help to us. We all see the need of it in our homes, but I suppose the attention is, how much we, as Friends, can give to the subject, for fear we might be thought of as giving too much time to Deportment as an accomplishment. But I cannot help feeling that courtesy and politeness must be instilled in our children more thoroughly, and without any rules it is often passed over, or perhaps vaguely felt to be lacking without any improper enforcing. The family table, for instance, would be the gathering place of not only neat and cleanly people, but of kindly cheer and a humor—and each with some thought for interest—that we may go away from it refreshed in more than body. If our children are at dinner, silent, absorbed in our own duties, intent only on our own plans, we are apt to have the prettiest manners—so that we cannot pose as an example for them. On the contrary, we make an effort to be entertaining, and insist on polite response to our courtesies of politeness, we have a very different scene, and a much more refreshing hour for everyone.

Again, the sight of young people sitting uncomfortably in arm chairs when older people in the room, should be an unheard-of thing. It is inconsiderate it is—but it needs more than two or three tellings to make it the law of the household that they should rise and see to be seated. So, with many other things, on certain, at meetings, at school, or wherever our children may go, we must insist on their being of others than themselves and acting according to the rules we have given them. As some one has said, "Good manners are only a series of small self-sacrifices."

We have all heard of the courtesy of George Washington which "surpassed all the forms of breeding," but we cannot trust to our every-day grand girls following the far-away example of a very good man. We must look for politeness every day, in smaller as well as in larger things—for our Society suffers in reputation from the brusqueness and careless manners of our young people. I am not pleading for "company manners," which are, at best, a varnish, and very apt to show cracks if it is a strain—what I want to see is more of a polish, which has to be put on with many a stroke but which has the qualities of endurance, and stands to old age.

I comprehend all the mothers who read this and we may be, unexpressed in their hearts, the wish that their sons may bear some likeness to the Knights of the Round Table, as Tennyson shows them in his matchless description—

"Glorious company, the flower of men,
To serve as model for the mighty world."

It tells us that they swore "To reverence the King, as if he were Their conscience, and their conscience as their King,

To break the heathen and uphold the Christ,
To ride abroad redressing human wrongs
To speak no slander, no, nor listen to it,
To honor his own word as if his God's,
To lead sweet lives in purest chastity,
To love one maiden only, cleave to her,
And worship her by years of noble deeds,
Until they won her."

Let such be our ideals, at any rate, and let us not be ashamed of them in this late century of the world. And so, as we move trustfully forward on our daily way, we may come to the time when we shall be able to say, with humility, and with grateful hearts, "Here am I, Lord, and the children which thou hast given me." E. C. MILLEN.

Birds in the Hebrides.

A. Goodrich-Freer in an extremely interesting work entitled "The Outer Isles," says: "Even in this miniature land of Great Britain, there is a whole chain of islands, some hundred and fifty miles long, possessed of natural beauties and resources, having its own characteristic literature, archaeology and traditions, of which its nearest neighbors on the mainland know little, the rest of the world, for the most part, next to nothing. . . . Even a land laid bare and homes made desolate, these things and more have not sufficed to subtract from the Hebrideans the inherent characteristics of a people who were Christianized before S. Augustine, who were sending scholars to found Continental Universities two centuries before the existence of Oxford, and who, as we learn from early Gaelic poems, were drinking wine and burning wax candles while English kings slept upon straw, and bought wine as a cordial from the apothecaries." The writer thus describes the almost limitless bird-life of some of these out-of-the-way islands.

"Something has already been said of the wild birds, which in a country not only treeless, but almost without cover of any kind, even heather being very scarce, are extraordinarily varied and numerous. Their perching-places are of course the loose walls or the galvanized wire used for boundaries, and their entire fearlessness is a delightful tribute to the humanity of the islanders. The Hebrides are throughout a paradise of larks, which seem to sing almost all day and night in the clear summer twilights. We have heard them in full song at half past ten at night, and again at three o'clock in the morning. The lapwing is even more numerous and more assertive.

To be attended for miles by say, fifty lapwings, each possessed of the opinion that your one object in life is to discover the whereabouts of his nest, and each protesting with the vigor of a "vert that it is somewhere else, becomes a really troublesome feature in the month of June. . . . The cliffs of Kenevara present an extraordinary spectacle in the breeding season. Wandering over the hill, one becomes aware of a sound only to be compared to a Wagner chorus, performed on a thousand stringed instruments, and ever growing louder and louder. Suddenly the hill is cleft by a narrow ravine, and two absolutely perpendicular cliffs confronting each other, are separated by an inlet of the sea, but a few feet wide, where, on a sunny day, the seals bask on the sheltered rocks below. At the head of the gully is a deep cave entered only with considerable difficulty, and where hundreds of blue doves have their home in the rocks. The cliffs themselves from crown to base are white with hundreds of young sea-birds sitting, as it seems, in tight packed rows on incredibly narrow ledges, and all screaming for food, while the old birds fly in and out in snowy clouds bringing choice morsels for their exacting broods. At first one's sense seems almost dulled by the weird and monotonous orchestra, the sounds rising and falling as the creatures pause to devour their food, and varied only by occasional shrieks of expectation as the parents come in sight. Then by degrees one gains sufficient detachment to be able to take in the wonderful outline and coloring of the strange picture, the brilliant blue of a sky and sea which rolls away and away without interruption to a New World, the deep grey of the towering cliffs, the irregular gleaming rows of white sea-birds, stationary in mass but in detail ever moving, ever stretching forth impatient golden beaks and straining on long rows of tenacious golden feet. Above, and beneath, and about them, great hanging beds of pink sea-drift, brilliant blue-bells, pink and yellow vetch, crimson clover, and geranium, waving ferns and grasses, brilliant and prolific as such things are, only in places absolutely inaccessible except to the kindly hand of Nature. And then, from time to time, come the swooping of strong wings overhead, the sudden descent of the great mother-birds-gull, or kittiwake, or guillemot. Away, under an overhanging crag, is the nest of the much-feared hoodie-crow, and there too, a pair of ravens have lived beyond the memory of man, every year driving their young family away from the island. Down below, our guide pointed to a ledge, sacred, it is said, year after year, to the cormorants. At certain other times other birds make their way to this sheltered spot, wild geese, swans, scooters, great northern divers, falcons, or the gosander and seaweem."

CULTURE is good, but we must not hope to find in it that which it cannot give. A recent writer tells of the decay of churches in certain rural districts, but does not seem to regret very much the fact. He says morality shows no sign of decay in those regions, because the public schools still flourish. His hope for those communities appears to be not in religion, but in culture. But culture will not save a soul. Communities have decayed in morals and life while culture flourished among them. But no community ever decayed while the Christian religion flourished in the midst. True Christians are the salt of the earth. It is the grace of God in the heart, and not knowledge in the head, that saves.—Christian Advocate.

"BEWARE that thou forget not the Lord, thy God, when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and hast dwelt therein; when thy silver and thy gold multiply, and all that thou hast has been multiplied, and thy heart be lifted up. . . . For it is He that giveth thee power to get wealth." This, then, is the principal danger held up to view in the prayer of the litany which says, "In all the time of our prosperity, good Lord deliver us."—Charleston News and Courier.

The Jews of New York.

Israel Zangwill has come from England to New York city to induce the Jews to establish their Zion in Eastern Africa, and give up their prospect of a kingdom in Palestine for the present. But influential Jews are not found to favor the plan. A writer in the Boston Transcript gives the following information:

"The Jews of the Ghetto refuse to be even interested. New York's the place for them. After generations of persecution and oppression the Jews of Central and Eastern Europe have found a haven where they are free to lead their own lives—free to adhere to the religion of their fathers, to speak their own Yiddish, and to mingle or not with the outside world as they may be inclined. That is why more Jews came to America during the year now ending than in any previous year, more than eighty-nine thousand. Sixty-nine thousand Jewish immigrants came into the port of New York. And coming here, they feel that they are coming home; more so than if they were entering Palestine; far more so than if they were settling in British East Africa. In coming to New York they become denizens of the largest Jewish city in the world. There are more than seven hundred thousand Jews in New York to-day, and more than four hundred thousand of them are in the Ghetto—that wonderful section of the city east of the Bowery to the East River, south of Houston street nearly to Brooklyn bridge. Here the Jew may come and live out his life without acquiring one word of English. Nor is this in any way detrimental to American life, or the so-called process of Americanization. The public schools, the Hebrew educational institutions—like the Educational Alliance, and the settlements—exercise a powerful influence upon the children. Indeed, one of the gravest dangers in this part of American life to-day lies in the too rapid assimilation of the Jewish immigrants of the second generation. It creates too wide a breach between parents and children.

"Scarcely any religion has more of beauty, meaningful symbolism, and deep spirituality than Orthodox Judaism. Orthodoxy may be cramped, narrow, and dogmatic. It still has a contribution to make to American life that America cannot afford to ignore. The New York Ghetto has more obscure scholars, poets, and dramatists than any other alien colony in the world. They are obscure, not because of the inferior quality of their work, but because their scholarship is in dead languages, their poems and their dramas are in a tongue little known outside of the Jewish world. Yiddish is a strange jargon. More nearly than anything else it resembles sixteenth century German, with frequent traces of French, Latin and modern German, and English. There are push-cart peddlers on the East side of New York who are versed in ancient Hebraic lore to an extent that would put to blush some of our most distinguished academicians. There are men in this same Ghetto whose thoughts are as naturally expressed in poetic forms as the birds sing. There is Eliaxim Zunsner. How many people in Boston could tell one thing about Zunsner? There are sixty-five known collections of Zunsner's songs in existence, and to-day his name is a household word in millions of homes in Russia. For many years he was the 'Wedding Bard' who was as necessary at the wedding as the rabbi.

"The Ghetto knows him. The Ghetto knows many and many a name that the English-speaking world would not recognize. The Ghetto world is as full of light and shadow as the world we most of us were born to, and the black spots are not darker than the bright spots are golden. Filth, squalor, overcrowding, unsanitary tenements and sweat shops are all characteristic of the Ghetto, but not more so than the heart and soul poetry and the classic drama of the Yiddish-speaking people. One thoroughfare from the Bowery to the East River—Rivington street—is said to be the most crowded street in the world. It teems with humanity day and night. The density of its population is nearly 1000 to the acre, while London's most crowded area is less than 400. Three blocks south is a parallel thoroughfare—Grand street—with its Yiddish stage, where during a year there is probably more of classic drama than in all the rest of New York together. The Yiddish stage has reached an extraordinary plane of development in New York. This would not be possible in East Africa for generations to come, and it is doubtful if it could ever attain the eminence there that it has reached here. Ghetto life tends to conserve all that is best and beautiful in the lives of the Jews; at the same time it brings them into contact with our world, which is a broadening and enlightening influence.

"As an instrument of transition the Ghetto is incomparable. There is no call for hurry. The Jewish immigrants, unlike the vast proportion of any other of our invading peoples, bring their families, their native life and their traditions with them. They are happy here, happier than they have ever been before in the history of their people. They bring to America a trust in things spiritual, a belief in the vision of the inward eye that is a wholesome counteractant to our extreme materialism. New York cannot hold all of the Jews who are still in Europe, but America can. And why should the eight million who are still in Russia, Austria and Roumania turn to East Africa when America's doors are still open to them? There are agencies at work transporting the immigrants to other parts of the continent. In one recent year sixty per cent. of the immigrants were forwarded from New York through the efforts of the Baron Hirsch Fund. A broadcast scattering of the Jews is not a wise or successful policy. Segregation is not desirable. But colonization in the midst of other peoples is wise, and does result to the mutual satisfaction of the immigrants and America. All that is great and good in the Ghetto life in New York to-day—and there is much more than can be hinted at here—results from the preservation, or partial preservation, of the true Jewish life. At the present rate of immigration it will be half a century before all of the Jews of Europe will have come to America. If the various agencies handling this tide of immigration continue to strengthen, the question of properly apportioning them will not be an impossible one by any means. Anti-Semitism is never encouraged by people familiar with Ghetto life in its deeper phases.

"The Jew who has thrown away his faith, who has become a mere money changer and frequents summer hotels, is no more the typical Jew than the blasé American who is eterna in evidence in England, France and Switzerland during the summer months, is representative of America and Americans. He is as popular with the real Jews, and the cultivated Jews, as among Americans. It is not unkindly, but these are probably the people who will support I. Zangwill. The Jew people who understand the question in all its aspects disapprove of East Africa colonization. The immigrants for whom it is intended know that America has more to offer. That is why Zangwill's mission is destined to prove fruitless."

FOR "THE FRIEND"

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Year Meeting.

For many years subsequent to this no definite action respecting these matters was taken. With the growing indisposition in Congress to recognize the independence of the Indian tribes by entering into treaties with them, which in 1871 was embodied in an act of Congress, another effort to conclude a treaty has since been made, but after many years these matters were brought before the Court of Claims, which the rights of the Indians have been far acknowledged that a judgment has been rendered in their favor, and the amount payable to them, by the United States was determined by decree of the Court on the 1st of First Month 1892, to be $1,971,295. This sum however has not yet been paid them, several questions of detail having arisen for adjudication which with other causes has delayed a final settlement.

In 1868 Joseph Scattergood and Ebenezer Worth under an appointment of the Committee made a visit to several of the tribes of Indians in New York, all of whom they had visited in 1865. In reporting their observations during this visit they comment upon the "lack of industry and timely attention to their farm operations" by the Indians upon the Allegany Reservation which had been so frequently mentioned before, and add, "Some of the Indians excuse themselves for this want of timely attention, alleging that they have no horses nor oxen, and for want of them they cannot get their land broken up in time to plant because they cannot hire teams at the right time, owing their owners wanting them themselves, or other instances, their not having either mules or credit. To such as these a judicious Provisionary Committee would do good among them might be secured by encouraging them to purchase teams in time, and perhaps in some cases assisting them with one. A want of forethought and economy is a marked deficiency in many of the natives and they need the advice, and encouragement that one really interested in their improvement could afford, if it was his business to make himself intimately acquainted with their necessities. If they could be induced to save some of their little earnings it might be a stimulus to them to be more provident."

Their visit to the Cattaraugus Reservation was a brief one, they remark in reference to it "A large number of the residents of the Reservation are reaping the fruits of the agricultural industry. The agricultural fair which was held a few days before our arrival was representative to have been a very creditable exhibition of livestock and also of agricultural products and implements. It was visited by many white men and was said to have been equal in many respects to similar exhibitions in the Western part of the state, and superior to some of them."

The Tuscarora Indians they remark: "The varying operations of this tribe appear to be well conducted. Their fences were mostly in good order, and the land appeared much freer from weeds than some others. John Mount Pleasant at whose house we were kindly entertained, still pursues his business energetically. He had sowed eighty acres of land with wheat, many of which looked promising." Other members of the tribe manifested a prosperous condition and it was the opinion of the Friends that the land as a whole was in better condition than that of any other Indians. There were two schools among them which were represented to be well attended. Nearly or quite all the people profess Christianity.

The condition of the Tonawanda Indians did not seem encouraging. The Friends remark: "The Tonawandas having settled their difficulties with the Ogden Land Company respecting their lands, which reason was assigned in 1866 as a cause of their want of greater progress, it was hoped a marked improvement would have been seen in their condition." To the regret of the Friends this was not the case, and they were told that intemperance had increased among them and has brought its usual curse of idleness and immorality.

In a conference which they had with a number of their principal men, some of the evils which were retarding their progress were pointed out, and they were urged to pursue a steady course of industry if they expected to have the comfort of life. The Indians informed the Friends that they had made application to the Legislature for funds to build a house adapted for a boarding school, but which not having been granted they intended to renew their application, a course which did not meet the approval of the Friends, as there were but two small schools on their land, and four or five times as many children among them as could be accommodated in these houses. The Friends inquired "whether it would not be better to concentrate an interest in education among the Friends by increasing their district schools; as the expense of conducting them would be much less for each scholar than supporting a boarding school."

Boarding schools when well conducted were very valuable but they were attended with much expense and it would not be desirable to commend one unless they had sufficient means to support it and could procure a person well qualified to carry it on. It was often difficult to procure those who were suitable to manage them etc."

The Friends remark in reference to this band of Seneca "If some suitable Friend could be placed to reside among this tribe even for a few weeks and instruct some of them in agriculture much advantage might with the Divine blessing arise from his labors. Very few of them appear to profess Christianity and a small number appear to be rightly influenced by its principles and spirit."

temporal things and desire eternal.

THE END OF CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.—Christian experience proves what the Christian revelation declares, that through a reception of the word of God in the heart by faith there is a clearer, fuller and more personal knowledge of the Divine Being than is found by natural reason or through any other source. God is best revealed and manifested in the sphere of faith and love. In faith's first look God is brought into clear view and into intimate relation; in love's full contemplation and reflection God becomes a fellow-being. The end of Christian experience is "to see his face." The Scripture declares that it is "life eternal to know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent." Science discovers only an eternal energy and inscrutable force, reason sees only unity or pantheism, but faith, through the Christian revelation, finds fatherhood, sonhood and spirithood, with fullness, light and love, and with manifestation to every believing soul of man. This is a profound wisdom, yet also a simple experience, so easy and attainable that a child can realize it. Indeed, the childlike and the humble are the best recipients. It is not necessary to understand the revelation of God before we receive its power and blessing, as it is not necessary to understand all about life in order to be born into life.—The Watchman.

The bane of millions of professed religionists is their ignorance of religion; they have a man-made, man-measured sort of thing nursed up in the reason, a collection of ideas about religion that can be weighed and measured and grasped by creature's thought, and respectively labeled with a denominationalism, but it lacks the divinity and the voice of God.

Do what you may, it is out of the power of mortals to enter into a truth for which they are unprepared; God, the perfect teacher, goes not beyond the capacity of his pupils to receive; their next step depends upon the use of present opportunity; an idler in the kingdom of God is an impossibility.

First Month 15th, 1905.

Items Concerning the Society.

Visitors attending Philadelphia Yearly Meeting were Eli Harvey and Ezra Barber, from Indiana; James Henderson, Charles Livezey, John S. and Esther H. Fowler, from Ohio; Henry T. and Alfred Outland, Abram Fisher and Benjamin P. Brown, from North Carolina; Job S. Gidley and Elizabeth Roberts, from Massachusetts; Joel Bean, from California, and Eliza H. Varney, from Canada.

The Yearly Meeting missed the company and service of several valuable members, because of the sudden decease of Rebecca G. Rhoads, the beloved wife of our friend, Jonathan E. Rhoads. These two were in attendance at the meeting of ministers and elders on Seventh-day the 15th, and having returned to their home in Wilmington, she passed away early the next morning. The news was saddening to Friends generally as it came back to the city on First-day, and the sympathy of many in the sitting in the Yearly Meeting was with our beloved bereaved brother in the Truth, and with his afflicted family. Especially as words largely from his pen and heart were read in the first session, as contained in the address on the "Sacredness of Human Life," were we cognizant of the added sense of such sacredness now borne in upon his heart.

Notes in General.

In reply to the query, is not the practice of women preaching in churches contrary to Paul's prohibition (1 Cor. 3: 4-10). The Christian Herald replies, "The prohibition was given under circumstances very different from those now existing, which is all changed now, and we do not believe that Paul would prohibit women teaching in these days. Acting on the principle he laid down in other matters, we think he would welcome their aid." Sounder reasons can be found.

Bishop Samuel I. J. Schreschewsky, who has given to the world the entire Bible in the best Mandarin and Weni versions yet produced, is a Russian Hebrew by birth, trained by his devout parents to be a rabbi. He has not been able to stand or walk for twenty years because of paralysis, and wrote out the entire Old Testament with the forefingers of each hand on a typewriter. He is hard at work now nearly seventy-four years old, and is banded at night on the references for the two versions, and also hopes to complete the translation of the Apocrypha.

A CHURCH PUTTING LIES INTO BOYS' MOUTHS.—This year's President of the National Free Church Council, R. F. Horton, thus describes an early experience which sealed his life for Non-conformity. "It was at a dame school, where the boys said their Catechism as the Monday morning lesson, and one boy with a hard, bad face, and blasphemous tongue—a veritable plague-spot in the school—was loudly and glibly repeating the answer to the question, 'Who gave you that name?' I hear the words, 'My baptism, wherein I was made a child of God and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven.' From that moment I date my conviction that baptism does not produce the alleged effect. That conviction was confirmed at the public school to which I was sent at thirteen. There, again, I observed passing through confirmation and partaking of the Sacrament, the boys who were odious to me as bullies and as blackguards. And I became well assured that the Christianity which consists in Sacraments was not a religion to which my conscience or reason could ever respond."

QUAINT NAMES.—Bird-freedom Sawin, Praise-God Barbone and other quaintly named Puritans were not without their forerunners. They might have chosen other names, too, if they had known that the practice had originated with believers on the other side of their great religious divide.

Late last month there came the commemoration day of that Bishop of Carthage who fought the good fight under the name Deogratias, or Thank-God. Deogratias's episcopal predecessor, by the way, bore the name Quadvult Deus—What God Wills. It's a pleasant, meek sort of name, but it wasn't original with himself. Half a dozen fifth or sixth century bishops used it faithfully before him. Habedæum (He-Hath-God), and Adeodatus (Given-by-God) were other names of the time.

These truly sound odd—but it is only that the meaning of such names as John and Ursula and Walter, which once had a very vivid significance, has now entirely evaporated. It is only when we of these later centuries come to manufacture new ones ready to hand that the element of the grotesque steps in.

Even so the Latin is unable to undertake the manufacture with chances of turning out a more finished product than is possible in the English. Our own Indian names have, some of them, a haunting music—in their own long tongue. We know how Man-Afraid-of-His-Mother-in-Law sounds in English. Many a Hebrew to-day smarts under perfectly hideous names visited upon luckless German ancestors in days of bitter persecution. But hideous or in any way odd as are many names of to-day—like Turnip-seed and Wogwaller—it seems impossible to believe with Hume that in the days of the wildest riot with family nomenclature there ever could have lived the fancy to fashion the names he says was borne by the brothers Praise-God Barone. One of these was Christ-came-into-the-world-to-save-Barone. And the other was If-Christ-had-not-died-for-you-you-had-been-damned-Barone. Hume, by the by, also mentions God-reward-Smart, Standfast-on-high Stringer, Kill-sin Pimple, Fly-debate Roberts and Fight-the-good-fight-of-faith White. Our Indian at his wildest is never worse than these. Not without reason was it said that "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches."—Boston Transcript.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Humble oil field near Houston, Texas, has lately been the scene of volcanic disturbances during which an eruption of mud, loud explosions and an escape of great volumes of gas have occurred. This was first noticed on the 13th instant. On the same day a slight earthquake took place at Kookuk, Ia. A despatch from Redding, Cal., of the 14th states that the neighborhood of 100 miles for several days distant rumblings have been heard, and the snow is melting fast. Yesterday volcanic ashes and mud began to ooze through the surface of the earth at the edge of Sisson. The flow gradually increased until to-day it poured forth in several places like thick paint. While the mountain itself shows no visible eruptions, the phenomena are similar to those which inquiry into the regulation of railroads by legislation has been begun in Washington by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. It is expected that officers of the largest railroads in the country will appear and testify in regard to rates, rebates, violations of present laws and the need of additional legislation.

The railroads and station agents are forbidden to smoke cigarettes on the Reading Railroad passenger trains or in or about the Railroad's stations. The management decided upon this action in accordance with an act recently passed by the Legislature prohibiting persons from giving or selling cigarettes or cigarette papers to persons under 16 years of age. The railroad agents are instructed to see that the new rule is strictly observed.

Dr. Wriely of the Department of Agriculture has lately stated that the general effect of borax upon the human system is of a character tending to injure health.

The value of copper as a purifier of water by destroying vegetable life, also the typhoid bacillus, has been firmly affirmed by further researches of Doctors Moore and Kellerman of the Department of Agriculture. They state moreover that there is no authentic record of fatal copper poisoning, and that in minute quantities copper has no effect upon man.

Superintendent Brooks has lately made a report to the Board of Education in the city recommending the use of the vertical in preference to the sloping method of writing. He says that in the course of his investigations he wrote to the superintendents of schools of 150 of the larger cities in the country. Of the 116 cities from which replies were received, 100 have adopted the vertical system. A majority of the principals in this category were vertical writers, and the majority of business houses to which the Superintendent applied for expressions of opinion on the subject also endorsed it.

Among the latter the following replies were received to the Superintendent's request for general suggestions: "Teach vertical, for in practice persons will slant easier." "Vertical penmanship is easier, legible and avoids careless writing."

It is stated that in 1904 over 263,000 of the total 800,000 immigrants in this country remained in New York city, and 67 per cent. of the total in the States of New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and Rhode Island; was a majority of the number settled in the large cities and factory towns of those States. The West received but a small fraction of the newcomers, and the Southern States in the Atlantic division, which are in need of workers, received but three per cent. of the whole.

The Prudential Committee of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions has announced a statement that John D. Rockefeller's $100,000 gift could not be legally returned, and the objections of the Protestants were not sufficient to warrant such action.

Religious statistics for New York city, compiled by the Federation of Churches for 1904, show a total population of 3,945,507, an increase of 508,705, as compared with the census of 1900. The population is classified thus: Catholic, 1,300,000, or 32.9 per cent.;

Jewish, 725,000, or 18.4 per cent.; Protestant communicants, 321,698, or 8.4 per cent.; additional Protestant attendants, 497,547, or 12.6 per cent.; churchless Protestants, 1,087,762, or 27.6 per cent.

It is said that Osmo, a new fuel, is made from peat. The peat used contains 90 per cent of water, of which 25 per cent is removed by means of a electric current. The peat is then dried and passed through a machine which breaks it up and forms it into briquettes or nut-shaped pieces. Osmo is free from sulphur and burns without slag or smoke.

FOREIGN.—Foreign Secretary Lansdowne recently stated in the House of Lords that the British Government was decidedly in favor of this country in regard to the advisability of holding a second international peace conference.

A recent statement of the finances of Great Britain shows that the consumption of beer and spirits was less in 1904 than during any of the preceding fifteen years. The Chancellor attributes the improvement in the habits of the people to the increasing tendency to seek enjoyment in out-of-door recreation rather than in the public houses.

A national legal association has been organized in Russia largely by the efforts of lawyers which has issued resolutions which state that "the whole of Russia awaits the coming of a committee for the organization of the Government. We believe it to be our duty to declare that the Russian is on the verge of a precipice. The poverty-stricken Russian people are driven by the malevolence of the Government into agrarian and industrial revolt. The social and economic questions cannot be solved by the bureaucracy. Political reform is imperative. The Government should be reformed in accordance with modern principles, representatives of the people should have the principal influence and the bureaucracy should be relegated to a minor role. The reformed Government should be absolutely democratic."

The Czar has issued a rescript for a special commission to inquire into the reform of the welfare of the peasants: A despatch states that in view of the vastness of the task no practical results are possible for many months to come. Much apprehension is felt that hostile demonstrations by workmen on a large scale and by peasants throughout Russia may be expected about Fifth Month 1st.

Dr. Emmanuel de Constant, the former Deputy and president of the Parliamentary group favoring international arbitration, has lately delivered a speech in the French Senate, urging the military and naval disarmament of the States of Europe by a proportionate reduction of their forces similar to the joint disarmament of Chili and Argentina. He maintained that naval expenses were raising France under the pretext of defending her, and cited statements made by leading statesmen of Great Britain, Russia and Germany favoring a European accord for the limitation of naval expenses, and urged that this would benefit the entire world, particularly Russia, Japan and the United States, leaving them free to develop their commercial resources. He therefore has asked that work begin by France negotiating an Anglo-French agreement for limiting naval expenditures and intersecuring the adhesion of the other Powers.

In several cities in Europe meals are provided for poor children, who are attending school, at the expense of the State.

The French Chamber of Deputies, by 422 to 45 votes, has adopted Article 1 of the bill providing for the separation of Church and State, as follows: "The Republic assures liberty of conscience and guarantees the free exercise of religion, the only restrictions being those in the interest of public order."

All amendments were rejected. The majority in favor of Article 1 was considered as showing the strength of the supporters of the measure.

The second section of the bill for the separation of Church and State, containing the fundamental principle of the bill, "that the republic neither recognizes, provides stipends for nor has any religion," was adopted by a vote of 337 against 233.

It is stated that a German patent has been taken out for an electrical apparatus whereby the presence and extent of shoals of fish can be ascertained. A microphone, inclosed in a water-tight case connected with an electric battery and telephone, is lowered into the water. So long as the microphone is in contact with the shoal, but on its coming into contact with the shoal of fish, the constant tapping of the fish against the microphone case produces a series of sounds which at once betrays their presence. The rope attached to the microphone marks the exact depth of the shoal ascertained.

A census has recently been taken in the Philippine Islands which shows that the density of population on the mainland of the United States is 26 to the square mile, the density in the Philippines is 67, and that 242 islands of the archipelago have a total of 7,685,5 inhabitants. Seven million of the people are classified as civilized. Practically all of the civilized people belong to the Roman Catholic Church, 37 per cent. of all the children of school. The canons of the church are 1000.

The average size of the Philippine farm is about six acres, and the farmer usually owns his land. Paper is unknown, because very little effort produces the near caries of life.

An order in council has been passed by the Canadian Government closing fishing from 1905 to 1908 on Puget Sound. The canneries will close their works for like period, and, by this means, millions of salmon reach spawning beds unmolested and the industry will saved from threatened extinction. On the Canadian canneries will be idle for two years.

DEB. THOS. GILBERT, son of Thomas and Sarah E. Gilbert, was born in Wobleson County, Ind., the 11th of the Eleventh Month, 1827, died the twenty-seventh Second Month, 1905, aged seventy-seven years, ten months and seventeen days. He was married to Sa. Thomas in 1849. To them were born five children,—sons and three daughters. Although a Friend, by him when the Civil war broke out, that he was drafted, enlisted in the army. But the hand of Providence wonderfully preserved him, so that he was not engaged any battle, and he knew he never took the life of man. Here he was so fully and thoroughly convinced the horrors of war that he vowed to God that if he spared to receive a discharge, he would return to his family and mother. (After living), and live a devoted life, would prove that it was not by might or power, "But my Spirit, saith the Lord," and that through his me alone was he saved. So fully did he adhere to the principles of peace that he refused a pension, though in need of it at various times. After this he spoke of increased light he received on different subjects, show his evening and morning prayers, and that his God in peace. Ofttimes when coming home from meeting, he would speak of the great lessons unfolded by the Divine life and life to his mind in silent waiting before God, refreshing his soul, building him up in the most holy life. So firmly was he convinced of the principles of Peace that, through all the motions of his heart, he would not even look back, or be turned back, but he would not turn his face from faith he so dearly loved and maintained until death. He left a clear evidence that all was well with him. 82 time before his death, and especially the day before said: "There was not a cloud in his way;" and he wanted to be left in the quiet with his Lord on this occasion. Near his death he said that his God in his hand in the presence of others and said, he saw "God" and it is all through his great mercy, and how I love adore Him!" That on assured him that he would be at rest with his Master; to which he immediately assented. Then was his countenance lighted up with heavenly smile, a token, we believe, of the evidence of his entrance into the unspeakable joy of his Lord.

Rest, warded pilgrim,
The Shepherd has come,
And called thee away,
For thy work is all done,
Thy days are numbered,
Then go with the blest,
To the mansions on high,
With angels all hall rest.

She possessed a kind and affectionate disposition which endeared her to a large circle of friends. She bore her illness with patience, and at one time saying, "that life was sweet, and I should like to live for the sake of her family," "had prayed for resignation and believed her prayers had been mercifully granted, and that she thought she was taken then she would go happy." At another time she said "her sins had been arrayed before her, and she felt they were expiating, and she felt that she was loved for all." Her relatives and friends are comforted in the belief that she has been safely gathered, and that their loss is her eternal gain.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, 1905.

Third-day, Fourth Month 18th.—William Penn and Charles S. Carter were continued clerks of the Meeting for this year.

A concern which originated in the Women's Meeting, of interest and sympathy for those who are absent from us and unable to attend religious meetings of which they are members was introduced by a visit from a woman who had opened the subject in the men's Meeting, desiring that a joint letter of sympathy and sympathy to individuals of this kind should be prepared. This met the hearty concurrence of the Men's Meeting, who set up a Committee for the purpose, and the following letter which was produced before the Meeting in its session on Sixth-day was approved by the Yearly Meeting as a fitting expression of its concern.

The remainder of the sitting was occupied in reading and considering the Queries, as far as to third.

Fourth-day, 19th.—The reading and answering of the eight Queries was completed. Much fraternal and loving expression was given to the subjects embraced in them.

It was thought that in no previous annual session had so many of the smaller meetings been omitted or unattended. The change from rural to town or city life had depleted the meetings of the younger or middle aged members, leaving the elder members to pass on without successors there. Still it cannot be denied that in some who remain, and who keep up the attendance of meetings, there is a name which is named indifference empties more living-houses than that called mortality. However the spirit of worship prevalent in the membership of larger meetings, they would be all larger; for the spirit of living worship seeks fellowship with the same in brethren wherever they place where they can be found.

The future of our meetings for worship and discipline is intimately connected with the present attitude of parents towards them. If the home life lacks in reverence for sacred things, or deals in criticisms of the ministry, it emphasizes a spirit of worldliness, the children of such a household will certainly imbibe the spirit of their elders. Are the children sometimes, almost unconsciously, being deflected from religious associations through the misplaced liberty induced by parental affection? As our offspring are encouraged to become enamoured with the Saviour, and are tenderly guided to the place of prayer, just so will their future be largely developed, and they learn to appreciate the hour of public worship."

Comfort was taken in the many evidences apparent in the past year of our young people seeking to discover the old paths and to discern the landmarks of our religious profession.

In the conducting of funerals encouragements to simplicity and the good order which is dictated even by common prudence as well as by the mind of truth were heard, and admonitions to the avoidance of all that is borrowed from superstition.

Although a special form of garb is not the vital thing in religion, yet obedience to a sense of Divine requirement is vital; and the Spirit of Truth cannot long be our actuating power without leading us to simplicity, and generally into a testimony for it.

Warnings were given of the narrowing and deadening effect of the too close pursuit of secular affairs without due regard to the need of the immortal part. "Where your treasure is there will your heart be also," and so with Christ if our treasure be in Him. Those whose places of business are at a distance from their homes were encouraged to avail themselves of the opportunities which their mode of travel may allow for inward retirement and waiting upon the Lord for his counsel in their perplexities or their prosperity, and for the refreshment of mind and spirit with which He will often feed them.

"The Light of Christ as God's gift for man's salvation" remains, as explained by William Penn, to be the root of the goodly tree of doctrines that grew and branched out of it, and will continue to flourish if we abide in it, and bring forth fruit from it to the Divine praise.

In the abundance of lively counsel poured forth, the acknowledgment was felt that the prayers offered on our behalf, both vocally and silently, at the opening of our assembly had in large measure been mercifully granted.

Fifth-day, 20th.—Perhaps the largest meeting ever witnessed in the Arch Street house assembled for Divine worship in the forenoon, and the time was much occupied in vocal delivery by many. The congestion in that meeting was at the expense, evident on the men's side, of a smaller meeting, to which, however, some went who feared that the crowded meeting through multiplicity of vocal offerings would not be a Friends' meeting. But no just cause of complaint of either meeting was heard, but rather that many were edified.

The Annual Queries brought answer that three Elders and two Ministers had died during the year:—Elders: Rachel F. Parker, of Muncy, Hannah N. Harry, of London Grove, Lydia S. Webster, of Frankford. Ministers: Levi R. Cowperthwaite, of Haddonfield, and Ann Eliza Bacon, of Greenwich.

Two Monthly Meetings had been constituted—the old Kadnor Monthly Meeting resumed under the name of Haverford, and Lansdowne at Lansdowne, Pa. Discontinued are London Britain Preparative with its week-day meeting; Plainfield Preparative and its particular meeting; and Langhorne Meeting between last Eleventh and next Fifth Month.

Fourteen schools under the care of our members are reported as within our limits.

Of the six hundred and eighty-one children between five and twenty years of age reported by the Quarterly Meetings, one hundred and ninety-six have been at Monthly or Preparative Meeting Schools, one hundred and thirty-six at Westtown, sixty-four at various schools under Friends, twenty-eight at colleges or normal schools, fifteen at family or private schools, thirty taught at home, one hundred and forty-seven at public schools, and three unknown as to schooling. Thus four hundred and fifty-nine out of the six hundred and nineteen at school were placed in Friends' schools.

Three Monthly Meetings were reported as entirely clear of the use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage, and its general diminution apparent in others was encouraging.

The report of Westtown School elicited much interest and commendation of the faithfulness of the Committee.

The number of pupils enrolled in the school in the spring term, 1904, was one hundred and sixty-six (seventy-four boys, ninety-two girls), and in the fall term one hundred and eighty-three (seventy-nine boys and one hundred and four girls). The attendance of children from other Yearly Meetings has been larger than at any previous date,—even fifty-six, or thirty per cent. of the whole. The preponderance of pupils in the upper classes, due to the improvement of our Monthly Meeting and other schools, is noticeable. Peculiar advantages installed in the school and given by nature in the country, with practical gardening and other manual training as well as domestic, have combined to make conditions for good health remarkably effective. Well qualified lecturers, earnest and practical men, have been employed to enlarge the minds of children for their future place in life, through the knowledge and views which such instructors clearly elucidate. The change in arrangements for the First-day of the week have seemed satisfactory. The Scripture Classes, by readings and historical views, now come in the morning before meeting, and the recitation of memorized portions of the Bible is assigned to Fifth-day morning. The "Quiet Hour" observed on First-day afternoons by children remaining in the building in rest or individual occupations where stillness is welcomed, proves advantageous mentally and physically. The religious readings formerly held in the morning of First-day are now given after supper. The total income of the School for the year has been $53,297.36, and the expenditures have amounted to $57,193.68, the balance against the institution being $3,896.52. The Committee feel that "at no period during the more than a century of its existence has there been a more sustained effort to keep in touch with what is best in the advances in education throughout the country." The endeavor of the Committee, and of "a faculty of conscientious men and women trained for their work, is to maintain a solid basis which will prove good footing for our pupils in their years to come."

The imbuement of the minds of our children with right views and principles according to the religious doctrine and worship in which we most surely believe, under conditions of their mental development and intellectual education, was dwelt upon by interested hearers of the report.

Sixth-day, 21st.—The Educational Committee in care of our primary schools reported their aim to bring them to a standard of excellence and uniformity of instruction which shall make them stepping-stones to Westtown or other of our advanced schools. Fourteen schools have been under the care of the Committee. The total number of pupils three hundred and sixty-one, as last year. Atlantic City and Lansdowne Schools are giving much promise. Teachers' Meetings have been held monthly and well attended, and several courses of instruction given to teachers by some of our principal instructors in their special departments. A loaning library has supplied to them valuable reading. Two thousand dollars were appropriated for the use of this Committee.

The Indian Committee reported the school at Tunesassa as containing twenty-four boys and twenty-six girls. Visits, which have been encouraging to them, were paid to Indian families at their homes. Religious instruction is faithfully administered in the school. The results of school work among the children are gratifying. The farm maintains its standard and valuable equipment. A serious loss was sustained in the destruction of the creamery by fire. This has been replaced at a cost of $1300. There are one thousand and seventeen Senecas belonging to the Allegheny Reservation, and one thousand four hundred and nineteen on the Cattaraugus Reservation, also two hundred Onondagas and Cayugas on the two. These, with other New York tribes, make up nearly five thousand Indians, who are entitled to a distribution of over $300 to each individual, resulting from past arrangements with the government. Receipts have been $14,612 for the year and expenses $13,830. The Meeting appropriated $2500 for the Indian service; also $2000 for its own use for the coming year.

Thomas H. Whitson and Job S. Gidley having at the same time been brought under a sense of a spiritual service to be delivered in the Women's Meeting, were released to perform it, accompanied by an Elder.

The reading of the letter to Absent Members, already referred to, and of the exercises on the State of the Society, was followed by a solemnity both in silence and in utterance in which hearts were baptized under a sense of Divine good, of gratitude for the continual evidence of much brotherly love and condescension, and of desire for our deeper establishment hereafter in the truth and life of the Gospel.

Non-essentials as Guards of Essentials.

[The following letter to a Friend, from one who is not a member with us, but a serious, thoughtful man, contains a warning respecting the effects of conformity to the world, which it would be well for some of our members to heed.—C. A. S.]

I very much fear that on the walls of many Friends' Meeting-houses, ICHABOD may be written, because the staid, uncompromising principles of half a century ago are either lost or inoperative.

The present is sadly an age of untold conformity, and even those whom we vainly would hope to know something of the saving work of God's Spirit, show by dress, display, amusements, and other things, how ready they are to be conformed to this world. I very much fear that there is far too little of uncompromising devotedness to Christ and following in his footsteps.

My prayer is, that God may revive the spirit of old-fashioned Quakerism. We want the practical rebuke that the plain dress gives, yes, and the plain language, too.

I am well aware that the characteristics of the kingdom of God are not these externals, but that non-essentials are often the sentinels to guard essentials.

But what we most want is more of the power of the Holy Spirit in us, operating with his enlightening, purifying influences. We need to yield ourselves more to his gracious guidance, and to seek after greater conformity to the mind of Christ Jesus. May God be graciously pleased to overrule and sanctify to your spiritual welfare the great trials through which you have passed.

May He give you much of the comfort of the Holy Ghost, and enable you to go forward in the King's highway of holiness with the joy of the Lord as your strength, even by the power of a living faith, looking to Jesus, that you may be accepted in the Beloved One. At last may we who differ on earth enjoy the same Heaven, and may we feel even now that we are one in Christ Jesus.

Very truly your friend in the faith and hope of the gospel. T. J. H.

"And they that know thy name, will put their trust in Thee, for thou, Lord! hast not forsaken them that seek thee."

"They that sow in tears
Shall reap in joy."

Sang a poet-heart in the long ago,
"Midst depths of sorrow, pain and woe;
And what to him was truth and life
And shone through all the ages' strife,
To be at last our beacon-light
Of comfort in the darkest night.
They that sow in tears
Shall reap in joy."

John Burnyeat.

Prepared for Friends' Reading Meeting, Mooretown by J. Whitall Nicholson.

The year was 1653. The civil war over; England was in the hands of the Commonwealth, and Cromwell had just dissolved Parliament with the words "Your hour come, the Lord hath done with you."

"Now," says George Fox, "were great threatenings given forth in Cumberland, if I ever came there again they would away my life. When I heard it I was drawn to go into Cumberland, and went to M. Wennington's, in the same parish from which those threatenings came."

There was in Cumberland at this time man, aged about 22 years, John Burnyeat name. "His parents," it is recorded, "of good repute, and his education was according to his parentage." His heart inclined after righteousness. He diligently read Scriptures, and took counsel from men reputed experience, for his soul's peace.

He sought the Lord but knew not where to find Him. To such an one George Fox spoke in vain. "Blessed be the Lord," says Burnyeat, "and the day of mercy in which he visited for He was pleased to make this labor of all effectual unto thousands, amongst whom sent his servant to labor, and amongst whom it pleased the Lord to grant me the favor to keep a share of the benefit of this blessed visitation, whereby I came to be informed concerning the right way of the Lord, directed to the true light, which the apostle was sent to turn people unto in his day, as so from the darkness and the power of Satan unto God and his blessed power, which in waiting in his light I received."

Not all at once was Burnyeat prepared for the public labors which occupied most of his after life. For four years he continued loving what he always refers to, quite implicitly, as his "Outward calling or profession," but diligently attending meetings and communing with his brothers in the faith. At length, however, as he says, the Lord began to stir in his heart, by His Spirit arising and go forth in the strength of His word and declare against the hirelings who called themselves and not the people. Though he would willingly have shunned this duty, he could find no peace until he yielded in spirit and gave up to do the will of the Lord.

Straightway, then, he faced a priest in his own "bell house," but failed in fully carrying out his mission through fear of prison. He never failed through his own fault again. When he realized that he had not been faithful, a sore cry prevailed in him: "Curse is he that doeth the work of the Lord negligently!" the wrath of God was upon him, and he had no peace until, after prayer and waiting, it was revealed to him that he might again and clear himself. Then he arose valiantly and boldness, and went with speed to the "village house," where the priest was speaking in the afternoon. This time there was no faltering; what the Lord put into his mouth he said, and when the priest fled from the house, followed him, and cried after him, that he turned again in the graveyard. Thus did John Burnyeat clear his conscience to the priest, and a great dispute they had, and was priest would stay no longer, Burnyeat went to the people, cleared his conscience from them, and came away in peace, his heart full of unspeakable joy, and his soul in gladness.

These were perilous times for priests in New England. John Burnyeat had come to see and see the woe and dreadful state that they were in, who, for their own earthly gain, were the merchandise of people, seeking after more than the flock; who were in transgression of the laws of God; gainers of the truth, and lovers of the wages of unrighteousness; whose labors brought forth no fruits to God. Feeling thus, Burnyeat made various visits to priests while they were preaching in their "steeple houses," and he "cleared himself," as he expresses of his concern regarding them. The result was always great peace to his soul, and sometimes great pain to his body, and finally he was imprisoned in the common gaol at Carlisle, where he remained three and twenty weeks.

While in prison, as he expresses it, "something came upon him for Scotland," and as he says "not yet deeply acquainted with the power and work of the Lord's power and spirit relation to such a service," he at first shrank from entering upon it; but upon giving his own will he came to feel a readiness, strength and ability for the work which he was called upon to perform.

Thus he started on the first of the many missions which occupied his whole after life. His work was "to call people to repentance, to strip their lifeless, hypocritical profession of dead formalities, wherein they were set in the ignorance of the true and living God; and so to turn them into the true light of Christ Jesus in their hearts; that therein they might come to know the power of God, and also come to know remission of sins, and receive an inheritance among the sanctified." He traveled for three months over rough and dangerous roads, afoot or on horseback, his service was at steeple-houses, market-places, and wherever else he could meet with people, and at Friends' Meetings, where he ministered to them.

Being clear of Scotland he returned home and worked at his trade until called to go upon a new mission.

Whenever the Quakers were persecuted, he came John Burnyeat. When they were imprisoned, he visited them, and sometimes ministered imprisonment with them. For him no prison was too hard and no danger too great. In the faithful he was full of tender counsel and brave cheer, a strengthener of the weak and an encourager of the upright. He was "dreadful and terrible" to the hypocrite and rebellious, and gave no quarter to the traitor of separation wherever he found it.

His labors led him through England, Scotland and Ireland. Twice he crossed the ocean to America, visiting in Barbadoes, Maryland and New England.

He was a good people of Massachusetts were not his time hanging Quakers, and in some respects Burnyeat appears to have fared better in America than in England, as he was never beaten nor imprisoned. The difficulties he met with were, however, quite sufficient to ward off home-sickness. It was his lot, both in Barbadoes and in

New England, to deal with the followers of a certain John Ferrot, who went beyond reason in preaching the avoidance of forms, holding that to remove the hat during prayer, and even to attend meeting, were forms to be avoided and condemned.

In Rhode Island he had to deal with one Gorton and his company, Ranters, who, in the words of Thomas Storey, "held absurd and blasphemous opinions, and frequently come into our meetings, and rant, sing and dance, and act like madmen, throwing dust into the faces of our ministers when preaching. Though they are called Quakers, and have meetings of their own, as we have, yet they have no discipline or order among them, but deny all that, as carnal and formal, leaving every one to do as he pleases, without any reproof, restraint or account to the Society, in anything how consistent soever with civility, morality, and religion, and are in mere anarchy."

William Edmondson, who also at this time came in contact with this curious people in America, tells of a Ranter who came into a meeting which he held at the house of Richard Hartsborne, at Middletown, New Jersey. This man came into the meeting with his face blackened, and said it was his justification and sanctification. He sang and danced, and, approaching Edmondson, called him an old rotten priest. But, says Edmondson, "the Lord's power filled my heart, and his Word was powerful and sharp in my heart and tongue."

While Burnyeat was in Rhode Island, Roger Williams issued a challenge, with fourteen propositions, which were really charges against the Quakers, and engaged to maintain them against all comers, the first seven to be disputed in Rhode Island, and the latter seven at Providence. Like George Fox, Burnyeat was no man to refuse a challenge, and he, with William Edmondson, maintained a three days' dispute with Williams, over the first seven propositions. Williams evidently was not convinced, but he failed, at least in the opinion of the Quakers, to make proof of his charges to the satisfaction of the large congregations which attended every day. William Edmondson and John Stubbs attended to the dispute at Providence; they spent one day with Williams there, and, as Burnyeat says, "came away when they had done with him." The matter was not ended there, for some years afterwards George Fox records that he and Burnyeat spent some time in answering a very envious and wicked book which Williams had written against truth and Friends. This answer was published under the name of "New England Fire Brand Quenched."

While on his second visit to America Burnyeat joined George Fox in Maryland, and traveled with him to New England. They went, says Fox, "through the wilderness and through many rivers and desperate bogs, where they said never Englishman or horse had traveled before; where we lay out at night and sometimes in Indian towns, and many times very hard put to it for provisions."

The latter part of Burnyeat's life was much spent in Ireland, and in 1683 he married, in Dublin, and made that city his headquarters. He approached matrimony in a very serious manner, and made his choice of a wife with particular reference to the concord and unity of Friends and brethren. In a letter he refers to his marriage as follows: "We have now accomplished that concern of marriage which we have for some time been under; and blessed be the Lord, he has been unto us a comfortable director in our undertaking in this matter, to the satisfaction of Friends in general, who were with us."

Settled, married life must have been a strange experience to one so used to strenuous activity, but the monotony was soon relieved, for within three months of his wedding day, Burnyeat found himself confined in the Marshalsea prison in Dublin. This was all in the day's work for Burnyeat, and we may hope that the new bride faced this early interruption of domestic bliss with some of the Christian fortitude that her husband always showed.

In his dealings with the magistrates, Burnyeat appears to have been respectful and reasonable, but firm to his convictions. His account of his particular commitment is as follows:—"The last First-day the mayor sent the marshal to our meeting in the forenoon; I was speaking, and he commanded me to go with him, which after some discourse I did. He commanded the meeting to disperse, but Friends kept quiet in their places. I was carried before the mayor, with whom I had some discourse, to this effect:—He asked me why we did act contrary to the government, having been commanded not to meet? I told him, we do nothing in contempt of the government. But, said he, why do you not obey then? I said, because it is matter of conscience to us, and that which we believe to be our indispensable duty, to meet together to worship God. To which he answered, you may be misled. I told him if we were misled, we were willing to be informed, if any could do it. Then it was urged, other dissenters had submitted, and why would not we? I said, what they do will be no plea for us before the judgment-seat of the great God. So, after some other discourse, the mayor committed me to this prison."

In 1688, William of Orange landed in England, and King James II fled to France. For some time past James had worked towards making Ireland a refuge for himself in case of trouble. The army there had been remodelled by disbanding its Protestant soldiers and filling the ranks with Catholics. The Bench of Judges had been treated in like manner, and Catholic mayors and Catholic sheriffs set at the head of every city and county. The Protestants in Ireland looked at all this with the deepest apprehension, and the terror of a massacre spread among them, so that those who could fled the country.

This state of affairs became more acute when the banished James landed in Ireland with his French allies, in an effort to retain that island for himself. The country was plunged into a war, which became so bitter that the envoy of the King's ally even dared to propose a general massacre of all Protestants, and justified his suggestion by the saying, "Mercy to Protestants is cruelty to Catholics." At this time no family ties bound John Burnyeat to Ireland, and he might easily have placed himself out of the reach of trouble, but trouble was a thing John Burnyeat never shunned.

A testimony of several Friends in Ireland in his behalf is, in part, as follows:—

"Now, after the death of his wife, he had some intentions to go for England, and sent his son thither; but seeing the troubles of war coming on, and that many afflictions and exercises would attend us, and that many people being possessed with great fears fled for England; at which time many testimonies came from Friends of sundry meetings, for all to mind the Lord's preserving power, and not to let fears take hold of them, as it did of others, who knew not the Lord. Our dear friend, though he had an opportunity, had no freedom to go for England; but gave himself up to stay with Friends here, and bear a part of the sufferings that might attend us. In which time he was a precious instrument in the Lord's hand for the comforting his people in the time of great afflictions and calamities; for he was a cheerful encourager of us."

The death of John Burney occurred in 1690, in about the fifty-ninth year of his age. He died in harness, while engaged in traveling for the purpose of holding meetings through Ireland.

In his Journal, while alluding at some length to his spiritual experiences, he is always extremely brief and to the point as regards other matters. He can say much in few words, as might be expected of one whose chief model was the Bible. His published letters are much fuller in expression, as they deal almost entirely with spiritual matters.

We can regard Burney as a strong and active man, great of heart and of superb courage, with a faith in his Heavenly Father that nothing could shake, and a determination to follow Divine guidance, with no thought as to what the consequences to himself might be. A lovable man, tender and sympathetic, full of encouragement and wise counsel. "He preached," says George Fox, "in his life and conversation as well as in his words."

G. FOX, FROM DERBY PRISON, 1650.—The Lord is King over all the earth; therefore, all people, praise and glorify your King in true obedience, in uprightness, and in the beauty of holiness. Oh! consider, in true obedience the Lord is known, and an understanding from Him is received. Mark and consider in silence, in lowness of mind, and thou wilt hear the Lord speak unto thee in thy mind. His voice is sweet and pleasant; his sheep hear his voice, and will not hearken to another when they hear his voice, they rejoice and are obedient; they also sing for joy. Oh! their hearts are filled with everlasting triumph! they sing and praise the eternal God in Zion. Their joy man shall never take from them. Glory to the Lord God for evermore.

A CHURCH that stands for nothing tangible is a schism in the body of Christ. It has no right to a separate existence. It is to be regarded rather as a hindrance than a help to the cause of Christ. The sooner it disappears from the horizon the less harm will be done. Division in the church can be justified only when valuable truths are to be preserved and made known. A church is sometimes placed in such a position as to antagonize instead of conserve true doctrine. Then it is required that God's people come out from her and be separate.—Christian Instructor.

BEFORE IT IS TOO LATE.

If you have a gray-haired mother
In the old home far away,
Sit down and write the letter
You put off day by day.
Don't wait until her tired steps
Reach heaven's pearly gate,
But show her that you think of her
Before it is too late.

If you're a tender message,
Or a loving word to say,
Don't wait till you forget it,
But whisper it to-day.
Who knows what bitter memories
May haunt you if you wait?
So make your loved ones happy
Before it is too late.

We live but in the present,
The future is unknown;
To-morrow is a mystery,
To-day is all our own.
The chance that fortune leads to
May vanish while we wait,
So spend your life's rich pleasure
Before it is too late.

The tender word unspoken,
The letters never sent,
The long-forgotten messages,
The wealth of love unspent,
For these some hearts are breaking,
For these some loved ones wait;
So show them that you care for them
Before it is too late.

Papyrus, Then and Now.

The papyrus plants of ancient Egypt are not all dead, though papyrus paper making is a long-lost art. As a beautiful ornamental plant the papyrus thrives to-day, and is perhaps destined to become a favorite along the banks of our warmer streams and rivers. In Florida or Louisiana, in a noiseless electric launch, the visitor may then glide up creeks and winding rivers, and drift back some thousand years into the dim and hazy days when the Pharaohs and the Ptolemies and Cleopatra ruled the land of earliest civilization.

In the days of paper-making Egypt, the banks of the Nile near the sea must have been covered with great stretches of this wonderful plant. The bas-reliefs on Egyptian monuments show the methods of this culture, while the great Alexandrian library, with its half million long papyrus rolls, burned by the ruthless Mohammedans, gives an idea of the extent of its manufacture, and throughout the Nile delta were large plantations of this graceful and lordly plant.

As late as the eighteenth century travelers in Egypt found the fellahen or peasants making mats of papyrus, although the art of paper-making has been long dead. To-day you may search lower Egypt in vain for a single plume of papyrus, although on the upper reaches of the Nile you can still lose yourself in its dense forests, which everywhere line the banks of the sluggish river. The few plants now growing in the Ezlee Keya garden in Cairo are said to have been imported there from Ilamburg.

It seems strange that a plant which once played such a role in the world of literature and history should have become so neglected that probably not one in ten thousand of the people of the United States could tell what it is like or would know it if they saw it, except if they would recognize a plant surpassingly beautiful.

The papyrus of old Egypt would add an irresistible charm to our southern waterways. Enthusiasts on beautiful plant forms it would well worth a visit to Sicily just for a look the miles of papyrus which overhang the Anapo River, as well as its source, a deep clear spring just outside the ancient city of Syracuse. It is difficult to conceive a more brilliant or more fairy-like sight than the thousands of smooth slender, leafless stems, rising in graceful curves from the water to a height of fifteen feet, bearing at their summits feather-duster tassels of delicate green filaments. As the boat wends in and out among this multitude of slender stems, or as you separate the tassels with nearly touch overhead, it is easy to believe yourself in a tropical forest, where all the tree trunks are brilliant green and all the leaves are threads of but a lighter vivid hue. The wealth of papyrus on the Anapo is one of the most fascinating sights in the world, and every thousands of visitors make the excursions from Syracuse to view it.

If the experiments which are being started with the papyrus by the office of plant introduction of the Department of Agriculture are as successful as the agricultural scientists in charge of the office hopes, that plant may become a favorite ornament in Florida, where many streams like the Anapo are to be found, and where thousands of visitors repair annually to look upon and enjoy strange plants and fruits and to thaw the cold and frost from the marrow of their bones.

Recent excavations at Abusir have brought home the universal importance of papyrus illuminating many a dark spot in ancient history and literature. In one of the graves Abusir was discovered, in Second Mo., 1906, a papyrus roll containing a large portion of a poem Peral of Timotheus. The papyrus was found in a wooden coffin still containing a corpse, together with a pair of sandals, a bronze leather bag, a piece of rust-eaten iron, and a fragment of burned wood. All these objects are now at the Royal Museum of Berlin, and the papyrus has been published with the transcription, paraphrase, comments and a similar reproduction in hieroglyphs, by Professor Dr. Ulrich von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf. The papyrus measures 18.5 centimetres in height, and when unrolled has a length of 11 metres. It is inscribed with six columns of varied width and unequal number of lines of archaic Greek characters, resembling the style of monumental inscriptions, so that in the opinion of Professor Wilamowitz, this papyrus represents the oldest book known, antedating the founding of the library of Alexandria and the establishing of the Alexandrian book trade. The last four columns are on the whole well preserved, while the first column, not protected by covering, is crumbled into minute fragments, and of the second column the lower part is for the most part destroyed. A narrow margin on the first column, showing traces of having been cut through, proves that only part of the scroll had been deposited in the grave.

We have, therefore, in this papyrus only the latter portion of the work. The fact, however, that Timotheus names himself as a or, and that it treats of the naval defeat of Persia, King, suffices to establish its identity with the Persai of Timotheus, which celebrates the naval victory of the Greeks over the king of Persia, in 480 B. C. at Salamis, which was one of the decisive battles of the Greco-Persian Wars. Timotheus was a celebrated poet and musician, who was born in Miletus, Asia Minor, and died at an advanced age about 357 B. C.—GUY E. MITCHELL, in the Atlantic American.

Sea-Life at the Bermuda Islands.

Prof. Edward L. Mark, Director of the Biological Laboratory of Harvard University, in an article in "The Popular Science Monthly" for the Fourth Month, 1905, describing the Biological Station for Research at Bermuda, writes as follows:—"In the immediate vicinity of the Inlet, and in Harrington Sound, is found an abundant supply of many interesting animals. From the stone pier at the Inlet are to be seen great numbers of brightly colored fishes: the yellow-banded 'sergeant-fishes'; sea squirrels, so called on account of the brightness of their eyes; angel-fishes; . . . many others. . . . Schools of blue fry (other small fishes pursued by their enemies) flash in the sunlight as they leap from the water and a sound like the patter of rain as they descend. Small shoals of 'white grunt,' which so closely resemble the sandy bottom as to be almost invisible, are slowly patrolling along the beach and often attract one's attention when their presence causes a commotion among their prospective victims. The water is so clear that the bottom at a depth of fifteen to twenty feet is seen as distinctly as it would be beneath as many inches of our Northern Bay. . . . Where the channel is rocky and the water moves with greater velocity, the bottom is often gorgeously painted with patches of bright-colored corallines and encrusting sponges. Opposite the hotel an artificial channel through the narrow neck of land that separates the Inlet from Harrington Sound is of its nature, and affords a rich collecting ground for many invertebrates. With a row-boat and a good water-glass, one may study the delight the shores of Harrington Sound afford in numerous coves, and get beautiful views of the delicate shade-corals, the many kinds of sponges, and the sponges, which abound here. . . . I recall with pleasure not only my own fascination, but also the expressions of delight which involuntarily came from the lips of all who, with water-glass in hand, peered into the fairy-like gardens of the sea, or slowly drifted with the tide, or lay at anchor in the midst of one of the great coral reefs that flourish over extensive areas of the north lagoon. I confess the pleasure was great that the spirit of the collector was expressed for the time being; it seemed sacrilegious to touch with violent hands a picture that showed such harmony of form and color, the waving plumes, the graceful branches of the Spongia, Sea-fans in purple splendor, coral of gold and green, great patches of sponges encrusting the rocks, the soft corals; here and there deep channels with water that the clear water and the white sand made it; and in and out among this maze of living things, the graceful, noiseless fishes of every array of colors as is scarcely credible, much less describable. I believe it may be truly said that one who has never seen such a tropical sea-garden cannot have the remotest idea of its charm. There was only one consideration that could reconcile me to the wanton work of collecting these beautiful things and robbing them of their native charm; that was the fact that, work as diligently as we might, we could not deface one in a thousand of these fascinating spots. I think there is no other single experience I would willingly exchange for this, and yet I recall one other of a somewhat different nature that made a strong impression on me. As three of us were out one afternoon off the south shore beyond the reefs, fishing in about sixty fathoms, there came floating past with the tide a school of Jelly-fishes, the common Aurelia. I had before seen Aurelia almost cover the surface of the sea, but never before had I been able to look down, as then, and see them in the depth of the sea. They were seemingly without end, a vast procession, smaller and smaller the deeper one gazed, until they seemed mere specks, such was the clearness of the water. . . . One of the most remarkable sights that I saw in these tropical seas was viewed through a water-glass near North Rocks. A school of small fishes swimming in a nearly spherical mass ten or fifteen feet in diameter, seemed to be slowly revolving through the water as its individuals swam round and round in an almost solid mass. It was not at first apparent how the mass preserved such a constant form, but at length it was seen that a few individuals of another and larger species of fish were acting the part of the shepherd-dog and that the smaller fishes were actually being herded, a flock of submarine sheep. Nor do the herding fishes prey upon their flocks. The explanation is interesting. Three kinds of fishes are involved in this association. The herders accompany and 'round up' the smaller fishes so that other kinds of fish which are wont to prey upon the mmy, as they approach with murderous intent, fall victims to the herders."

The Unfinished Wall.

Midway between our home and the village of Athens, Ontario, bordering the roadside, stands an ancient stone wall about two feet high, three feet wide, and about sixty rods long, which at the time of building had cedar posts set therein, and a tastefully-arranged fence on it; but time's ever-rolling tide has not only necessitated the erection of another fence on the same foundation, that of the old stone wall, but has also borne the builder thereof from works to reward; whose name was Otis Smith, a minister in the Society of Friends, and member of Leeds Monthly Meeting. But the reason why the wall was not extended the entire width of his farm of about eighty rods wide is the cause of its memory being cherished, and it has been often repeated to us by those familiar with the silent testimony which it has so long borne to the faithful manner in which he strove to serve his God.

Having improved every available opportunity during the summer, when not otherwise occupied, in the construction of the wall, he set about it again in the Fall, intent on its completion before the freezing weather set in. But at this important juncture his mind became suddenly impressed that it was required of him to leave all and go forth, as he had often done before, laboring in love for the welfare of his fellow-beings, and preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ. Having laid the burden of his mind before the meeting to which he belonged, and being liberated and encouraged to pursue such service as he apprehended his Heavenly Father had appointed him unto, he still deferred for a short time engaging therein, feeling that all flesh is fraught with weakness and liable to err, seeking carefully that he might be rightly directed, and in the meantime was diligently engaged building the wall, hoping to be favored with its completion before leaving.

About this time, as he was one evening busily engaged at the wall, his mind became absorbed in anticipation of the service awaiting him, and his soul so filled with the love of God that he became vocally exercised in gospel love, it being a quiet, wooded portion of the roadside, and in his two-fold occupation he failed to notice the approach of a young man who, being attracted by the sound, walked cautiously along, with, as he recently told me, only mischief in view, close to where Uncle Otis, as he called him, was working and preaching. But after listening for awhile to his low, but earnest appeals, for sinners to turn and accept offered mercy, he became sobered in his thoughts, and finally melted to tears; and before leaving he went and shook hands with the old man, who, with manifest embarrassment, exclaimed, "I sometimes become so much concerned for the welfare of my fellow-beings, and my mind so filled with the love of Christ, that I almost forget my surroundings." Thus he wrought, until one night he dreamed that he stood beside a large pond of water with a fish spear in his hand, and as he looked over the edge into the water, could see at the bottom such quantities of large fish as he had never witnessed before; but the surface of the water was so covered with driftwood that he found it difficult to use the spear, and set about removing the driftwood, but when the surface was cleared the fish was no longer to be seen, but after waiting awhile the fish returned, but again the driftwood had accumulated, and was again removed with the same result. When he therefore awoke, he felt convinced that should he longer defer engaging in the service which he felt the Lord required of him, for the sake of finishing the wall, and thus remove the driftwood, the opportunity might therewith pass forever.

All else was then left, that he might perform what he apprehended was his Master's bidding, and ere he returned from his journey, which included not only various parts of Canada, but also a somewhat extensive journey in the United States, winter had fairly set in, and in the following spring he sold his farm and moved to Iowa. Thus, the unfinished wall by the roadside has for more than fifty years bespoken the faithfulness of its builder, who, having finished his course has, we trust, entered into everlasting rest. E. R.

He was born in the State of Rhode Island. His parents were John and Damaris Hull, who were members of our religious Society; and in the early part of his life, by their consent, he removed and settled within the verge of Purchase Monthly Meeting; where and at New York he resided until the year 1777, when he removed with his family within the limits of this meeting, then a part of Nine Partners Monthly Meeting, and became a useful member thereof, being exemplary in the diligent attendance of our religious meetings and encouraging his family therein. In the year 1781, he appeared in the ministry, and was servicable therein; the young and rising generation particularly claimed his attention; to many of whom he was endeared by his tender and fatherly advice. He often pressingly entreated those unto whom he ministered, to close in with this day of their visitation; and sometimes in private conversation was heard to say that he regretted nothing more than that he did not in his youthful days give up to walk in the paths of piety and virtue. He was divers times acceptably engaged in visiting families within the compass of this Monthly Meeting, a service he appeared to be well qualified for; and frequently visited the adjacent meetings, particularly those newly set up. He often not only advised it, but was himself in the practice of retiring in stillness; and at times convened his family upon the same important occasion.

In the year 1793, soon after his return from a religious visit in the western settlements of this State, he was brought very low by a fit of sickness, his life not being expected, either by himself or his friends, to be prolonged; at which time his faith appeared unshaken; saying, "My confidence is in the Lord, and in Him will I trust; I feel his presence to be near, which is above all, and I can rejoice in tribulation."

At another time, his children being by his bedside, he looking upon them, said, "If it is the Lord's will that I shall go now, I am entirely willing;" soon after, with an audible voice, "Oh, Lord! be graciously pleased to take me to thyself, or endure me with patience to bear my pains; yet not only my will but thine be done; try me any way that will be most agreeable to thy holy will."

The same day divers Friends coming to see him, he said, "This is a hard struggle between life and death; I do not know which will have the victory; but let which will, I believe I shall be the Lord's," with much instructive advice and counsel to many that came to see him during his last illness; from this sickness he gradually recovered.

He was taken ill of his last sickness the eighteenth of the Ninth Month, while sitting in our Monthly Meeting; in which he manifested the same fervency of spirit in his religious labors that had hitherto accompanied them. In the evening he signified to some of his family, he believed that was the last meeting he should attend.

His disorder proving to be the dysentery, his strength failed fast. On Fourth-day morning following, after a wearisome night, he expressed a desire for stillness and an easy passage, as he believed his time here would not be long. Soon after, being more free from pain, divers Friends being present, he said that at the last Monthly Meeting he attended he thought at the time, it would be the last, and that he felt his mind impressed with something to deliver, but did not, for the want of an opportunity; which was, that Friends in all appointments in the church be careful not to appear such as were in the practice of sleeping in meetings, referring to the frequent advice of the Yearly Meeting on that subject. Then addressing himself to his youngest son, he gave him much instructive counsel and advice. After which, lying still awhile, he was fervently engaged in prayer that the Lord would be graciously pleased to be near in this trying time, and that he would remember Friends of the little meeting to which he belonged, that the extendings of Divine regard might be to his family, and that they with Friends might be kept as in the hollow of the Lord's hand. After which, his disorder being very sore upon him, he expressed but little; though, at times, he was engaged in prayer, and in the expression of a few words of love and tenderness to such as came to see him, bearing his pains with Christian patience and waiting for the time to come, that he might be relieved from them. He departed this life on the twenty-eighth of the Ninth Month, 1795, aged about sixty-two years.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The Onondagas were the last tribe visited. Of them they say that they "have not, it is believed, receded in their condition since 1865, but, on the contrary, the deputation got the impression from some of their number that there was a little improvement, particularly manifested in their greater interest in school education and attendance of their religious meetings. About fifty men met the Friends at their council-house. The plan of letting out their land to white people on this, as well as other Reservations, is one which, while it impoverishes the soil, gives much less income to the Indians than if they would cultivate it themselves, besides bringing them in closer contact with a class whose influence is far from being promotive of their best welfare. Their attention was called to this injurious system, and they were encouraged to avoid it hereafter. The practice of commencing to clear portions of the land and then abandoning it to grow up with bushes, and the party so beginning holding the control of it, the Friends tried to show them was not just, and we had reason to believe retarded the effectual clearing of the land, and preparing it for cultivation. There appeared to be a necessity of repeating to the Onondagas what had been said to the other tribes, and they were accordingly encouraged to get more school-houses and teachers, and send their children to them, to avoid intemperance, playing cards, idleness, immorality, and all other vices; and especially to regard the marriage covenant; and to become good men and women."

The following general remarks in reference to this visit occur in the report of the Committee to the Yearly Meeting in 1869, "From the observations of the deputation, they were encouraged to believe that there is a steady advancement among an increasing number of them, in orderly conduct and industrious habits, and more concern is manifest for the pro instruction and restraint of their children. Many of them have joined religious societies from conviction, and seem much interested in promoting the views held by those bodies, and encouraging their associates to lead moral and religious lives." The deputation remarks in their report that in their intercourse with several tribes, they had repeated evidence of the confidence and esteem which the Indians have for members of our religious Society and they were confirmed in the belief that such visits afford good opportunities to stimulate them in well doing, and may, with Divine blessing, prove a real advantage to them."

In the autumn of 1869 another visit was paid by members of the Committee to the Tonawanda Reservation, who stated in their report that "no whites are living on the Reservation, but some of the land is till under rent by the neighboring farmers. The soil is of excellent quality, is generally cleared and well cultivated, and several Indians have farms of fifty acres and upwards, and appear to be industrious and thrifty. One chief has one hundred and fifty acres under cultivation. In the neatness and comfort of their homes the same favorable condition as compared with the Allegheny Indians did not appear."

The visit of the Friends was well received. These Friends observed, while on the Allegheny Reservation, that a number of children in Tusnesassa were growing up without school learning from the alleged difficulty of sending them to a public school on the Reservation, about three miles distant. They recommended that a school-house should be erected in the neighborhood, and stated that they had ascertained that the State Superintendent of Indian Schools upon the Reservation would be willing to employ, as teacher, a member of our Society whom Friends might select and recommend. This subject received favorable consideration by the Committee, and a building was soon afterward erected, a number of Indians having assisted by hauling stone lumber needed in its construction, the labor of which was out upon Friends' property in Tusnesassa. The first teacher was Louisa Smith, a Friend from Coal Creek, Iowa, who opened a school in it Eleventh Month 14th, 1870, with an attendance of sixteen children, which soon afterwards increased to twenty-four. She resided with the family at Tusnesassa. A school has since been continued in the building, more or less regularly. After the erection of this building the Indians on the Allegheny Reservation had the opportunity of sending their children to eight schools, capable of accommodating two hundred and fifty children, all supported by the public funds. The Committee observe in their report to the Yearly Meeting in 1871, "There are twenty other schools for Indian children in the State. All of the schools are said to have been taught the past year, and thirty-two weeks, and attended by one thousand and twenty-six children, the daily average attendance being five hundred and fifty." It is gratifying to be informed that nine schools were taught by Indians, who are presented to have proved competent and needed well. The local superintendents of schools and the teachers state that there is an increasing interest in education on the part of both parents and pupils, and an improvement in punctual and regular attendance in the latter. The cost to the State of New York in supporting these schools during last year was $7803, and considering that the Indians pay no taxes, this large expenditure shows commendable liberality on the part of its authorities.

The Indians have of late appropriated funds of their national treasury for the erection of several school-houses, thus giving additional proof of their appreciation of the value of school instruction. The interest which they feel in this subject is decided evidence of advancement, as within comparatively few years much opposition was shown to the establishment of schools among them."

The following account of the funeral of an Indian woman on the Allegheny Reservation died about this time is extracted from a letter written by one of the women Friends then in at Tusnessau to a member of the Committee, and gives a glimpse of a solemn scene:

"Last Fifth-day I went down to see poor woman and found her asleep, yes, in the calm sleep of death. I could but rejoice that her sufferings were ended, the struggle over her purified spirit safe in the fold. She lay sensible till near the last, and told her friends that she was going to heaven, and requested to be laid in the corner of the field in which they live, which was about all I could do of the closing scene.

"I was at the funeral which took place in the evening, and was the only pale-face present. The occasion was a very solemn one. About an hour after I had been there, all were invited to the house (about forty), and all who could come down in the quiet. Presently an old gray-headed Indian reverently arose, uncovered his head, and addressed the assembly in his native tongue. After he took his seat the lid of the coffin was raised, and the relations gazed for some time upon the face of the dead. The coffin was closed and nailed by her brother. The funeral scene was very affecting.

"Her husband took leave of the corpse in the morning, and went to dig the grave, where he waited until the coffin was lowered and was placed above it; he turned slowly away, and disappeared in the woods. When an inquiry, the relatives think it their duty, as a mark of respect to the dead, to make the coffin and dig the grave. At the head of the grave was placed a board with this inscription:—Susan Curry, died June 1st, 1870, at nineteen years."

"We can know the depth of love only by the sacrifices it makes; the crucifixion proves Christ's love to be unfathomable.

"The love and greatness are not means, but ends! The love is not always treasures, always friends, always good great men? Three treasures—Love and Light, and the Holy Spirit; three friends, regular as infants' breath; and three firm friends, more sure than day and night—his Maker and the Angel Death.

WORLD'S POSTAGE STAMPS.—The total number of all known varieties of postage stamps issued by all the governments of the world up to the present time is 19,242. Of this number 205 have been issued in Great Britain and 5711 in the various British colonies and protectorates, leaving 13,326 for the rest of the world. Dividing the totals among the continents, Europe issued 4089, Asia 3628, Africa 4005, America, including the West Indies, 6095, and Oceania 1425. Salvador has issued more varieties of postage stamps than any other country, the number being 450.

The huge one-span arched steel bridge which is to carry the Cape to Cairo railroad across the waters of the Zambesi River, just below the Victoria Falls, will shortly be swung into position, says the Scientific American. This bridge will be the highest in the world, with a main span of 500 feet. About 40,000 tons of plant will be carried across the river at a point where the banks are over 600 feet apart, and this will be effected by means of an electric cableway. There will be little manual labor required, merely a few men for driving the electrical machinery, which will do all the hauling.

It is not generally known that there is a seaweed industry along the shore of New England and that a million pounds are gathered annually. At Rye Harbor alone 1000 barrels are gathered each season. Here is one instance in nature that the more you take the more you can have, for the moss grows so fast that when one crop is taken, another is ready for pulling in a month. One good gang can pull twenty barrels a day. The moss must be bleached again and again, turned and washed. Not until it is white and free from sand is it ready for market. At wholesale it is worth from 3 to 5 cents a pound. Besides being used for general cooking, it is chiefly sold to the breweries, where it is used for settling ale.

TO FIND ONE'S WAY OUT OF THE FOREST.—It's a strange thing, but when a man gets lost in the woods the first thing he usually does is to start out and run as fast as he can in a sort of a panic-stricken way. This is the very worst thing he can do. Nine times out of ten he will go around in a circle and meet his own tracks. He only exhausts his strength to no purpose.

I remember before I went in the Maine woods I had an idea that there were great bald spots and you could find your way from open to open as easy as walking the streets of a city. But my guide soon disabused me of that idea. He took me up on a high hill and then told me to climb a big tree. He went ahead and I followed him. As far as our eyes could see there was nothing but woods, woods, woods. There were tiny openings here and there that looked like the mouths of bushel baskets, but my guide told me that they were only small ponds. These openings were sometimes five miles and sometimes ten miles apart, as near as we could judge. I made up my mind that there would be wood enough to last after I was gone.

When you are lost in the woods, as I hope you never will be, there is one sure way to get out, if you are favored. Travel until you come to a little stream and follow it down. Nine times out of ten it will bring you your way out, or it will lead you out by its own windings. I have been spared many a long, cold night in the woods without food or shelter by this maneuver.

Items Concerning the Society.

Friends wishing to enjoy a money-saving tour to the Lewis and Clark Expedition in Oregon, including the Yellowstone Park and other most famed places of the Far West, are desired to correspond with Edgar A. Snipes of Haverford College.

A whole Quarterly Meeting which steadily contains no minister has either reached that high degree in worship that it is found worthy to do without vocal ministry; or else a settled unfaithfulness on the part of some members, is helping to benumb its spiritual life.

We learn of the sad news of the unexpected death of George Grubb, of Cork, Ireland, on the 9th instant. He had for twenty-five years been Clerk of Dublin Yearly Meeting, and both in the exercise of his gift in the ministry, and in his labors and standing for the fundamental principles of our profession, he occupied a foremost place among Friends in Ireland.

At the time of George Grubb's decease his youngest son was ill in Dublin with appendicitis. A letter has reached us saying he passed away at seven o'clock the next morning.

In the matter of brevity of utterance, which is too little considered in some sessions of the Yearly Meeting, not to speak of meetings for worship, one young man figured up that a speaker who should take up the time of the assembled four hundred men for half an hour, would be responsible for the amount of ten working days for one man. And each speaker who occupied but a minute took four hundred minutes of men's time, or nearly seven hours. This forces us to conclude, with a former minister, that at such times "speech should be very good to be better than silence."

Notes in General.

A new Biblical curiosity has appeared; the whole Bible having been written out in shorthand and printed from lithographed plates. The Pitman system was used.

Charles E. Hutchison has a very able article in the Churchman on "The Church and the Working-man," in which he says: "While the workingmen to a considerable extent may mistrust, or even hate, the Church, they are not unreligions any more than are men in general, nor are they un-Christian."

Timothy Richard, the English Baptist missionary who is thoroughly familiar with the origins of all reform movements within the empire of China, will visit this country before long to create sentiment favorable to the reduction, at least, of the military strength of Christendom, "so that missionary and reform movements in China may not be hampered by any inconsistency between professions of peace and deeds of war."

We would join the British Friend in its condemnation of the awful remark of the German Chancellor, who said in the Reichstag that it is a mistake "to yield to sentiment, and to confuse what is thought to be morally right or morally wrong with national advantage and disadvantage." Why, what else can be national advantage or disadvantage but individual conformity to the convictions of that righteousness which exalts a nation? "Certainly," says our contemporary, "the nations act only too freely on this (Chancellor's) principle. But we have not often seen such a cynical avowal since the 'Pious Elder' declared his 'creed':

"I don't believe in principle,
But oh! I do in interest."

The following discourses are to be given in a "Citizens' Conference on the Bible Principles of Civil Government," to be held on the first and 2nd day of Fifth Month, in the building of the First Baptist Church, Seventeenth Street above Walnut, Philadelphia:

We have received an extract from the Sun, of Springfield, Ohio, the following letter of Fred W. Barrett to his pastor, written Third Month 12, 1905:

"Dear Sir.—In your remarks this evening you requested all of us to take pencil and paper and write down any reason which prevents people from confessing Christ, except that they are ashamed of Him.

"I think few people now are ashamed of Christ. The reason they don't confess Him is because they know they are not repentant, and that therefore it would be hypocrisy to confess Him by partaking of baptism and the Lord's supper.

"Perhaps it sounds harsh for a minister to tell his audience they need to repent of sin—but repentance is certainly necessary before confession of Christ can mean anything.

"So also with Dr. ———'s sermon. All believers were urged to confess Christ—and repentance was never mentioned. True, Jesus said, 'Whoever believes on Him.' But a passage is not to be taken by itself; different passages interpret each other; and Jesus also said, 'Except you repent you shall all perish.' His teaching taken as a whole makes repentance as well as belief necessary before his blood will secure the pardon for sin.

"Repentance is seldom preached any more—it is all believe, believe, believe. At the beginning of the Gospel times few believed: people thought He was an impostor. But now there are very few in Springfield who do not believe. So what we lack is not belief so much as repentance; for there are thousands in Springfield who are not repentant—i. e., they are not willing to give up various kinds of sins.

"By belief I mean: 'I believe Jesus is the Christ.' By repentance I mean, 'I am trying to obey God in everything,' for repentance is given its right place in the sight of the people I think more will give themselves to God."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—President Roosevelt has been lately in Colorado upon a hunting excursion. It is stated that he will be visited by Secretary Lusk before he moves his camp too far into the wilds of Colorado, in order that important national business may be brought to his attention. By a law recently passed, the pure food laws in Pennsylvania are now said to be materially strengthened, and absolutely prohibit the use of preservatives of any kind, whether harmful or not, as an addition to food commodities with the view of preserving them.

The New York prohibition act employed at a bakery from working more than ten hours a day or sixty hours a week has been declared by the U. S. Supreme Court to be void. Justice Peckham, in delivering the majority opinion, said: "The general right to make a contract in relation to his business is part of the liberty of the individual, protected by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Under that provision no State can deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law. The right to purchase or sell labor is part of the liberty protected by this amendment, unless there are excluding conditions."

The secretary of the United Mine Workers asserts that in the Third Month that organization showed the largest number of members in its history, and is larger than any other labor body in the country in point of membership. The paid-up memberships number 298,379, besides 30,000 who are exempt from paying dues owing to strikes or slack work, making the total 328,379. It is said the next largest membership is in the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, with 191,000 names.

South Carolina is making a methodical effort to divert the stream of immigration to her territory. The State has about 14,000,000 acres of unoccupied land, and disquieters white persons to develop the fields and mines. Headquarters have been opened in New York City under auspices of a Commission of Immigration. Those coming from Southern Italy, it is supposed, would find a congenial home in the Southern States.

According to statistics furnished by Dr. Drake, of the Health Department of Chicago, the duration of life in that city has greatly increased since 1870, and it is now the most beautiful great city in the world.

A great decline in the price of wheat, deliverable next month, has taken place. Speculators had forced up the price to about $1.20 per bushel, when the Government reports respecting the prospects for a crop this year considerably in excess of that of last year caused a reaction, which resulted in a general desire to sell, and millions of dollars worth of wheat were lost by the speculators, who were no longer able to control the market.

While searching for fossils in the cretaceous soil of Staten Island, near Kreissherville, there was recently discovered specimens of amber. A large number of them were in the form of drops or tears of considerable size, but the larger number were irregular lumps as large as filberts. The amber was found in a lens shaped layer about three feet thick and eighteen feet in diameter. The bed was characterized by layers and closely packed masses of vegetable debris, consisting of leaves and twigs, and fragments of lignite and charcoal wood.

Governor Pennington has approved the Grim automobile bill, which regulates the speed limit of automobiles to a mile in six minutes in cities and boroughs; a mile in three minutes in the country; requires operators to take out a license, for which they shall pay $3, at the State Highway Department, requires the machine to carry a light in the front and the back, regulates the proceedings in case of accidents, and imposes a penalty. It goes into effect First Month 1st, 1906.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from London of the 23rd ult. says: An earthquake lasting several seconds, and occasioning much alarm, was felt about 2 o'clock this morning throughout Derbyshire and Yorkshire and in adjacent districts. There was trifling damage to walls and roofs in some places, but nothing serious is reported.

Japanese and Russian troops are reported to have had several encounters in Manchuria. A naval battle appears to be impending between Russian and Japanese war-ships off the coast of Asia.

A despatch from St. Petersburg says: The Minister of Agriculture is preparing a plan to meet the peasant demand for land, which contemplates practically the introduction of the American homestead system in the State domain of European Russia, which comprises 34 per cent. of the total area.

Disorder and unrest continue throughout Russia. Domestically visits and arrests by the police, and meetings of all classes of the people are forbidden and broken up by the police under the direction of local Governors. Large reinforcements of troops and especially of Cossacks have been brought to St. Petersburg. Arrests and searchings of the lodgings of suspects continue. General Troppoff has notified all manufacturers, retailers, and peddlers, and through house porters has warned every family that women and children must remain off the streets on "May Day."

It is said that for at least a generation past the first day of Fifth Month has been dreaded more than any other in the entire year in those parts of Europe where Nists, Communists, Anarchists and other peace-disturbers have chosen that day for meetings.

The circulation of revolutionary literature among troops throughout Russia has now spread to the regiments of the Imperial Guards, and a general order has been issued to the guards forbidding them to read proclamations thrust into their hands in the streets.

Dr. B. Laquer, in a paper on "Social Hygiene in United States," submitted to the International Congress sitting in Wiesbaden, Germany, says: "Although a temperate in the use of alcohol than the Germans working an average of 10 per cent. shorter hours Americans are exhausted earlier in life." He has these figures for each thousand of the population: number of persons from 40 to 60 years of age are: In many, 170; in America, 170. Persons over 60: In many, 75; America, 65. Dr. Laquer did not endeavor to explain the facts. He simply gave them as the result of inquiries which he made during a visit to the United States in 1904.

Japanese are said to be coming in large numbers to Sandwich Islands, and that, as a rule, after remaining short time they continue their journey to the United States, as many coming to this country from Hawaii land here direct from Japan.

It is stated that Ireland is one of the few countries Europe the courts of which do not grant divorces. Irish tribunals, like those of Italy, will grant a judgment in law wishes to get a divorce the only manner by which he can do so is the costly and lengthy process of a bill passed through Parliament dissolving the union.

Sweden has had "school gardens" for many years, and their number now amounts to 10,000. In Belgium, in the country districts, many schools have a tract of ground varying in extent from an acre upward, with a great surrounding in agricultural science. The younger children are taught the use of the spade, etc., with such knowledge as suits their young minds regarding various vegetables and fruits. For older pupils the field is very extensive. They are taught to separate the land wishes to get a graft, and to transplant them. They are taught to lay out a small nursery, to prepare the ground, to sow seeds, and to care for the plants in their growth. The very important subject of fertilizers is fully explained, as well as the dangers from insects and the remedies. Then they learn how to grow plants, how to use them, and how to recognize them as useful. Gradually the whole science of agriculture is thus unfolded.

DIED, at her home, near Whittier, Iowa, on Saturday 12th, 1904, MARY J. YOCOM, wife of Samuel Yocom, in the sixty-ninth year of her age; a beloved member of Springfield Monthly Meeting of Friends. She was long and patient. Many were the remarks dropped from her lips from time to time, leaving the feeling belief that she has been gathered safely home, still taking her life's companion by the hand, as she said, "Dear one, thee knows the way as well as I. It will be long ere thou wilt come back. We had many joyful conversations in our lives, but I believe our sin will all be forgiven, and when this suffering is over, my soul shall find rest in that home where Jesus lives." Another time expressing a great concern for her children that they, with her, might make a peaceful and profitable landing, she said: "It would be so sweet, ———, to be gathered in to you. I do not know what may be, but I want to say, 'Thy will, not mine, be done.'"

Robert Barclay.

BY ALBERTUS AND MABEL B. HOYLE.

Robert Barclay occupies a unique position in the history of our Society.

There were many more aggressive characters in the church in its earlier days, and probably of equally well educated men, but Robert Barclay's name will be associated with Quakerism after the literary world has ceased to read the more voluminous writings of his contemporaries or their successors.

His "Apology" has ever been accepted as a concise but full exposition of the distinctive principles of our Society. His name is destined to be by reason of that work alone.

He was born in Scotland in the year 1648. He was reared under the influence of Presbyterianism, but at an early age was sent to a Roman Catholic school in Paris, of which his uncle was rector. He made remarkable progress in the school, and bid fair to become an eminent scholar. He became a great favorite of his uncle, and showed some inclination to leave Catholicism. His father, becoming displeased at his attitude, withdrew him from the school when he was sixteen years old. His uncle endeavored to dissuade him from leaving, and offered to settle upon him, immediately, an estate larger than the one which he could inherit from his father. His answer to the proposition was, "He is my father and he is obeyed." His uncle was displeased, and left his property to Catholic institutions in France. Soon after returning home, Robert Barclay's father became a convert to Quakerism. David Barclay did not make a strong effort to influence his son in his religious leaning, but felt that it was best to allow him to be guided by his own convictions. Being freed from Catholic influences, he soon became possessed of any inclination toward that faith, and his mind was left free to seek for the truth.

He became a member of the Society of Friends at the age of nineteen. His conversion does not appear to have been due to any outward influence, but rather to inward conviction. He says: "It was not by strength of argument, or by a particular disquisition of each doctrine, and conviction of my understanding, whereby I came to receive and bear witness of the truth, but by being secretly reached by this life; for when I came into the silent assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret power among them which touched my heart, and as I gave way unto it, I found the evil weakening in me, and the good raised up, and so I became thus knit and united unto them, hungering more and more after the increase of this power and life, whereby I might feel myself perfectly redeemed." He further says: "Indeed, this is the surest way to become a Christian, to whom afterwards the knowledge and understanding of principles will not be wanting, but will grow up so much as is needful as the natural fruit of this good root, and such a knowledge will not be barren nor unfruitful. After this manner we desire all that come among us to be proselyted, knowing that though thousands should be convinced in their understanding of all the truths we maintain, yet if they were not sensible of this inward life, and their souls not changed from unrighteousness to righteousness, they could add nothing to us. . . . If such should come among us, and from that understanding and conviction they have of the Truth, speak ever so true things, and utter them forth with ever so much excellency of speech, if this life were wanting, it would not edify us at all, but as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

He was married in 1669 to Christiana Mollisen, following the custom of Friends in the marriage ceremony. The magistrates resented this ignoring of their authority, and summoned him to appear before the Privy Council at Edinburgh, to answer for an unlawful marriage, but the case was not pressed, and nothing ever came of it. Time proved the wisdom of his choice. Christiana Barclay was a good wife and a wise mother to her children. She was left a widow in middle age.

We are informed that "her pious care and motherly instruction of her children when young doubtless had its desired effect upon them, for as they grew in years, they also grew in a knowledge of the truth." Some of her children became ministers. Much of Barclay's life, after his marriage, was devoted to writing.

All of his publications were put forth between the ages of twenty-two and thirty-one years. In 1673 he published the Catechism, which is accepted as the belief of the Society. It was written partly to answer charges which had been made by enemies of Friends, that they did not follow the teachings of Scripture. The answers were all given in quotations from the Bible, in order more completely to vindicate the attitude of his brethren.

About this time he offered to meet some ministers of Aberdeen and discuss with them some of the fundamental truths of Christianity.

But they did not care to enter the discussion. A little later he and George Keith had the opportunity to debate with some divinity students in the presence of several hundred people. The meeting finally ended in disorder. The students claimed the victory, but their claim lost force from the fact that four of their number were convinced of the principles put forth by their opponents, and joined the Society.

The matter presented at this time afterwards became the basis of "Barclay's Apology," which was published in 1675. The book contains fifteen propositions which the author proves by Scripture and argument. It was originally written in Latin and English, and has since been translated into many different languages. At the time it was written it called forth much opposition and criticism from the opponents of Quakerism, but it also received much praise.

The opinion of one outside the Society is of interest, as showing in what estimation it is held by others. Zell's Encyclopedia says of it: "Written with much ability, with clearness of reasoning, and perspicuity of expression, it also shows great ingenuity in the advocacy of unpopular opinions."

A brief synopsis of the treatise is here introduced, as prepared by Friends' Tract Association:—

"On the subject of the first proposition, our author asserts that the true foundation of knowledge consists in being acquainted with God; an assertion which, as he supposes it will generally be granted, he does not stop long to explain. Immediate revelation is held up in the second proposition; and Barclay not only shows the necessity of it, for obtaining that true knowledge which is mentioned in the first; but proves that the doctrine was held by the early teachers of Christianity; and that the revelation for which he pleads is to be obtained only in and by Christ, through the Spirit. This part of the Apology also contains Robert Barclay's faith as to the eternal divinity of Christ.

"The Apologist begins the third proposition, treating of the Scriptures, with declaring them to be the most excellent writings in the world; to which not only no other writings are to be preferred, but even in divers respects are not comparable. Nevertheless, he asserts that it is the Spirit that must apply them for our benefit, and must still be the primary rule of Christians. He then guards against the common objection, that hereby the Scriptures are rendered useless; and shows that, as they have proceeded from the revelation of the Divine Spirit in the writers, they can never be contradicted by the revelation of the same Spirit in the mind of any. He is willing that all doctrines and practices should be tried by them; and that whatever any persons pretending to the Spirit, do contrary to the Scriptures, should be taken for delusion.

"In the fourth proposition are unfolded the views of the Society of Friends respecting the state of man in the fall. He denies the imputation of sin to infants, on account of Adam's transgression, until they join with the seed of evil in themselves by their own actual sin, and declares that they cannot derive from their fallen progenitor any power to overcome it. A seed of sin he confesses to be transmitted to all men from Adam; but he prefers to call it by the Scriptural terms of Death, the old man, the old Adam, rather than by the Calvinistic term of Original Sin; which notion he thinks has given rise to that of imputing sin to infants.

"In the two following propositions, the fifth and sixth, which are considered jointly, our author shows the means of man's restoration from the fall; and ably asserts universal redemption by Christ, and the saving and spiritual light wherewith every man is enlightened. He begins with some short, yet sharp, strictures on the doctrine of absolute reprobation, which he successfully opposes; and proves the universality of Christ's death, and the consequent possibility of salvation to all. The author lays it down that God, who, of his infinite love, sent his Son into the world, who tasted death for every man, hath given to every man a time of visitation, during which he may partake of the fruits of Christ's death.

"Secondly, that, to this end, God hath given to every man a measure of the light of his own Son—a measure of grace—a measure of the Spirit. Thirdly, that God, in and by this light, invites, calls, exhorts and strives with every man, in order to save him; which light received and not resisted, works the salvation of all; but, that it may be resisted, and then it becomes man's condemnation. Having thus shown that man co-operates in the work of his salvation, he guards against derogating from the atonement and sacrifice of Christ; asserts belief in all that is recorded of him in Scripture; and that remission of sins is only by virtue of that most satisfactory sacrifice.

"Justification forms the matter for the seventh proposition, in which he cautions all against supposing themselves justified by virtue of Christ's death, while they remain unsanctified in heart, and polluted with sin.

"The doctrine of the eighth proposition has been much opposed. It asserts the possibility of perfection in this life; which perfection is defined to consist in a freedom from actual sinning, and from transgressing the law of God. It is a state which admits of a growth; and from which there is a possibility of falling. The doctrine of those who plead for the impossibility of perfection, and for the continuance in sin during life, is opposed at length.

"The ninth proposition respects perseverance, and the possibility of falling from grace. On these subjects the author's judgment may, in great measure, be inferred from what precedes. Accordingly, he is short in this part of the Apology; and his sense is, that the truth lies betwixt these two extremes, viz., the doctrine of such as affirm that the least degree of truth and saving grace cannot be fallen from; and that of those who deny any such stability attainable, as that there can be no total and final apostasy from it.

"In the tenth proposition, we meet with a subject on which the Society of Friends have appeared to differ more from other professors of Christianity than on most other points, namely Gospel ministry. After explaining his sense of what constitutes the church, which he defines to be the Society of such as God has called out of the worldly spirit, to walk in his light and life, he shows what is the call of a true minister, asserting it to be the inward power and virtue of the Spirit of God; and rejects the notion of succession from the apostles. Having established the call, he lays down the qualification of a minister, of which he asserts human learning to form no necessary part; but places all in the power, life and virtue of the Holy Spirit. Lastly, he maintains that the true ministers should not, cannot, teach for hire; and opposes the practice of a forced maintenance. This is a very interesting part of the Apology, and teems with able arguments drawn both from the letter and the spirit of the Bible.

"Worship is spoken of in the eleventh proposition. True worship is referred to an inward feeling of reverence and devotion, to the exclusion of all ceremonies which may be set about in the will of man. The author, nevertheless, takes care to assert the necessity of meeting at stated times for worship; but that when assembled, the great duty of all is to wait to feel the Lord's presence, and to know indeed a gathering into his name.

"The twelfth and thirteenth propositions are employed on, what are termed the two sacraments, Baptism and the Supper. Baptism with water is declared not to be the one true baptism of Christ; which is proved to be inward and spiritual, according to the text, 'He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire;' and the objections of such as hold water baptism to be of perpetual obligation are answered. The body and blood of Christ, of which believers partake, are asserted to be spiritual, and not carnal, and to be really enjoyed as often as the soul retires into the light of the Lord, and feels and partakes of that heavenly life, by which the inward man is nourished.

"The fourteenth proposition is, concerning the power of the civil magistrate in matters purely religious and pertaining to the conscience. It may be well conceived that Barclay here firmly asserts the unlawfulness of any attempt to force the conscience. At the same time he gives no countenance to persons who, under pretence of conscience, would prejudice their neighbors.

"The fifteenth and last proposition has for its title, Concerning Salutations and Recreations, though it also embraces some other objects. In it the author shows the unlawfulness, to Christians, of using flattering titles and compliments—of kneeling, prostrating, or bowing the body, or uncovering the head, to any man—of superfluities in apparel for ornament and vanity; of sports, games, comedies, vain recreations, etc.; of swearing at all; and of resisting evil and fighting. On this occasion, also, the objections of such as plead for those things are ably answered; particularly in the case of oaths."

Robert Barclay was imprisoned at various times for his fearless attitude in defence and promulgating his principles. But in main he was allowed to enjoy his freedom live on his estate.

He held the confidence of those high authority, as was shown by his appointment Governor of New Jersey. He never visited this country, however, but delegated authority to another. He was on friendly terms with the king, and was often at court where he was able to use his influence to mitigate the persecution of dissenters in general. He traveled in the work of the ministry thro Holland and parts of Germany. While Holland he became acquainted with Elizabeth princess-palatine, of the Rhine. He appeared to have had several conferences with her religious subjects, and a friendship developed between them which lasted to the end of life. He traveled, as a minister, thro England, and made several visits to London the interests of the Society. In 1690 accompanied James Dickinson on a visit Friends in the north of Scotland. Upon return to his home he became very ill with high fever, which terminated his life in less than a week. James Dickinson was with him during his sickness.

His life was thus cut off in its very prime as we, in this age, think a man is attaining a stability of character that warrants in accepting a leadership among men. We find him, at the age of forty-two, with life's work accomplished; with a reputation a sound, conservative and influential man, is doubtful if his influence over the past times would have been any greater had he lived through that period of life that is usually most prolific of great deeds; but it is certain that the community in which he lived would have felt for generations the influence of his ripier years, had his life been extended to the usual span.

His contribution to our doctrines consists not so much in construction as in crystallization.

At a time when various theories, some of others decidedly erroneous, were being advanced and put forward as Quakerism, Robert Barclay gathered the wheat from the chaff, and gave us the doctrine that we accept to-day, which the world accepts as true Quakerism.

DEAR Friends, though we may feel feeble and weak for the task before us, we are compelled, praying for Divine help to guide us, to buckle on the armor of duty and stand steadfast for those principles and testimony through which our forefathers in the Society were led out of darkness unto light; out from under man-made ministry unto the pure spiritual worship which we find so fully taught by Jesus Christ, our Saviour, in the New Testament.

"FIRST-DAY attended Meeting there [Richmond, Va.], which was small; the prospect of a succession of rightly qualified members to maintain the wholesome discipline established amongst us is as discouraging as in any meeting I have yet attended on this continent, but as it respects male and female,—very mourning, I believe, to the sad effects of a free intercourse with those out of our religious Society." The above extract is from the pen of that valiant Thomas Shillitoe.

present day will do well to consider and, lest it be said of any of us, "Ephraim mixed himself among the people; . . . wingers have devoured his strength, and he weth it not."

Showing the smallness of many of our sins in the present day, let us not be stayed, but look to the alone Fountain of grace for both strength and wisdom to direct the weighty affairs of the discipline, but fear or favor of man, looking for strength to know no one after the flesh in our sins; remembering the Lord can save by few as well as by many, endeavoring in fear of the Lord to rise above all the wiles of the enemy, so that it may not be said of us, as of some in the days of Thomas Manton, namely,—"The few who remain are as if they were nearly sinking under punishment; and instead of looking to that or for help, who remains all-sufficient to sustain, prepare, and qualify for every service in church, they seem to be querying, "Who can sustain us? is sufficient for these things?"

Faith to Do.

A private letter from an Irish friend has been submitted to us, from which we are pleased to present the following portions:—"I never study what I am going to say (in preaching), and it just comes as it will. Sometimes I seem to be following a road, and the way is opening out before me, and I go from point to point just as it opens. I see in my store of knowledge and experience, even my adventures and reading, are made use of, especially when I am led into teaching; it is selected and put together apparently independently of myself [by Him] 'who maketh angels spirits and his ministers a flame of fire.'"

"I do not think I should be so successful (in preaching) if I did not mind my religious work. I keep my mind calm and free from care. I put ALL your care upon Him, for He hath for you." That is what people want. Where does it say one-half or one-fourth, or ALL. But so often people do not really believe.

"If I knew there was a bag of gold out at the deep in my garden I would go and dig it up and no one would think I was sure it was there if I did not.

"The faith of the Bible is that faith that saves a man do. It is by faith, and faith saves, and faith that makes alive. But it is the same faith that Abraham had; by which he got up and 'went.' If he had not believed he would not have had faith.

"People want to give God so much glory that they try and make man do nothing. Well, there is a sense in which he does nothing,—it is God that worketh in you to will and to do.' But it is for us to surrender to Him as He lives and works in us. And often our own knowing leads us on and impels us against our own will, but with it.

"Trying to make laws of the way of salvation, they miss the spirit of it. 'He shall be as the lily, and spread forth his roots in Lebanon.

"Trust and go forward. 'But I see the sea.' Well, what then? Go forward! The sea divides when the step is taken. The step begun, not when one is sitting down."

A Present Call for Service for the Negro.

During the past winter it was observed by one keenly alive on the subject that the attendance in a colored school in one of our suburban towns fell to a very low average at mid-winter. An investigation by house-to-house visitation revealed the fact that many children were detained at home by lack of proper shoes or clothing. In some cases means were not at hand in the families to provide these deficiencies, but too often the situation was part of the negro thriftlessness that we all so much deplore. Now this suburban town is a Friendly settlement and the Friends in it are especially disheartened by the negro situation. Under the friendly visitation of the teacher and some contributions of money for the needy a proper school attendance was restored. The lesson of the experience, however, was very clearly the need of some regular "friendly visitation" of negro families in that town.

The "friendly visitor" is often cited as a modern invention of charity organizations. Be that as it may, the essence of the good work is in the words of our Lord, "And ye visited me." The negro race especially has the need of such visitation, and shall we not believe that Friends are in many ways well qualified for it? The modern "friendly visitor" is not a dispenser of charity. The effort all the while is to carry to the visited home the inspiration of sympathy and real friendship. Each member of the family is stimulated to make a fair contribution to the general welfare and all are in a way held up to the highest ideals possible for them. That was the need in this suburban town. As soon as these ideals were enforced the difficulties were resolved. How is the problem to be met permanently? There are nearly a dozen such suburban places with negro settlements. Shall Friends fail in so important a matter? To accomplish it some organization will be required. In most cases this organization can be assumed by some sewing or aid society, already at work. Lists of the colored homes and of the character of them should be prepared, and then from one to four homes assigned to each Friend who is willing to take part. One visit in a fortnight may be required. The object of the visit, as before hinted, is to carry practical sympathy and friendship where they are most needed. Every one does better who knows others are interested in having him do better. The right use of money, the right means of saving it, the right kinds of food, indeed the thousand and one lessons of helpfulness that an advanced race can give a backward race are sure to be welcome if given in the right spirit. If they are resented let the visitor study himself. There is no question that this work will cost something in time and sacrifice of feeling, but we owe it to the race as a direct inheritance of what our fathers earned for them.

Closely associated with friendly visiting for the negro is an interest in negro education, almost sure to grow out of it. In the past ten years the movement to put negro children in schools by themselves has grown apace. Even in the suburban towns mentioned above this has come to pass. At first thought this separation seems to some an abandonment of our historical position in regard to freedom and equality of rights. As a matter of fact it is presented as a necessary outgrowth of the real situation.

Side by side with the white child the negro develops different needs and a different rate of progress. More than one principal of negro schools in Philadelphia has told me that, as a rule, the negro child requires about three years to do two years of the prescribed work for white children. It is altogether likely also that somewhat different work should be prescribed for the negro child. Be that as it may, the negro school has come to be a distinct feature of our public school system, and in Philadelphia a decision of the Board of Education favors negro teachers for negro schools. Now this development has dangers of its own that Friends need to watch. Some visiting in the eight or nine negro schools of Philadelphia shows clearly that the tendency is to give these schools less than an adequate share of educational resources. The buildings are out of repair, the equipment too often poor, and the general atmosphere is one of neglect. What such schools need is the friendship of Friends residing in the district. Great sensitiveness to this personal influence exists even with the politicians. Are Friends willing to try it? At least let them know the schools and become acquainted with the principals. I have heard much liberal acknowledgment of the advantage of this friendship. The negro must work out his own salvation and he will do it, but it is doubtful whether the call of the Society of Friends to help was ever greater than to-day. At least don't let us give way to discouragement before we respond to this call.

J. HENRY BARTLETT.

The Teacher of Teachers.

In a recent number of Education Jesus Christ was considered from the standpoint of modern educational science. After an interesting development of this idea the writer says:

"Of what does this message consist? What are the spiritual qualities which may be applied in living, and therefore should be applied by teachers in school-rooms and by professors in colleges where historically and experimentally mankind is to gain his first definite knowledge of life? The answer does not fail us: duty, patience, fidelity, sympathy, faith, love, joy, devotion, sacrifice. And as fast as each quality suggests itself there comes with it an example given to us by Jesus Christ. From the moment that Christ assumed the office of teacher, when he delivered the Sermon on the Mount, until He taught His last lesson on the cross, when He gave courage to the thief who hung beside Him, not once did He preach without practice. Preaching and daily living were indivisibly one in the life of the Christ.

"In the principles and methods of the great Teacher is a lesson for every college president and for each young school-teacher at her desk. The young woman has before her the rank and file of children. The little girl in the front seat has her one talent tightly clutched in the napkin of shyness. The wayward boy in the last seat may be the hundredth sheep to be once more brought back to the fold. There are children to be forgiven seven times seven; little Peters who would deny their masters. Or again, in the university there are men like the fishermen on the Sea of Galilee; men whose visions have grown faint and who need courageous faith presented to them to try yet once truants, each a prodigal of time and opportunity; each one needing a special welcome back to higher things all the more because there is often the older brother who may grudge the welcome. One can instance an illustration for every situation that will arise in school-room or college office; an illustration of a wise pedagogical treatment of the young pupil and the older student. The man is dull who cannot apprehend methods of handling again. In either class room there are the individual cases as well as the student body if he but study the methods of the great Teacher."

Thoughts on Music.

(Found in the Church Union, 1890.)

It is universally conceded that music of itself has a tendency to harmonize the mind and stimulate the passions. In exhibitions and other similar performances it tends to entertain and to produce agreeable sensations. On the field of battle it dissipates fear and prompts to deeds of bravery.

But it is generally admitted in the churches that it should serve as a medium of instruction and worship; that here utterance is thus given to penitence and sorrow, of gratitude, of faith and hope, of praise and thanksgiving. Should this be done by ourselves, or by others for us? If it were merely an exercise for entertainment, it would be a matter of indifference by whom it is performed, if the music be correct and interesting, whether the performers be loyal or disloyal, moral or immoral. A band of rebel musicians might stimulate Union soldiers to deeds of desperation as effectually as soldiers in the rebel army. Not thus in the church; here music gives expression to the pious emotions of the heart. Can persons who have no affinity with pure religion, no sympathy with Christ, and have never experienced those emotions, awaken them in others? Says Scripture, "As in water, face answers to face, so the heart of man to man." Faith stimulates faith, love calls forth love, penitence draws to penitence, joy to joy. Is not the feigned worshipper guilty in the sight of God? His words express love, but hatred is in his heart. His voice utters penitence, but pride and rebellion reveal within. He gives the friendly kiss, whilst a dagger is concealed beneath his robe. That dagger inflicts a more painful wound than unbelief. What is more grievous and insulting than expressing penitence, love, gratitude and other Christian graces hypocritically?

We may bear with such characters while under our instruction, or pity them if not within our influence, but to put them forward to awaken our sincere devotions seems to be the height of inconsistency; to admire and applaud their performance and even to pay them for it, a participation in sin.

It may be urged that members of the church will not sing; may it not be better to have no worship than mock worship?

"You must go back of the image to the living faith, back of the book to the experiences which the book interprets. You must learn through the voice of Moses and David and Isaiah and Paul to come yourselves into the same presence of God into which they came, and listen to the same voice of God which they heard, and because of which they spoke."

TEMPERANCE.

The matter under this heading is furnished to THE FRIEND on behalf of the "Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia," by Benjamin F. Whitson, 401 Chestnut St., Phila.

What hast thou done to-day for God?
Answer O soul of mine!
What thorny pathway hast thou trod,
Trusting in strength divine?
What gift upon the altar laid
Of all that was most dear?
Or hast thou meagre tribute paid,
With less of love than fear?

—KATE CAMERON.

You may build a church in every street, and make your religious organizations as complete as you will, but as long as you allow the saloons to be open you will make criminals faster than you can reclaim them.—The Temperance Cause.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE SALOON in politics is well illustrated by the following extract from a speech delivered by a Missouri Senator in 1899. One might fancy it came from Harrisburg:

"Senators have said upon the floor to-day in this debate that they would like to see the saloon out of politics. So would I, and I will tell the senators when it will go out of politics: When every law restricting the liquor traffic is repealed; when you cease by legislation to discriminate against my business and to cripple it; when we can open our saloon on Sunday and run it as we could any other day of the week; when our business is placed upon the same footing and upon the same plane with every other legitimate business—then, and not until then, will the saloon go out of politics. We shall fight you until this is accomplished."

THE BERRY LOCAL OPTION BILL, which the last General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania promptly referred to the Committee on Law and Order, was allowed to "die in committee." Nevertheless, there is no doubt the effort to get the bill passed has resulted in much good, beside paving the way for success in 1907. Had it not been for the pressure brought to bear upon both Houses of the Legislature by the temperance people of the State, it is likely that several bills in the interests of the liquor trade would have been passed. Perhaps never before in the history of the State have the people of Pennsylvania urged more strongly the passage of any law. About 100,000 voters signed petitions asking for the enactment of the law, and probably 1,200,000 people in the State had, in organized capacity, favored the measure. It was freely conceded that the bill would have passed the Assembly if the "powers that be" had allowed it to be reported out of committee. The "hearing" was granted by the committee to the friends of the bill was a well attended and impressive occasion. Representatives from church organizations throughout the State, and from many temperance unions and associations for social betterment, including Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia, were present, and many forcible and pertinent addresses were made on behalf of the bill. Leading politicians and prominent legislators were present also. "It is hard to fail, but worse never to have tried to succeed," Theodore Roosevelt. There are some raf so deeply seated in the public conscience, so surely based upon public necessities, the demand for them does not subside they are realized. The desire for local of is one of these. "The multitudes who per the Berry bill enacted into law are not to be gagged at will, nor to be used as balls in the game of political expedient. If they will co-operate with the Anti-Sl League or affiliated temperance movement demonstration of the truth of the foregoing statement, there is good reason to be that a different report can be made two y hence. The temperance people of Ohio defeated repeatedly in their efforts to see a suitable law. Yet they persevered un a good degree of success has been achie We have no cause to despair. On the cont a careful study of the recent campaign f ground for encouragement. "The powers be" have a large measure of respect for s movements that control large number cohesive voters. It is not likely that the mand for Local Option will become a part issue, but as political influences, sadly guided, have endeavored to stifle its just sideration and compass its defeat, it is ce to become a factor in State politics.

THE TEMPERANCE ISSUE IN THE FIFTY-EC CONGRESS.—Many Friends may be inclin think that our Congressmen are slow to n fest a due appreciation of the extent and portance of the temperance issue. Yet doubtful if any preceding Congress in history of our country could have been vailed upon to defend the cause of temper reform in as great a degree. In the place, all attempts to repeal the anti-can law were blocked. None of the several introduced for that purpose was formally sidersed in committee.

On the contrary, an additional appropriation of $333,500 (making $1,833,500 in all) made for continuing the work of providing recreation buildings for the men at the posts, as contemplated by those who favored the abolishment of the canteen.

Prohibition in the Indian Territory Oklahoma as one State was adopted by Senate by a vote of 52 to 17, and it is believed that if the statehood bill had not failed to the House for other reasons, it would have become a law with this provision retained.

Federal aid was again refused the Soldiers' Home in California, which maintains a bar or canteen for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

An attempt was made by the Columbia Club to get Congress to grant them a license to sell liquors to bona fide members within one mile limit of the National Soldiers' Home in the District of Columbia. The Senate first acceded to the request, but later, a conference of the two Houses, the privilege was denied.

THE ANTI-CANTEEN LAW is more likely to receive a fair trial. Secretary of War, W. H. Taft, in a recent circular to army officers having charge of troops, has requested that to "state facts only and not their own"

' respecting the operation of the anti-temperance amendment to the post exchange law, says they should be "especially careful to all the facts whether pro or con." This was the outcome of a brief but friendly correspondence between the Secretary of War Representative Littlefield, of Maine, who issued the anti-temperance amendment. It consisted of two letters only, first from Littlefield to Taft, and later the reply, both of which went out in conjunction with the circular order of Secretary Taft.

FRIENDS' TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION OF PHILADELPHIA is now the name of what has heretofore been known as the Temperance Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. It was feared that the former title would lead some who are not Friends to think this association is the official exponent of our Yearly Meeting; hence the change.

TEMPERANCE AND LIFE INSURANCE.—The Statistical Society of the United Kingdom Temperance and General Provident Institution of England has compiled a table of statistics covering 100 lives and extending over a period of one year. The figures cover the working period of man's life, from age twenty to seventy. This institution, having placed abstainers in a separate class, is able to show the effect of total abstinence upon the rate as compared with the death rate against its own "risks" of approved physical and somewhat less abstemious. It is found that while 46,956 of the total abstainers died during the period, there were 57,891 deaths amongst the moderate drinkers. In words, there were 20 per cent. fewer deaths amongst the abstainers.

Further study of the figures shows that between the ages of twenty and thirty there is 1 per cent. more deaths among the moderate drinkers than among the abstainers; between the ages of thirty and forty, 68 per cent. more deaths among the moderate drinkers; between the ages of forty and fifty, 74 per cent.; between the ages of fifty and sixty, 81 per cent.; between the ages of sixty and seventy, 19 per cent.

It may be argued truthfully that a certain life insurance company, well known amongst our people, has for more than forty years, by its selection of "risks," shown an average death rate even lower than the total abstinence department of the English institution referred to, and this without a strict regard to total abstinence; yet it is evident that here the factor of tremendous import in life insurance. If discrimination on the basis of total abstinence is justified, some vocations being more hazardous than others, why not total abstainers with propriety ask to be included in a separate class in order that they may reap the advantage which, with proper management in other particulars, must naturally accrue to such a group?

Most effective sermons are not heard in the halls of oratory, but seen in beautiful, life-like examples.

Do not think evil, be thou sure thou shalt not bear the shadow of the stain; if thy thought be perfect, then thy deed shall be as of the perfect, true and pure.

—After Confucius.

UNTIL THE END.

"Lo, I am with you always to the end."
Down to the end of earth's long, rugged way,
Thy helper, Saviour, Comforter, and Friend:
What more could Christ unto the Christian say?

He might have said: "After the end of earth, Lo, I am with you on the other shore;"
But what He said is higher still in worth,
That we shall be with Him for evermore.*

Abide with me till I arise to Thee,
Of life divine, Thou Christ, the blessed giver;
Thy life in me grow for eternity,
Where life in love unfolds itself forever.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In the Eighth Month, 1870, Ebenezer Worth, Joseph Scattergood, Thomas Wistar, and Samuel Morris paid a visit to the Indians of the Allegheny Reservation. In this visit they met with the descendants of Cornplanter, living on the tract of land in Pennsylvania, which had been granted to him, his heirs and assigns forever by an Act of the Legislature approved Second Month 1st, 1791, in consideration of his personal merit and services. In this interview the Friends represented the advantages that would accrue to them from having the tract divided among the heirs, so that each should have his or her respective portion to be held thereafter in severalty, and explained to them the danger they were still exposed to of having judgment entered against it by white people to whom one or more of their number might become indebted, and that the difficulty of having a satisfactory division of the estate would increase as time went on, and the number of those interested in it became larger. From the result of this interview the Committee was encouraged to take further steps. The adult heirs were advised to petition the Legislature of Pennsylvania for the passage of an Act, defining the mode of procedure in making a partition of their land, containing about seven hundred and eighty acres, and providing that when divided it shall not be devised or aliened to others than the descendants of Cornplanter or members of the Seneca Nation of Indians without the authority of the Legislature first had therefor; and also providing that all such lands while held by the descendants of Cornplanter shall not be liable to taxation, or the lien of any judgment, mortgage or judicial sale excepting to the descendants of Cornplanter, or members of the Seneca Nation.

An Act embodying the above provisions was favorably considered at Harrisburg, and was promptly passed by the House of Representatives; it afterwards received the sanction of the Senate, and was approved by the Governor Fifth Month 16th, 1871. Three of the Friends who were under appointment visited the Cornplanter settlement on the 20th of the Fifth Month and explained the steps which it would then be necessary to take to carry the object of the Act into effect, which resulted in an application to the Orphans' Court of Warren County, Pennsylvania, within the jurisdiction of which the land was situated, for the appointment of Commissioners to divide the tract among the heirs of Cornplanter. Thomas Wistar, Ebenezer Worth, and Joseph Scattergood were nominated in the petition as Commissioners, and they, upon being duly appointed by the Court, proceeded in the Eighth Month to lay out the tract, with the assistance of Francis Lightfoot, an experienced surveyor of Philadelphia, who had offered his services without charge. The division was made in accordance with the intestate laws of Pennsylvania. A map was made of the tract, and its subdivisions, with the name of each individual owner entered upon it, a copy of which, upon the approval of the work by the Court, was furnished to each of the heirs. A general feeling of satisfaction was expressed by the Indians in the harmonious settlement of their interests in the estate, and in the adjustment of the value of the buildings and other improvements which belonged to them individually.

The Committee observe in reference to this subject in their report in 1872, "The work thus accomplished proved to be timely, as very shortly thereafter the death of the only surviving child of Cornplanter occurred, which had it taken place earlier might have caused greater embarrassment. The Committee had long desired to bring about a satisfactory settlement of this estate, not only for the sake of the parties immediately interested, but as an example and encouragement to the Indians on the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservations to hold their lands in severalty."

"Since the division of their estate the Cornplanter Indians have shown an increased energy and interest in the management of their land, and a desire for a better education of their children." Ebenezer Worth and Joseph Scattergood, who visited them in 1873, stated that they were gratified in having evidence that the division of their land had been of much benefit to them. The improvements made since the division being very manifest, and more in amount than perhaps for six or eight years preceding that period.

In 1871 the Indians became much alarmed with the fear that legislation seriously affecting their interests might be secured at Washington by the white people living at Salamanca, and at other settlements upon their Reservation, in consequence of the decision of the Supreme Court of New York, then recently delivered, to the effect that the leases which the Indians had granted to the whites were illegal.

"In consequence of this decision," the Committee says in their report to the Yearly Meeting in that year, "the white people who occupy lots leased by the Seneca Nation, and especially those residing at Salamanca, have made considerable effort to procure some legislation from Congress to enable them to acquire title to the whole or part of Allegheny Reservation. The Legislature of New York so far gave countenance to their efforts as to adopt resolutions requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to endeavor to procure such action of that body as will afford them the desired right. These resolutions were presented and referred to the Indian Committee of both Houses, but no measure has been adopted." The help of the Committee had been requested by the officers of the nation at this juncture, and some of its members were desired to render such assistance as might be in their power.

An Address was sent by these Friends to the Indians, expressing their continued interest in their welfare at this time, and reviewing the situation of their affairs, and mentioning their belief that the extinguishment of the claim of the Ogden Land Company, and thus obtaining a title to their land which would be deemed a good one by the laws of the white people, was closely connected with their future progress and settlement. This suggestion was carefully considered by the Indians, who finally requested these Friends, viz., Thomas Wistar, Ebenezer Worth, Samuel Morris, and Joseph Scattergood, to have an interview with the representatives of the Ogden Land Company on their behalf, in order to ascertain the terms upon which they would extinguish it. In accordance with this request two meetings were held with the representative of the company, the late William L. Waddington, of New York City, which, however, proved fruitless as to reaching any agreement, the views expressed as to the money value of the claim far exceeding what the Friends believed was equitable or what the Indians would consent to.

In the discussions which had arisen respecting the validity of their leases, many of the Indians had shown that they were but little acquainted with their legal rights, or with the laws of the State of New York, and of the United States affecting them. In 1872, with a view of giving them information upon these subjects, and also upon the origin and history of the preemption right, the Committee authorized the printing and circulation among the Indians on the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservations of a pamphlet, which had been prepared chiefly by Joseph Scattergood, entitled "A Brief Statement of the rights of the Seneca Indians in the State of New York to their lands in that State, etc.," which contained numerous extracts from decisions of the New York and United States Courts respecting them, passages from laws, etc., and a brief history of the origin of the preemption right, then held by the Ogden Land Company.

Included in this was a Memorial to Congress which had been prepared for them to sign, asking that proper legislation might be enacted which would empower them to make leases of their land which would be legal, and which would therefore satisfy the white settlers in Salamanca and in the other villages upon the Allegheny Reservation. There were also embraced in it a draft of an Act to enable them to divide the remaining portion of their lands and to hold them in severalty. Copies of this pamphlet were taken to the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservations by members of the Committee, who reached Tusnesassa on the 27th of the Eighth Month, 1872.

The Inward Light.

(From a letter of George A. Milne, in the London Friend.)

What the early Friends preached was "The Light of Christ Within" man. The phrase came to be shortened to "The Inward Light." Later, Americans changed it to "The Inner Light," a phrase which, I believe, has been applied by some persons not Friends to an innate faculty of the human mind—obviously, a thing very different from what early Friends proclaimed.

In preaching it, however, early Friends found that some who embraced the doctrine sometimes mistook "imaginings" for the revelations of the Inward Light, and warnings had to be extended. As Samuel thought Eli called him when what he heard was the voice of God, so men now mistake natural for Divine promptings. And nowadays the Inward Light has come to be confounded with the conscience. Some teachers of the doctrine quote such Scripture as Ephesians v. 13, "All things that are reprove are made manifest by the light, for whatsoever doth make manifest is light." From this they teach that when anyone feels a check against doing anything, the check proceeds from the "Inward Light," whereas the check may proceed from the natural conscience, which Barclay shows is a different thing.

How, then, are we to distinguish the Divine light? In THE FRIEND of Second-month 3rd A. F. Fox endeavours to make the way plain by quoting from John xvi. the functions of the Holy Spirit. But this merely shifts the ground by changing terms. What is our experience? When we feel drawn to do or not to do an act, how are we to know whether the drawing proceeds from the Spirit of God? We are still in the same difficulty.

But the same Apostle who wrote, "God is light," also wrote, "God is love; and he that abideth in love abideth in God, and God abideth in him" (1 John i. 5, and iv. 16). If "God is light," and "he that abideth in love abideth in God, and God abideth in him," he dwells in Divine light, and the Divine Light dwells in him. Early Friends realized this. They so dwell in the love of God that everything, however near or dear, was laid upon his altar, and having thus parted with all (Luke xiv. 33), their eyes were "single," and therefore they were "full of light" (Matt. vi. 22). If we tread in the same steps, the same experience, doubtless, will be ours, according to our measures; for there are measures and growth in them, just as a child learns to talk by degrees. But if we would know the light, we must keep our minds and hearts constantly turned towards God, the source of light, and under a sense of our continual dependence on Him, be instant in praying, "O send out Thy light and Thy Truth; let them lead me" (Ps. xliii. 3).—
Thine truly. GEORGE A. MILNE.

Science and Industry.

Men make work, but work makes men. A workshop is not a place for making machinery, for fitting engines and turning cylinders; it is a place for shaping souls; for fitting in the virtues to one's life; for turning out honest, modest, whole-natured men.

DOGS THAT WEAR SHOES.—In Alaska even the dogs wear shoes—at least part of the time. It is not on account of the cold, for a shaggy Eskimo dog will live and be frisky when a man would freeze to death! The dog does all the work of dragging and carrying which in this country falls to the horses, and in trotting over the rough ice of the mountain passes his feet soon become bruised and sore. Then his driver makes him soft little moccasins of buckskin or reindeer skin and ties them on without thongs of leather. In this way he travels easily until his feet are thoroughly healed up; then he bites and tears his shoes with his sharp, wolf-like teeth and eats the lup.

Wonderful animals are these dogs of Alaska. Although they are only little fellows—more than half the size of a big Newfoundland—they sell from $75 to $200 each, more than an ordinary horse will sell for in this country. They will draw 200 pounds each on a sled and they are usually driven in teams of four. They need no lines to guide them, for they readily obey the sound of their master's voice turning or stopping at a word.

But the Eskimo dogs have their faults. Like many boys, they are over fond of having good things to eat. Consequently they have to be watched closely, or they will attack and devour stores left in their way, especially bacon, which must be hung out of their reach. At night, when camp is pitched, the moment blanket is thrown on the ground, they will jump into it and curl up, and neither cuffs nor kindness suffice to budge them. They lie as closely as the men who own them as possible and a miner cannot wrap himself so closely that they won't get under the blanket with him. They are human, too, in their disinclination to get out in the morning.—New England Farmer.

PROVIDING THIRTY YEARS AHEAD FOR RAILROAD CROSSTIES.—The Pennsylvania Railroad has undertaken the task of cultivating timber to furnish its crossties, and will plant 800,000 trees this year. The task of setting out 2,580 seedling trees was finished recently. Management of the company was promptly raised true by a realization of the approach of scarcity of timber. It is the first railroad in the United States to provide for future timber.

Acting under recommendations of a special committee of officers of the transportation department, a corps of men is preparing to plant 200,000 trees in the spring and 600,000 next fall. This will require 2000 acres of land, which has already been selected at the principal divisions of the system. It is estimated that it will require thirty years for the trees to attain their full growth, and to supply the road's demand it will be necessary to plant 39,000,000 trees.

The magnitude of this undertaking was revealed in an address by J. T. Richards, chief engineer of maintenance of way of the Pennsylvania Railroad, before the American Forestry Association of the United States and Forestry Congress in Washington lately. He said that his company had undertaken the task after mature deliberation. The management does not contemplate supplying its needs, but hopes to encourage other enterprises in the business.

J. T. Richards said that the number of crossties in use on all railroads in the United States is estimated to be about 620,000. The number used annually for extensions and repairs is estimated to be from 90,000,000 to 110,000,000, requiring annually the equivalent of 200,000 acres of woodland. Each year the supply of timber is farther from the base of transportation, many of the forest sources of supply having been exhausted.

sylvia Railroad is now compelled to get supply from inland Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky and other Southern States.

The annual consumption of cross-ties on the sylvia Railroad east of Pittsburgh and for repairs only, is estimated by J. T. Ards to be 3,000,000. About 500,000 tons are required annually for new work. It is evident, therefore, he asserts, that all roads must prepare for the future, for the supply will be exhausted soon. Especially is true of white oak and yellow pine. The sylvia Railroad has experimented with yellow locust trees, and its plantings have been of that kind. Ties made of this material are more durable and lasting.

Chief Engineer Richards said that the trees used have been seedlings two or three years old and cost, including labor, about 8 cents.

They were planted ten feet apart, averaging about 400 to the acre, although 11 trees planted recently were placed six feet apart and 88,127 were set eight feet apart. The total number planted by the railway is as follows: Newton Hamilton, 20,000; Conoway, 68,400; Pomeroy, 20,280; of Atglen, 16,537; Atglen, 8108; Juniata, 20,730; Newport, 29,505; Vinona, 50,300, and along the Atglen and Susanna Branch, 53,000, a total of 280,530.

Land, except a tract of fourteen acres near Newton Hamilton, is owned by the railroad. To meet the increasing needs of Pennsylvania J. T. Richards estimates that it will be necessary to plant 1,300,000 trees each year for a period of thirty years, the time required for a tree to mature. If planted ten feet apart, or 400 to the acre, it will entail a continuous use of 97,500 acres, or 152 miles of land.

PRODUCTION OF ALUMINUM.—In his report dated "The Production of Aluminum and its Uses in 1903." Joseph Struthers of the United States Geological Survey expresses the belief that it has not been possible to obtain accurate statistics of the production of aluminum because he reasons that the sole producer in the United States, the Pittsburgh Reduction Company declines to state, even approximately, its output. The phenomenally rapid progress of the iron and steel industry in the United States is largely attributable to the willingness of the individual manufacturer to describe his own practice, and thus by comparison, to help the others, and in turn to be helped by them. In spite of the secretive policy of the Pittsburgh Reduction Company, however, to estimate the production of aluminum in the United States during 1903, 7,000,000 pounds, as compared with 7,300,000 pounds in 1902, and 7,150,000 pounds in 1901.

The chief point of interest affecting the aluminum industry in the United States during 1903 was the final adjudication of the new laws and counter law suits which have been instituted from time to time in behalf of the Electric Smelting and Aluminum Company of Cleveland, Ohio, and the Pittsburgh Reduction Company of Pittsburgh, Pa. In 1903, the United States court of appeals rendered a decision against the Pittsburgh Reduction Company, operating the Hall patents for infringement, since 1892, of the rights of the Electric Smelting and Aluminum Company, operating the Bradley patents. The sum involved was approximately $3,000,000. In Tenth Month 1903, a friendly agreement was made by the two companies to the effect that the Pittsburgh Reduction Company should pay a given sum for the quantity of aluminum produced by it up to the date of the agreement, and should continue the manufacture of aluminum under license of the Bradley patents until the time of their expiration, in Second Month 1909, paying a royalty for all metal produced in the future. By the terms of this agreement there will be no future litigation between the two companies.

The Electric Smelting and Aluminum Company apparently now controls the electric smelting industry in the United States.

The progress of the aluminum industry in the United States and in Europe in 1903 is described in detail by Jos. Struthers. There are only three aluminum works in the United States (two at Niagara Falls and one at Massena Springs, N. Y.) one in Quebec, Canada, one in Scotland, two in France, one in Switzerland, one in Germany, and one in Austria.

A considerable portion of the report is devoted to a discussion of the technology of aluminum. This metal is used mainly for the transmission of electric currents, in place of copper. A large proportion of the output is manufactured into articles for domestic and culinary use. Aluminum is used more and more extensively for the construction of parts of machines and apparatus which require lightness rather than great strength; in the manufacture of special alloys; as a substitute for stone and zinc in lithographic work; and for the production of intense heat by the combustion of the metal in the powder called thermit, which is the basis of three important branches of metallurgical work. Aluminum is also used in the manufacture of a special explosive called ammonal; in the rubber industry for making lasts and boot trees upon which rubber boots and shoes are made; in cast-iron foundry practice as a substitute for the ordinary wooden patterns; as a substitute for wood in making bobbins for spinning and weaving machines treating silk fiber; and in powdered form for the manufacture of white metallic paints, a use to which it is particularly suited on account of its nonsusceptibility to atmospheric influences. Among the proposed new uses of aluminum is its substitution for glass or earthenware in carboys or vessels employed for the transportation of nitric acid, and also as a substitute for zinc in lining cisterns and other receptacles for storing water.

Struthers' report is published as an extract from the forthcoming volume "Mineral Resources, 1903," and may be obtained, free of charge, on application to the Director of the United States Geological Survey, Washington, D. C.

Notes in General.

The Roman Catholics are making great efforts to win Wales to their Church. Colonias are being established in the very stronghold of Nonconformity. They have Welsh priests, and schools are being opened.

Some of the purists, says the Independent, are urging us again not to use United States as the subject of a singular verb, because our Constitutional fathers spoke of "these United States." Sure enough, and in those days the States had not got fairly welded into one. Political and grammatical conditions have changed since then, and now the United States is one country by law and war, as surely as the "Pleasures of Memory" is one book, and "the wages of sin is death," and physics is studied.

A community which is expected to rival and finally surpass that of Dowie is established at Benton Harbor, Mich., says the Philadelphia Ledger. The name it has adopted is the Community of Modern Israelites, but it is popularly called the Holy Rollers. The order throughout the country is said to number 144,000, and all are expected to be gathered at Benton Harbor in Eighth Month of 1916, when the world will end. The heads of the order are Benjamin and Mary, formerly Kentuckians, who recently returned from Australia with eighty converts. All are vegetarians, and they ascribe to this fact that not one is bald-headed and all are robust. The community is prosperous, working 300 acres of fertile land. Everything is held in common, including children, who come in with their parents.

"LEST THY VOICE BETRAY THEE."—A dispatch from London states that a man claimed a debt from another on the strength of a verbal agreement. The defendant denied the same on oath. Thereupon the plaintiff produced a phonograph and set it in motion. It repeated the conversation between the two men, their voices being clearly recognized. Judgment was immediately given by the court, which was the Berlin Second Civil Court. A certain distinguished person in this country has phonographs arranged in his private office in such a way that it is impossible to converse anywhere in the room without a record being made. And to this extract from the Christian Advocate we can add that the Supreme Being himself has made provision throughout all mankind that none can utter speech anywhere without a record being made. "There is not a word in my tongue, but thou O Lord, knowest it altogether." And "whatsoever ye have said in the ear, in closets, shall be proclaimed upon the house-tops."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A special train bearing President A. J. Cassatt and other officials on the Pennsylvania Railroad lately came from Pittsburgh to this city, covering the 353 miles in 350 minutes.

Andrew Carnegie has made a gift of $10,000,000, the income of which is to be used in providing positions for the teachers of universities, colleges and technical schools in our own country, Canada and Newfoundland under such conditions as may be adopted from time to time. The fund applies to the three classes of institutions named, without regard to race, sex, creed or color. The only institutions which will not participate in the gift are those which are chiefly supported by State or Colonial Governments, and those which require a majority of the trustees, faculty or students to belong to a particular sect, or exact any theological test.

The United States Government has been experimenting with the various systems of wireless telegraphy, and a chain of wireless stations is being formed along the coast from Boston to Key West, when they will be extended to Pensacola, New Orleans and Galveston; to the Gulf; and to Havana and other ports in the West Indies. The use of the apparatus, it is said, will not be confined to naval vessels.

A despatch from Washington says: Postmaster General Cortelyou has directed that the post-office inspectors shall in future make investigation into any business that is being carried on which includes any sale or lead to the suspicion that the public is to be defrauded. The advertising columns of newspapers will be carefully examined, and in cases where it is believed promises are put forth that cannot be made good under any ordinary methods of doing an honest business, fraud orders will issue or the parties will be summoned to explain the methods of doing business. The department has waited for complaints from victims of get-rich-quick concerns before taking action.

Governor Pennypacker has signed a bill abolishing the State Board of Health and establishing in its stead a Department of Health, whose business shall be limited with almost unlimited authority in safeguarding sanitary conditions. This measure has been described as one of the most important pieces of State legislation enacted in years. The Head of the Department is invested with authority to issue subpoenas to secure the attendance of witnesses, and to issue warrants for the apprehension of violators of the laws. It is given power to "take all measures detrimental to the public health or causing disease or mortality, to be abated and removed, and to enforce quarantine regulations."

Glass bricks are coming into use, and it is said that this material may be used for making statues and monuments, as it resists weathering. It is also announced that the first rolling roadway over built has recently been completed and placed in operation in Cleveland. By means of it teams with heavy loads are carried up a twenty-foot grade—forward 420 feet and upward 65 feet in four minutes or less. The team draws its load to the foot of the rolling roadway, and is carried to the top without any effort on the part of the horses. The rolling roadway is a great endless belt, which is operated by means of electric power, and weighs ninety tons. It was invented by Col. Isaac D. Smead of Cincinnati.

The President of the First National Bank of Milwaukee has lately stolen $100,000 from it to engage in speculation. He had been President of the American Bankers' Association, and intimately connected with many large enterprises. In commenting upon this case the Public Ledger of this city said, "Bigelow's case if it stood alone or merely represented an aberration of an individual would be of slight importance, were there not a feeling among the public at large that the wild craze of speculation which possessed this staid, wealthy and trusted man, who was not long ago discoursing before the American Bankers' Association on the ethics of banking and business, is to a certain sense symptomatic of a widespread, pervasive, almost universal and almost uncontrollable desire to gamble on the stock market. The like of testimony to Chicago has taken place, and on the 28th ult., 3500 men were on a strike, and their action largely deprived 15,000 others of work and seriously interfered with the delivery of goods and the necessities of life. Rioting has taken place at various points of the city."

For several months an effort has been in progress to colonize a large number of Japanese in Texas, where there is still considerable land to spare. A declaration of Governor Lanham that the Japanese colonists would have all the rights that the laws accord them in the State, has been made, and it is said that unless the courts close it, Texas will soon have a very large Japanese population. Native Japanese officials have been over the ground and report themselves highly pleased with the adaptability of the country for Japanese farming and cotton-raising, and the prospective settlers are guaranteed to be thrifty and self-supporting.

Experiments have been begun by the Department of Agriculture at Washington to ascertain the influence of electricity upon the growth of plants. These include the applying of electricity directly to the plant, to the soil in which it grows, and to the atmosphere surrounding it. In Russia it is stated fields of many acres in which sugar beets are grown are being fertilized so successfully by electricity, and were ready for harvest some weeks earlier than untreated fields, and produced much larger crops.

The statement is made that the demand for fiction among children frequenting the Apprentices' Free Library in this city is gradually decreasing. The call for histories, biographies and other instructive books has, at the same time, increased enormously, so that 800 books in the children's room in the Apprentices' Library circulated 16,000 times last year, while 24,000 children visited the reading room.

A method of electric lighting has been introduced which is said to be far superior to that by the incandescent glass bulb. The method consists in filling a bulb with a special gas, which becomes highly luminous when a current of electricity is passed through it, and diffuses a light closely resembling that of day. It is said to be cheaper than the ordinary incandescent light.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 24th ult. says: "By the object of stopping the destruction of wild game, and by the means of filling out in the rural districts under the influence of the leaders of the peasant movement, an imperial decree was issued to-day authorizing the Minister of the Interior to appoint commissions in the disturbed districts to trace the culprits, assess the losses and collect the amount of damage done from the members of the village councils, which are to be sold at auction real and personal property is liable to be sold at auction for this purpose. The decree also orders the granting of State loans to landowners not possessing the means of repairing their losses. The authorities believe that if the peasants are made to understand that they must foot the bill it will have the wholesome effect of ending the movement."

A despatch of the 30th ult. says: One of the saddest disasters in Russia's history has been brought about by the removal of the liberal and progressive Emperor. The solemn abolition of religious restrictions and the customary remission of arrears in famine loans to the peasants palliate the extraordinary silence of the Emperor regarding the Zemski Sobor, which is uppermost in the minds of the people.

In the last, 100 workmen were killed or wounded in Warsaw by the military. Grave disorders occurred in other cities of Russia.

Encounters between small bodies of Russians and Japanese are reported. Count Okuma, former Japanese Foreign Minister, has warned his countrymen to be prepared for a lengthy war.

In the last two years a large body of people from the United States, called the Blaylock colony, principally from Oklahoma and near-by points, have established themselves in the State of Tamaulipas, in Mexico. The lands of the colony are situated about 100 miles north from Tampico and 30 miles west of Escandion station on the Gulf coast. The food that two crops annually can be raised, there being abundant rainfall to meet all requirements. These people are said to be thrifty, industrious, and intelligent. There are now, it is estimated, 1,500 persons in the colony. They have erected places of worship, schools, houses, stores, and other necessary conveniences for the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty, all of which the colonists claim is guaranteed to them.

A stupendous cataract has been lately discovered in an almost impenetrable forest in the Falls of the Ygassau, a river which forms part of the boundary between Brazil and the Argentine Republic. The precipice down which the river plunges is 210 feet high, while that of the Niagara is only 167, and the width is 15,123 feet—almost three times that of the Horseshoe and American Falls combined. It is estimated that one hundred million tons of water fall every hour at Niagara, and hundred and forty million is carried every hour by the Ygassau Falls. It is distant about 1000 miles from the nearest city, Buenos Ayres.

According to the Church Missionary Gleaner, the Christians in Japan number 140,806. The Protestants number 55,354; Roman Catholics, 55,086; Russian Orthodox Christians (Grek Church), 27,366.

It is stated that the Australian government has adopted a nickel-in-the-slot machine for posting letters. When a stamp cannot be affixed conveniently by a person may drop a letter with a penny in a box, and "One Penny Paid" will be stamped on the envelope.

DIED. at his residence in Media, Pa., on the Second day of Second Month, 1905, ISAAC C. EVANS, in his eighty-seventh year of his age. An elder and member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends. His family and friends have the comforting belief that through Divine mercy his end was peace, having evinced before his departure a child-like submission to his Master's will.

On the 13th of Third Month, 1905, DAVID HESTON, aged nearly seventy-eight years. A member a minister of Frankford Monthly Meeting of Friends. The son of David and Anna Paxson Heston, was born in Bucks County, Pa., Fourth Month 5, 1827, and moved to Frankford in 1873, where was known as a conscientious and successful business man. In his mind, spirit and body he was sound as well as in doctrine, spiritual and edifying; and was concerned to maintain in their purity the principles and testimonies of the Society of which was a member. His travels in the work of ministry were quite extensive, visiting the colored people in the South and the miners in the West as well as at meetings in his own Yearly Meeting. His interest in the colored people was service to them and appreciated by them. For about twenty-five years he published monthly a paper, The Tract Repository, which had a wide circulation among them. He was twice married, his first wife, Mary Balderston, having deceased in 1836. Three children by the first marriage and his wife survive him. A few days before he was stricken with paralysis he said to his companion: "I have a well-grounded hope that my sins are forgiven and that, through unmerited mercy, I shall be received at last to rest. It is a blessing to have a hope that will give me a well-grounded peace." The day on which the stroke occurred on awaking from sleep, he quoted the whole of twenty-third psalm, and also the lines:—

"Let me go! my soul is weary Of the chase;—"

For several days before he quietly ceased breathe, he was unable to speak, his condition being well described by language he had quoted a few days before the stroke:—"Only waiting till Master bid me rise and come."

—, at his residence near Pleasant Grove, On Fourth Month 12th, 1905, WILLIAM ATKINSON, the fifty-eighth year of his age. A member of the Westtown Yearly Meeting, and Short Course Monthly Meeting of Friends. This dear friend was firmly attached to the doctrines and principles of the religious Society of Friends concerned to uphold them by a consistent life and conversation. Although suddenly removed by death, his friends have a hope that his soul is at rest. His election had been going on, and that he was in preparation for the end, and the injunction "Be also ready," seems to come forcibly home to his survivors.

—, on the 18th of the Fourth Month, at home of his parents in Media, Pa., JOHN W. BIRD, Jr., son of the late Mrs. Carl W. Bird, in the eighteenth year of his age; A member of the Senior Class at Westtown Boarding School. This dear youth looked forward with eager anticipation to the graduating exercises of the ensuing year, as well as to those pursuits and activities which he had hoped to engage in. His appointment was keen, when he realized he would be able to take no part in these; but through baptism of great physical suffering, and deep trial of spirit, he was finally enabled to look beyond all sublimity things, and to say in humble confidence to his friends, "I will be glad if he could adopt the language, 'Thy will be done.' The dear youth's education and company with his parents of the approach of the pale messenger adding that death had lost to him all its terrors. To one of his parents he said, "I love you dearly but I love my Saviour more, and He wants me and at one time when absorbed with the prospect before him, he concluded, 'Oh, be still, be still.' The dear youth's assurance is realized, through boundless mercy, this dear lamb has gathered by the Heavenly Shepherd into that where it is said "Thy shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more."

—, on the nineteenth of Fourth Month, at Moorestown, N. J., MARY ANN STOKES, in his seventy-second year. A beloved member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, N. J.

—, at the residence of her son John H. Dillingham, in Philadelphia, on the 30th of Fourth Month, 1905, LYDIA BEDE DILLINGHAM (formerly Hagedorn), ninety-one years and six months of age. A member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, Massachusetts. Interment at West Falls, N. J., the place of her home since 1837. A long walk of flesh and spirit is accomplished, and the beautiful end which was witnessed crowns all with victory of a Redeemer's love.

The Communion Table of Obedience.

The bread of God is He who comes down from heaven and gives life to the world, said Christ of himself; and also, "He that eateth shall live by me." But He said that He did not eat of the flesh, for "it is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing; words that I speak unto you, they are spirit they are life;" and so they mean that abstinent of eating and drinking for us.

"I live by the Father, even so he that eateth me, shall live by me," is a saying which He made clear when He declared what abstaining and drinking consisted in, namely, "Good and my drink is to do the will of Him that sent me, and to finish his work."

Accordingly that same obedience to the will of Christ, who "speaks to our comfort," is the disciples' meat and drink. Spiritual sustenance, spiritual growth, refreshment and quickening of life is impossible to be maintained without obedience, in doing the will of Christ. Obedience to the openings of the Spirit and to a sense of his will on our part, is the eating of our daily bread, the living process of responsive communion with his Spirit. It was for this spirit and life, that we might have it the "more abundantly," that he gave his flesh, even "for the life of the world." In the practice of it we not only receive of Him as our daily bread and daily meat, but we show forth the Lord's death, even for our life, wherein to do his will unto Him come "to take us home."

Obedience, then, is our communion table in the service of a dedicated will unto Him who is brought us with a price thus to show forth his death by its living results. But communion is not limited to this responsive form of religious activities. There is a passive communion of waiting on our Lord to receive of his pleasure of his will towards us, to renew our strength, to be inspired with the will of his kingdom, to have his love shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit which He gives unto us. Be silent, oh all flesh, to detect the voice of his in speaking word! This is the passive communion, the waiting worship, out of which a waiting ministry may be evolved as the communion of obedience.

In both of these, the active and the passive communion, "it is not good for man to live alone," for "we are members one of another." The bread and wine of love yearn to be shared, and they grow by giving as in mutual communion of spirit, and they dry up by hoarding unto one's self. "Let us go up together to the house of the Lord. There He will teach us of his ways and we will walk in his paths." Communion with Christ means with all whom He loves. 'Tis they who walk among men in the communion-spirit, to whom men's hearts bow in love as unto a walking benediction. 'Tis they who suffer with Christ — a most strenuous and active form of communion which seems to those outside to be so utterly passive, but in them that are shut in is often a superhuman energy so patiently active—it is these that are specially communicants to others of lessons of grace that none can question, and are radiant with Him with whom they reign amidst human hearts.

After a Return from Yearly Meeting.

An Utterance of Prayer and Practice by Ann Eliza Bacon.

[This, with another paper, has been found in her handwriting, with this statement: "Feeling it required, as I believe, of me to write down these two prayers, spoken by me at Greenwich Meeting, N. J., three months ago or more, for the benefit of those who may come after, I do so."]

O Lord, we come before Thee, that we may plead with Thee for the remnant of Thy people who are scattered up and down in the earth. That Thou wouldst be pleased, yet more, to make of us sons and daughters; for what greater honor could we have than to be able truly to call God Father? And that Thou wouldst be pleased to let the eye of Thy compassion rest upon us; for Thou, in Thy wisdom, hadst allowed us to become sorely shorn of our strength and reduced very low, even as the dregs in the wine cask after the best has been taken away, or as that which has lain in the field after the harvest has been gathered in; so that Thy adorable name may be greatly magnified in raising us up again. And by the light which Thou wilt yet cause to shine through us, Thou mayst be honored among all the nations of the earth.

And now, O Holy Father, as this latter house which Thou art about to raise up again is to be far more glorious than that which has gone before, wilt Thou be pleased to make Thy minister a flame of fire:—Thy elder, whom Thou hast honored, still more honorable:—the middle-aged [shall be] about them and the glory shall be in the midst of them, and they shall be for an ensign in the nations; and the heads which have been bowed down shall be lifted up; and the hands which have been, as it were, fastened upon the loins, shall be loosed—for the mouth of the Lord has spoken it. And now, O Holy Father, how shall we come before Thee? How shall we return sufficient praise unto Thee for that which Thou hast been pleased to manifest to us? For to Thee and to Thy dear Son belong all the Glory, the Honor and the Power, both now and forever. Amen."

And she adds, "And upon writing this, the language which is sealed upon my heart is—'Sooner shall my covenant with day and night fail than that which I have made with this people.'"

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Beckonings From Little Hands.

This is the title of a small book from the pen of Pattersou Du Bois. First written for private circulation, it has been given to the public upon earnest solicitation of those who had the privilege of reading it, and now it is in a fourth edition. Human nature is such a variable quantity, and the range of character in the world is so great, that one says with some reserve that a book should be read by others. Child life, however, is of universal interest, and when it really finds a voice, that voice should be widely heard. With rare pathos the author of these Beckonings has voiced what, in too many households and schools, is largely voiceless. Self-reproach is a touching undertone in all the chapters, but it is not a hopeless self-reproach. Parents' mistakes, under the magic of the author's presentation, are made a veritable school for the training of parents and teachers. So the little book can be freely commended for general reading. Few can put it aside after the first chapter, and few can read it once without returning to it again and again. It required some heroism to print some of the confessions, but it is all done, as most plainly appears, for the children.

J. HENRY BARTLETT.

No man is so poor as the cynic. No quest for wisdom is so hopeless as that of the scorner. No task is so utterly futile as that of discovering the faults and failings of men.—Examiner.

John Woolman and His Friends.

BY EDITH BARDSEY BELLOW.

The men and women who maintained the traditions of the Society of Friends and made its history during the period with which we are here concerned (1735-1775), were as diverse in character, manner and method as are their successors in these days, and it is as difficult to pick out any one or two from among their number and point to them as representative, as it would be to select from this and other Yearly Meetings one or two men and women and say, "These are typical Friends."

So John Woolman and those who were intimately associated with him in his work represent only one or two types of Friends of the eighteenth century. Naturally the purest lights shone with the greatest brilliancy, and it is to them our attention is specially drawn.

The Society of Friends at that time had problems to wrestle with which, while they did not involve the members in such dangers and personal risks as the earlier Friends had encountered, nevertheless called for the services of men at once strong and tender, clear-headed, obedient to conscience, in which is heard the voice of God, and very forgetful of self. And such were John Woolman, Anthony Benezet, Samuel Emlen, and a few others.

John Woolman was born in Eighth Month, 1720, at Northampton, Burlington County, West Jersey, as it was then called. Though his inherent qualities were doubtless great and good, much credit is due to his parents for their judicious training. They were devout and sensible people, made their children the subjects of habitual, earnest prayer, and by way of following up their petitions, they were careful to furnish them with a supply of good books.

When but seven years old he could read so understandingly that one day, on his way home from school, he separated himself from his companions and went forward out of their sight to sit down and read the twenty-second chapter of Revelation, and he records in his journal: "In reading it my mind was drawn to seek after that pure habitation which I then believed God had prepared for his servants. The place where I sat and the sweetness that attended my mind, remain fresh in my memory."

Until he was eighteen his inward life passed through a varied and fluctuating experience, but drawing the ebb and flow of his religious feeling, he did not let go the means and helps of spiritual progress. He read books likely to be of profit to him, he attended meetings, and he never gave up the habit of prayer. When he fully realized that frivolous companions were hindering the development of his best self, he broke off from them, evidently at great cost of feeling. He acted characteristically—he saw that religious decision and spiritual peace were to be desired, and he did not languidly wait for them to come; he resolutely set himself to attain them, and his heavenly Father met and satisfied his desires.

When he became of age he engaged himself to a shopkeeper and baker "to tend shop and keep his books." This was at Mt. Holly, about five miles from his father's house. Soon after this he began to speak in meetings. His first attempt was not encouraging. He went to meeting in an awed and weighty frame of mind, and "being under a strong exercise of spirit," he stood up and spoke. With a most engaging candor he adds, "but not keeping close to the Divine opening, I said more than was required." Whether his own heart only told him this, or whether some faithful elder acted the part of monitor we are not informed. In either case Woolman was "afflicted in mind" on account of it, and did not try again for six weeks. At the end of that time, "feeling the spring of Divine love opened and a concern to speak," he made another attempt and found peace. His comment upon this is most suggestive, and may well be pondered by every minister of the gospel:—"Being thus humbled and disciplined under the cross, my understanding became more strengthened to distinguish the pure Spirit, which inwardly moves upon the heart, and which taught me to wait in silence, sometimes many weeks together, until I felt that rise which prepares the creature to stand like a trumpet, through which the Lord speaks to his flock."

When but twenty-three years of age he made the resolve "to pursue," as he says, "worldly business no further than as truth opened my way." He accordingly learnt tailoring, believing that by following this calling he might earn a sufficient living "without the load of great business," and he tells us, "I was taught to be content with it, though I felt at times a disposition that would have sought for something higher." Soon after, he parted from his employer and set up on his own account, doing the work himself without even an apprentice, and he never aspired to be anything higher in the ranks of secular emulation.

The following beautiful passage in the journal deserves the best attention of those whose business or possessions occupy their minds to such an extent as to prove a snare to them:—"My mind, through the power of truth, was in a good degree weaned from the desire of outward greatness, and I was learning to be content with real conveniences that were not costly; so that a way of life free from much entanglement appeared best for me, though the income might be small. I had several offers of business that appeared profitable, but I did not see my way clear to accept of them, as believing they would be attended with more outward care and cumber than was required of me to engage in. I saw that a humble man, with the blessing of the Lord, might live on a little; and that where the heart was set on greatness, success in business did not satisfy the craving; but that commonly with an increase of wealth, the desire of wealth increased. There was a care on my mind so to pass my time, that nothing might hinder me from the most steady attention to the voice of the true Shepherd."

Woolman's first direct contact with slavery shows us his character in a very striking manner. It was during his engagement in the store at Mt. Holly. "His employer owned a negro woman, whom he sold, and desired Woolman to write a bill of sale. The purchaser was waiting, and it had to be done at once, so he had no time for consideration, and complied; but afterwards his mind was uneasy, and though he could say that he did it for his employer, a man greatly his senior, and that the purchaser was a Friend, the thought of having it were, written away the life of a human being, caused him great searchings of heart, and he inwardly resolved that for the fut he would have no part, direct or indirect, in traffic against which his conscience revolted. So began what was probably the most effective mission ever undertaken for the undermining of the slave trade in America. Effectiveness was in its quietness and tenacity. He did not "strive nor cry, nor call his voice to be heard on the streets," yet history of the abolition of slavery in America can be reckoned adequate which does not sign a very large part to the quiet preparatory work of John Woolman, one of the most and quietest of men.

Friends, like all other people, were implicated in slavery, if not in the importation of negroes, but among them slavery was seen in its mildest form. Not only were their slaves treated with care and kindness, but taken also for their moral and religious culture. Nevertheless, an intuitive sense of right led members from time to time to urge upon Friends generally the inconsistency of abiding with the profession of Christianity and Chester Quarterly Meeting particularly, pressed the Yearly Meeting for the Pennsylvania and New Jersey Colonies to adopt a decided measure against any traffic in human beings; but the utmost that could be obtained of the Yearly Meeting from 1716-1743 was expression of an opinion adverse to the importation of negroes, and a desire that "Friends generally do, as much as may be, avoid such negroes as may hereafter be brought in, rather than offend any Friends who are against it; yet this is only caution, and no censure."

In the year 1742 occurred the event, simple and inconsiderable in itself, which was the instrumental cause of exerting a mighty influence upon slavery in the Society of Friends—the sale of the negro woman in the small shop at Mt. Holly was the starting-point of John Woolman's life-long testimony against slavery. He began the work when he was twenty years of age; he laid it down only at his death. "No enterprise could seem more hopeless to me than a view of the subject John Woolman did not allow to weigh with him. The appalling magnitude of the evil against which he felt called to contend was painfully manifest to him, all about him, in every department of life and human activity, in the State and Church, he saw evidences of its strength, the depth and extent to which its roots were wound their way among the foundation of society. Yet he seems never to have doubted for a moment the power of simple truth to eradicate it, nor to have hesitated as to his own duty in regard to it."

The first mention he makes of it as a personal concern was when on a religious visit to Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina in 1744. He was afflicted by the prevalence of slavery; it appeared to him "as a dark gloom overhanging the land." Wherever he went he found his fellow-professors "entangled in the mischief of slavery." "Elders and ministers, as well as the younger and less high in profession, had slaves for their household and field hands. In love, but at the same time with great faithfulness, he endeavored to the masters of their error, and to awaken sympathy for the enslaved."

His companion on this visit was Isaac Andrews, from Haddonfield Monthly Meeting. It was during this journey that the question was posed on his attention—what ought to be his relation to slaveholders who were kind enough to welcome him to their homes. He says, "When I ate, drank and lodged free cost with people who lived in ease on the hard labor of their slaves I felt uneasy; and as my mind turned inward to the Lord, I found this uneasiness return upon me at times, through the night visit."

He reasons out the matter in his journal, and his deep anxiety to avoid saving his own money and receiving a gift from the "gain of oppression" is the occasion of much inward conflict. Sometimes he adopted the contrivance of providing himself with a number of small pieces of silver, and on leaving a house where he felt, as he expressed it, "I should not keep clear from the gain of oppression without having money," he would walk to the heads of the family privately, and give them to accept of some pieces of silver and give them to such of their negroes as would make the best use of them. He says, "Thus offering them to some who appeared to be wealthy people, was a trial both to me and to them. But the fear of the Lord so covered my heart at times that my way was made easier than expected; and few, if any, manifested any objection at the offer, and most of them, in some conversation, accepted of them." He has in this a specimen of moral courage of an uncommon and much-needed kind. A man who could act thus was a prophet indeed, and everything he might say in remembrance concerning the evil he saw would come home to those he addressed with double force and supported by such manifestly self-denial consistency.

From this time on, ever full of compassion, awaiting for the call as though he had no other object in life than to follow in the footsteps of his Master, "going about doing good," he journeyed from meeting to meeting chiefly on foot—and as we follow him in his life by means of his Journal, we see the fruit of gentleness, the irresistible force of never careful not to outrun his commission, the mindfulness that "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." Looking round on the society in which he moved, he saw other than those connected with slavery, that he earnestly and humbly set himself to correct. For example, lotteries were very common, and were participated in by Friends well as others. In one of the Yearly Meetings at Newport a discussion arose on the subject.

Woolman opposed them on the ground that their spirit "was one of selfishness which tended to confuse and darken the understanding." The debate was conducted with considerable vigor, and Woolman says, "In the midst of zeal I made reply to what an ancient Friend said, and when I sat down I saw that my words were not enough seasoned with charity." He was uneasy at this, and with characteristic humility and directness he endeavored to repair his error—"After some time to exercise and hearty repentance for not having attended closely to the safe guide, I got up, and rectifying the passage, acquainted Friends that though I durst not go from what I had said as to the matter, yet I was uneasy with the manner of my speaking, believing milder language would have been better. As this was uttered in some degree of creaturely abatement, after a warm debate, it appeared to have a good savor amongst us." "No doubt it had; and no doubt it furthered the cause he was contending for more than would have been done by the most convincing argument. The man who could thus strip from himself every shred of pride, would possess a moral and spiritual persuasive force which no logic could bestow." "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted," and, may we not add, he shall find the cause he wishes to promote is exalted too.

Small People Great Examples.

If the heroes and saints, the thinkers and savants, have their part in the direction of the affairs of the world, the humble and unknown have theirs also. And many times these illustrious geniuses and the venerated benefactors of humanity have gone to seek their inspirations and their thoughts from the small ones of the world. The small have need of the great; the great cannot get along without the small. I am infinitely touched by the lessons that God gives us by those masters without orders, those professors without diplomas, the unknown passers-by. Among others, I know two little ragpickers, who have taught me great things without ever having spoken to me, nor perhaps ever seeing me. I have often met these two companions, in the cold misty mornings, at the hour when men and things have such a mournful aspect that one hesitates to take up one's daily task, and when the moral spring seems stiffened and rusty, like the tendons of a fouled horse. They were already returning from their work, toward eight o'clock; that is to say, in December, just at daybreak,—just when many others, even among the laborers, who had scarcely begun their day's toil. Hitched to their cart, which they drew with a light step, they mounted toward their faubourg, rich with their early findings, paper, rags, bones, corks, sardine boxes and old hats. To see them pass thus, I do not know what helpful breath of courage blows over me, penetrates me, and has more effect on me than all the exhortations of moralist or philosopher. Had they not shaken off their desire for sleep, and taken up their harness again at four o'clock in the morning? Did they not do this every day, and in all kinds of weather? And why? To go and gather a few scraps of household leavings, or those of factories, tatters of papers or stuffs.

If the obscure rag-pickers, scarcely more than children yet, could find in themselves such an energy for such labor, what energy should not I show in hastening to my labor—I, whose function it is to lift the fallen, and to gather up those who are being lost in human society. That which I go to seek in the night, and in the cross-roads and by-paths of life, I, rag-picker for God, are human souls, rejected, like debris; and the master, to whom I bring my findings, is the merciful Father, before there is joy over the repentant sinner—the afflicted one consoled and the miserable comforted.

Since they have suggested these reflections to me, brought this encouragement, I never see them pass, these young toilers, without emotion. But they gave me, the other day, a pleasure altogether particular, and like a feast for the soul. It was Ash Wednesday. On that day, as after all great holidays, there is much to glean in the streets. I saw them, therefore, return loaded with packages, sacks full, where overflowed or hid the curious merchandise of a carnival. But in the middle of the cart, buried in the bundles up to her chest, there was seated an old woman. My little rag-pickers, with the aim of doing more work that morning, had brought their old mother with them. She had lent them her hand, and in return they were giving her a ride home in a carriage.

The young folks' faces told that they were glad to give her a ride and save her old legs. The mother's face shone with pride to have children like those, as good as they were strong. And I found such examples all the greater, because they who set them were among the smallest.—CHARLES WAGNER, in the Soul of Things, J. E.

Honor Shown to a Parent.

Dama was the chief jeweler of Ascalon, and eminently distinguished for his exemplary life and many virtues. On a certain occasion a committee of the elders called upon him for the purpose of purchasing precious stones with which to ornament the ephod of the high priest. Diamonds were the stones they sought, and having thus informed the jeweler, they offered him what they considered a fair price for the gems. Dama told them he could not at that time attend to them, and bade them call again later in the day. The elders did not wish to be thus put off; and, moreover, they suspected that this was only a ruse on the part of the jeweler to increase the price of the stones. They persisted in their demand for immediate attention. Diamonds, such as only Dama possessed were necessary to complete the ephod, and they offered double and triple the price they had at first proposed. But Dama was immovable, and they finally went away greatly disappointed, not to say wrathful.

Later in the day the elders called again, and Dama placed before them the diamonds they desired, and when they had made their selection they tendered to him the higher price which they had just offered.

"No," said the jeweller, "Your first offer was all the stones are worth, and that only will I take." "Why, then," exclaimed the chief of the elders, in astonishment, "did you not close with that offer this morning?"

"Because," answered Dama, "my father had the key of the chest in which the diamonds were deposited, and he was at that time asleep. He is aged and infirm, and his short hour of sleep was of more worth to him than was your increased offer of price to me. My father has not so many comforts that I can knowingly deprive him of a single one of them."

The high priest, when he had heard the story, came to the jeweler's house, and laid his hand upon Dama's head, and said: Blessed be thou by Him who hath said, 'Honor thy father and thy mother;' and in the time to come may thy children honor thee as thou hast honored the author of thy being."—Selected.

HEIGHTS AND DEPTHS.

There is a center 'mid the volleying thunders,
 Where silence doth obtain;
 There is a depth of ocean where the waters
 Ever unmoved remain;
 There are aerial heights wherein no vapor
 Of cloud can e'er be seen;
 There's an expanse o'er spreads the dome of darkness,
 Where night hath never been.

So the Cometh of God, amid life's tumult,
 Ceth a hush most sweet;
 So in affliction's depths he finds a calmness
 Of rest at Jesus' feet;
 Thence to an altitude of faith he rises
 Where there no doubt can live,
 And soars through sorrow's shades to joy unbounded—
 The joy Christ's love doth give.

A Visit to Algiers.

BY ELIZABETH S. KITE.

First Month 3d, 1905.

My Dear Ones Beyond the Sea:—Every moment spent in this wonderland is precious beyond compare. Fancy being able to go to one's window and stepping out on the balcony look out upon a wilderness of huge palms, with a snowy white mosque on the left and the blue bay of Algiers beyond, with snow-covered mountains against the sky, while directly in front is an open space, at this moment filled with booths and stalls, for a fair is going on, and a ceaseless going and coming of human figures clad in the most picturesque costumes under the sun; while to the right the snowy white city rests tier upon tier up the steep slope of the hill. But you must not imagine that we are in the scorching heat of the desert, for at this moment the weather is very inclement; snow not only covers the mountains, but is actually falling over the palm trees and the white mosque at our feet. It is almost unheard of, they say, and cannot last long—but of course this is their coldest season.

We had a frightful passage coming over, though the sky was quite clear, and the sea—remember, the real Mediterranean Sea—was a perfect blue. When we reached Marseilles the "mistral," a northeast wind from the Pyrenees, was blowing a furious gale. We tried to go about a little, but the streets were a perfect whirlwind of dust and rubbish. The coacher who took us to the boat had us to get out before getting to the corner opening on the dock, because he said it would overturn us. We were due to sail at one P. M. As a matter of fact they did not dare leave the wharf until seven the next morning. Then instead of crossing direct, we were forced to hug the coast of Spain, which took us much longer. Naturally the boat was not so large as an ocean steamer, and did not take the sea so well.

It was two P. M. of the next day as we turned into the glorious bay of Algiers, glowing in the sunlight. I can give you no faint conception of the picturesqueness of the landing scene. All about us in the bay were vessels loading or unloading by means of innumerable beggary Arabs and Moors, whose rags over their bare chocolate and coffee-colored legs gave them a rarely picturesque aspect.

All about in the form of an amphitheatre rose the hills, covered with date palms and snowy mosques, summer palaces and gardens, while the city rose in a solid, triangular, white mass, as though quarried from the rock of the hills. Before us the wharf was a living mass of gorgeous coloring. As we slowly sidled up to the landing Arabs in boats came alongside and scrambled like monkeys into the ship, while the moment we were near enough they began swarming the deck, one boosting the other on board. In the gay crowds a little further off—French officials in fine costumes, Parisian looking women, mingled with innumerable common soldiers—native and French zouaves with liberal swarms of Arabs, Moors and negroes, thronged the water front. Everyone spoke French, but we gave ourselves over into the hands of Cook's agent, who found for us an Arab, who at once unwound a brilliant colored scarf from his head, passed it through the handles of our bags, shouldered them and started off to find the omnibus belonging to the Hotel de la Régence. He wore a blue jacket, full white muslin trousers gathered up like a divided skirt, bare coffee-colored legs with low cloth slippers.

When our luggage was deposited we decided to walk to the hotel, which we had seen in the distance. At every step we met new surprises. Filthy but indescribably picturesque beggars crouched in every corner, and when we reached the esplanade at a higher level along the water front, great groups of them—of Moors I mean, but of a much finer, and some of them almost elegant type, were moving about with slow measured steps and faces of placid indifference, their long white robes gathered about them and turbans borne majestically. Nothing is so striking about these natives as their apparent absolute passivity, their calm and repose. Even the beggars at the wharf were not like beggars at all, so far as impertunity went. They simply sat and hugged their rags in calm indifference. In front of the hotel, in the Place du Gouvernement, crowds were moving about with such majestic and solemn aspect, so wierd and fantastical, that it seemed indeed as though we had suddenly stepped out into some scene of the Arabian Nights. At the hotel we soon had secured our rooms, deposited our belongings, and were sauntering forth for a first glimpse of the new world into which we had been ushered. Without any concerted plan we boldly entered into the first narrow passage that we came to, that gave promise of permitting an "answer." Up, up, they went, turning and changing every few steps—seldom ten feet wide and often far less—always a series of steps of the same white limestone of which the houses are built. But how shall I give you an idea of the picturesque groups that passed us or that appeared descending from a higher level—veiled women, patriarchal Jews with huge grizzled beards and brilliantly colored burnouses and gay turbans, crouching as they walked, with long, curved, horny fingers, majestic Moors with white flowing garments, huge Turks in red fez and black mustaches, native zouaves with blue jackets and red cloth divided skirts, and so on, and so on.

As we passed along we had innumerable glimpses into interiors, of as great variety. Sometimes in a black hole a charcoal vender sat on his rug with folded arms as if awaiting the trump of doom. Again it was a group of tailors squatting on mats, busied with old strips of cloth that they were making in burnouses, or it was a "café maure," a long narrow hole with benches on the side, which lounged turbanned idlers, while a gay figure in the background was preparing coffee on a porcelain stove. Sometimes a beautifully arched doorway opened through Moorish ornate into a beautiful inner court where we saw children playing; or again, coming out into a wider street, merchants of every description sitting upon rugs, displaying orient stuffs, fruits, flowers and vegetables of an inviting aspect. We finally wound round in the French quarter and so back to the hotel in time to dress for dinner.

10 A. M.—It is snowing and raining again. This weather may drive us into the desert—sincerely hope so. Our plan is to return Marseilles by way of Tunis, visiting our Carthage. In all we expect to be gone three weeks. It is about four hundred miles Tunis, and we expect to break the journey Constantine, a most picturesque city w Roman ruins. From here it is a day's trip the cars to the real desert—Biskra, a wonderful city on a beautiful oasis. How I hope get there.

Love of the Brethren.

In the year 1692 it was computed that losses of Friends in Ireland by the robbery and spoils of soldiers and other people amount to one hundred thousand pounds, equal to five hundred thousand dollars. Now the Friends of the Meeting for Sufferings in London, sympathizing with their brethren in Ireland, signify their readiness to assist them; to which the Half Year's Meeting returned answer, acknowledging their tender care, however present they rather chose to decline the acceptance of their friendly offer, the several provinces being as yet able to help one another.

However, Friends here did afterwards accept of the benevolence of the brethren in England and in the year 1692 they drew six hundred pounds towards helping Friends here reduced by the late calamitous fire, besides one hundred and fifty pounds remitted from London to Ulster, and the sum of hundred and sixty pounds more was sent this purpose from London, which in the year 1692 was ordered to be distributed proportionately to each province and a letter was sent the Meeting for Sufferings in London, acknowledging their acceptance thereof, but wishing that a full stop should be put to this sending any more.

Friends in Barbadoes sent one hundred pounds at this time for the relief of the suffering Friends in Ireland.

JOHN BRADFORD, who suffered martyrdom under Queen Mary, wrote a letter to his friend out of prison, a short time before he was burnt, in which are these expressions: "Consider your dignity as children of God and the titles of the Holy Ghost, and members of Christ, be ashamed therefore to think, speak or do anything unseemly for God's children and members of Christ."

Friends in Civil Office.

about the year 1687 under king James, the Government of Ireland having made choice of Friends to serve in corporations and magistracies, and some few having accepted thereof, though it was not of their own seeking, a paper of tender advice was drawn up in order of a general meeting to Friends who were so concerned, to keep to the truth in anything that they might shine as lights to the world, and be helpful to bring forth just judgment and righteousness, and on this occasion George Fox wrote a letter to Wm. Sanderson, dated from Kingston on Thames, 17, viz.:

Dear Wm.—As for the friends of Dublin, Limerick and other places that have taken the offices of alderman and burgesses upon them, they must consider and be wise, for if they keep to truth they can neither take any oath, nor put any oaths to any one, neither they put on their gowns and strange kind of habits, as Friends have considered it here in they talk of putting them in such places; (again, when they have the aldermen, or, or, or common council feasts, Friends here do not join them in such things; but if they make the poor a feast that cannot feast again, Friends have preferred to join with them; but to feast them that will feast you again, and to join them in their strange kind of habits and formalities is not like truth, and denies the pomp and fashions of this world; but in their places they should do justice to all men and be a terror to them that do and a praise to them that do well, and serve every man both in his natural rights (properties, and in his divine rights and duties according to the righteous law of GEORGE FOX.)

was the advice of a Yearly Meeting in 1865, as quoted by A. Neave Brayshaw in the Friend, "that schools and schoolmasters were faithful Friends and well qualified to be aided and encouraged in all counties, cities, and towns or places where there may be need, that such schoolmasters, as much as may sometimes correspond one with another for help and improvement in such good and sound methods as are most agreeable to the parents, and the children's advantage and benefit." In these modern days of easy and rapid communication, "corresponding one with another" is readily done by face to face encounters. The notice of the annual meeting of Friends' National Association is on the last page of this number. Friends should be attracted by these meetings, and should feel it a privilege to be part in them. Of late years there has been an apparent growth of interest in education. We welcome this for the Truth's "advantage and benefit," to quote again the words of our quaint minute of 1695. Our schools ought to be centres of quickening to life in all things, and well concerned Friends can do these centres by taking part in the annual conferences.

THE INDIAN'S PRAYER.

The childlike simplicity of the following lines, handed down from a former generation, as a New England Indian's prayer, will induce our readers to forgive his dialect.—Ed.

In de dark wood, no Indian nigh,
Den me look Heben and send up cry.
Upon me knee so low.
Den God on high in shiny place,
See Me at night wid teary face—
De Spirit tell me so.

He send te angel take me care,
He come heseff, he hear um prayer
If Indian's heart do pray,
He see me now, he know me here,
He say, "Poor Indian, neber fear, Me wid you night and day."

So me lub God wid inside heart,
He fight for me, he takes um part,
He save um life before;
God lub poor Indian in de wood,
Den me lub God and dat be good,
Me praise Him two time more.

And when time come poor Indian die,
Me grow great man above de sky,
Me blanket leab behind,
Me hab no need ob wigwam dere,
Me better habitation share
Wid Jesus, god and kind.

When me get dere, me young and fair,
Me see my Jesus very near,
Me praise Him all the time;
Me neber tire, me always dere,
So dat be nuff, me end my prayer,
Amen, so let it be.

George Whitehead.

An Essay prepared for the Moorcroft Reading Circle, by Anna Wood Ritchie.

At the opening of the seventeenth century the name of Quaker was unknown in England; and yet there was scarcely a principle for which they stood which was not held one here and another there, by religious sects then in existence.

For a century or more the struggle to break away from the bondage of the church had been going on, and one by one the old superstitions were being thrown out.

Henry VIII., in the middle of the sixteenth century had declared the Church of England independent from the Pope.

In the reign of Edward the VI., Protestantism was established by law, and under Elizabeth the church was freed from nearly all Romish forms and doctrines. Severe laws were passed for the punishment of all dissenters from the established church of England.

But the "church," because of its failure to meet the real spiritual needs of the people, had been steadily losing its authority, and now there was a new and stronger spirit of reform in the land, and a genuine seeking after a way of personal approach to God himself, without the medium of the church.

This restlessness led to the formation of many sects, holding many new beliefs.

Then came George Fox, who by his clearer vision and his own experience of the Divine presence, was able to select those things which were vital and lasting among these various doctrines; and to interpret them in a way so simple and forcible, that many found through his preaching what they had long been seeking; and joined with him to live these simple truths, and so perpetrate them.

Among those who were early drawn and satisfied by the truth lived by George Fox and the early Friends, was George Whitehead. He was born in the county of Westmoreland, England, in 1636, and after a grammar school education and a period spent in tutoring, it was the wish of his parents that he should study for the office of minister in the Established Church. But he shared, with many of his time, a dissatisfaction with the existing conditions of the church, and with his own spiritual life, and was earnestly seeking for a better and more satisfying way, when he heard of the people called Quakers.

"From early inclinations and desires," he says, "which the Lord was graciously pleased to stir up in my heart towards his blessed truth as it is in Christ Jesus, I was drawn to be inquisitive after the knowledge thereof, and how to become truly penitent, and witness a true amendment of life from such a vain conversation, as, in my childhood I had, with many others, been prone to. Being partly educated under a Presbyterian ministry, which the Lord showed me in divers things came short of what they professed and pretended in their worship, preachings and prayings: insomuch that before I heard of the people called Quakers, I could not cordially join with them, and being at a loss in my spirit, for what I sometimes secretly desired and wanted, I was as one bewildered, and wandered further, seeking among other people, who had some higher and more refined notions concerning spiritual gifts. I was then about fourteen years of age."

"After a short time I heard of some people called Quakers, who trembled at the word of God; and, observing how they were reviled and reproached by loose and wicked persons, occasioned my further inquiry, and thereupon the Lord gave me to believe, they were his people, and I contended for them and their principles, so far as they were represented favorably to me, before I was at a meeting of theirs, or heard any of them minister."

"After some religious discourses with some young men, soberly inclined, and when we had newly heard of a few people called Quakers, I was desirous to go to a meeting of theirs."

"At my first going to the said meeting, what was most observable to me was, when I came into the meeting and sat down seriously among them, after a little space of silence, a Friend, Thomas Arey, spake a little while of the spiritual deliverances, travels and progress of the Lord's service, in his way and work; alluding to Israel's deliverance out of Egypt. All which I thought I easily understood allegorically, as spiritualized, but there appeared to me a great work of the power of the Lord in the meeting, breaking the hearts of divers into great sorrow, weeping and contrition of spirit, which I believed was a godly sorrow for sin, in order to unfeigned repentance."

"These things, upon serious observation, making deep impression upon my mind, I was the more confirmed in the belief I had before, that the Lord was at work among that small, despised people, and that he was about to gather and raise up a people unto himself, to worship Him in the spirit and in the truth, for such He seeks to worship Him acceptably."

"Under these considerations, I was induced to leave the parish priests, or ministers made by the will of man, having no divine authority from God, nor commission from Christ to teach others."

"And, though I met with opposition and hard speeches from some near relatives and others, who were bearers of those priests, for a confessing and vindicating truth according to that little measure of understanding I then had, being but weak and young in years, and beset with divers temptations and discouragements, yet the Lord my God helped me to take up a resolution, not only wholly to leave the said priests, but also constantly to resort to the meetings of his despised people called Quakers."

"Some time after, I was fully convinced and my mind turned to the light, before I heard our dear friend George Fox. The first time I heard him minister was at a meeting at Sunny Bank. I was then very low, serious, and intent in my mind, willing to see and taste for myself, for my own inward satisfaction; and I saw and felt that his testimony was weighty and deep; that it proceeded from life and experience, and did bespeak Divine revelation. His speech was not affected eloquence or oratory, or human wisdom, but in the simplicity of the gospel, to turn the mind to the light and life of Christ; and the Lord abundantly blessed his ministry to many."

"Being joined to the said people, in derision called Quakers, and resolved by the grace of God to continue in their communion, and to wait upon God in his light wherewith He had enlightened my understanding, I had great satisfaction therein, being sensible that our society and converse with one another, as we had received the love of the Truth, was helpful and encouraging to us, and tended to our edification and comfort. I greatly loved and delighted in the free conversation of sober, faithful Friends."

Already the new sect was meeting with opposition. We can see that the priests, because of the prevailing idea of uniformity, and because they feared to lose their positions if the new ideas should become prevalent, became the first enemies of the Quakers. When they could not stop the progress and spreading of the Truth by their preaching against it, they instigated the magistrates to persecution and imprisonment, especially of those who were actively engaged in preaching the new doctrines. And so it came about that George Whitehead very early shared in the persecution. For when he was but seventeen years old he first felt called to appear in the ministry.

"Some time after I was conversant among our Friends, and frequented meetings to which I belonged, in Westmoreland and Yorkshire.

I was inwardly exercised in waiting upon the Lord in them. We had but little preaching, our meetings being kept much and often in silence; yet the Lord was pleased sometimes by his power and Word of life, both to tender and open my heart and understanding, so that He gave me now and then a few words livingly to utter in some meetings, to our mutual comfort in Him who opened our hearts in great love one to another. . . . And when my ability was but small, and I in much weakness, fear, and trembling, many times, the Lord helped me and increased strength and ability in my labors beyond all expectation; this care still resting upon me ever in my early travels, to minister only according to the ability given me of my Heavenly Father, and to keep within the compass of my own gift, and when the Spirit of the Lord opened and moved but in a few words, I must not exceed, but sit down in silence when that ceased.

So there came into active service in the Society, one who from the beginning never wavered from his loyalty to its principles, and never wearied in his labors to spread them.

His Journal tells of nearly seventy years spent in travelling through the midland counties of England, carrying his message of love to many meetings of Friends, preaching in churches when duty demanded it, convincing many of the Truth, and valiantly defending it in public meetings, which sometimes called for disputation with those who attacked it, and all this amid cruel persecutions, whippings and imprisonments; but, keeping through everything his strong, simple faith, and his joyful realization of the living presence of the Spirit with him. Thus he expresses in beautiful language after a long and severe imprisonment in Edmondsbury Jail.

"I am," he says, "truly and humbly thankful to the Lord our God, in remembrance of his great kindness to us, how wonderfully He supported and comforted us, through and over all our tribulations, strait confinements, and ill usage, and preserved us in bodily health. In the comfortable enjoyment of his glorious, Divine Power and presence, several of us have often been made to sing aloud in praise of His glorious Name; yea, His high praises, have been in our mouths often times, to the great amazement and astonishment of the malefactors shut up in the same ward with us. When walking therein our hearts have been lifted up in loving praise to the Lord, often for several hours together, with voices of melody. Oh! the sweet presence and power of the Lord our God! how precious to be enjoyed in prisons and dungeons, and strait confinements. O! my soul bless thou the Lord, and forever praise His excellent Name, for the true, inward sense and experience thou hast often and long had, an still hast, of His Divine Power and unspeakable goodness."

There is no part of the life of George Whitehead which is not interesting to follow; especially is this true of his labors for the relief of the persecuted and imprisoned Friends throughout England, which filled the latter part of his life.

PENNSYLVANIA'S NAME.—The origin of the name of the State of Pennsylvania is found in a letter of William Penn, its founder, dated, says the Presbyterian, First Month 5th, 1861, from which the following is an extract:

"This day, after many watchings, waitings, solicitings and disputes in councils, my country has been confirmed to me under the seal of England, with large powers and privileges, by the name of Pennsylvania—a name the king gave it in honor of my father. I chose New Wales, being a hilly country; when the secretary, a Welshman, refused to call it New Wales. I proposed Sylvania, and they added Penn to it, though I was much opposed to it, and went to the king to have it struck out. He said it was passed, and he would not take it upon him; for I fear it might be looked upon as a vanity in me, and not as a respect in the king to my father, as it really was."

FOR 'THE FRIEND' The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

At this time George W. Mott and his wife Abigail, from Coal Creek, Iowa, were in charge of the Boarding School at Tunesassa, having succeeded Abner Woolman and his daughter in the Sixth Month previous. The last name Friends had remained in this service about twelve years, having continued in charge the Institution at the request of the Committee until their successors were appointed.

In their interview with the Indians in a visit the Committee presented them with an Address which explained to them the measure which existed for additional legislation to enable them to make valid the leases which had previously given, and pointed out to them the fact that an ineffectual attempt had recently been made at Washington to induce Congress to pass an Act by which about one half of the Allegheny Reservation might have been taken from them in the interest of the whites—the probability that similar efforts would be made in the future, and also expressed to them their judgment that it would conduce to the welfare if they would divide their land, so that each one's portion could be distinctly known.

In the interviews with the Indians on this occasion the most interesting was that with the Cattaraugus Reservation, where a company of about one hundred assembled at the request of the Committee, to whom the Address and the proposed Memorial and Act were read, a discussion lasting some hours ensued in which the Committee remark "several of them their intelligent questions indicate that they wish thoroughly to understand the proposition submitted for their adoption" and some amendments were suggested by them which it is thought would render the allotment of the lands, if it was agreed upon, more satisfactory.

The result of this visit, however, shows that several questions involving conflicting sentiments had occupied their minds in connection with these subjects and that as yet the Indians were not prepared to enter a proposition to divide their lands. After their return to their homes these Friends received information that at a meeting of the Seneca Council they had decided not to sign the memorial asking for an Act to enable them to divide and allot their lands.

As had been expected further efforts were soon after made by the white settlers upon the Allegheny Reservation to obtain an undivided title to the tracts of land which were occupying, and in 1873 shortly before the close of the session of Congress in Third Month, the Committee was called together in consequence of the receipt of information that a Bill had passed both the Senate and House of Representatives authorizing the sale of a portion of the Allegheny Reservation and otherwise injuriously affecting the interests of the Indians. This meeting was held Third Month 3rd, 1873, and it was then stated by Joseph Scattergood that at the request of the Indians then in Washington he had visited them in that city, and had an interview with the Secretary of the Interior, to whom the President had referred the bill for approval but who after considering the objections which had been made to it by the Indians and J. C.

tergood had consented to defer action upon until an opportunity could be had for the session of the views of the Committee.

Memorial addressed to Columbus Delano Secretary of the Interior was accordingly prepared setting forth some of the features proposed Act, which they believed were the reasons why they and the Indians objected to it and stating "that it is plain to the interests of the white settlers and owners of the preemption right have been greatly to the disadvantage of the Indians." Thomas Wistar and Joseph Scattergood were desired to present this communication to the Secretary at Washington which they did the following day, and although owing to the fact that the session of Congress and term of office of the President whose signature only was necessary to make it a law, expired at twelve o'clock on that day the Third Month was kindly made available to have an interview with the Secretary upon hearing their objections stated he could not conscientiously ask the President to affix his signature, and it was accordingly not done.

These Friends state in their report "When attendant circumstances of this visit are considered we feel there is cause for thankfulness for the success of this effort to prevent that of great injustice from being consummated."

The lateness of the hour when we applied for admission to the President's room at the hotel, where the Secretary then was, might have offered a reason for not admitting us, but to the contrary he appeared entirely disposed to hear us and to entertain our views of the matter notwithstanding a strong attempt of the members of Congress from Cattaraugus County was also present to produce an opposite result. Soon after this successful interview the inauguration of the President took place."

In the report to the Yearly Meeting in 1873 the Committee proposed that they should be authorized to sell a part of the tract of land belonging to Friends at Tunesassa "which although poorly calculated for farming purposes, produces timber, much of which might now be to advantage," and stating that after consideration they believed it would be most profitable to sell those portions which will not be needed for the use of the school. This authority was granted and in accordance therewith fifty acres of it were sold during the following year. The portions of the tract were subsequently being made in all two hundred and seventy acres and leaving in the hands of the Committee in 1876 about four hundred and twenty acres which it has since been thought may forever remain undiminished. Some of the land thus bought was paid for by work done by the purchasers in helping to clear tillable land belonging to the Institution of stumps and otherwise putting it into a condition for profitable farming.

In the Ninth Month 1873 Aaron P. Dewees and his wife, Friends from Pennsylvania, who had offered their services to the Committee were appointed as superintendents of the Boarding School; and turned upon their duties in the following month. The attention of A. P. Dewees was turned to improving the farm and farm buildings, setting out an orchard, etc., and during his residence there improvements were made by which the farm became much more productive, and the methods adopted furnished examples and suggestions which might be very useful to the Indians.

The unsettled condition of the leases in Salamanca and the other villages on the Reservation continuing to be a source of much anxiety to all concerned, the Committee prepared a written address to the President and Councillors of the nation recommending them to apply for an Act of Congress to enable them to divide their land, and also to lease such parts of it as were contained in the villages then upon it. This Address was signed Sixth Month 20th, 1873, and two of the Committee were appointed to present it.

THIRST FOR GOD

COOPER, 1779.

"My soul thirsteth for God."

I thirst, but not as once I did,
The vain delights of earth to share;
Thy wounds, Immanuel, all forbid
That I should seek my pleasure there.
It was the sight of thy dear cross
First weaned my soul from earthly things;
And taught me to esteem as dross,
The mirth of fools and pomp of kings.
I want that grace that springs from Thee,
That quickens all things where it flows,
And makes a wretched thorn like me
Bloom as the myrtle or the rose,
Dear fountain of delight unknown,
No longer sink below the brim,
But overflow and pour me down,
A living, life-giving stream!
For sure of all the plants that share
The notice of thy Father's eye,
None proves less grateful to his care,
Or yields Him merrier fruit than I.

A. F.

Oh, could we read the hearts of those About us, know their hidden woes—
The secret sources of despair,
The birth and burden of their prayer;
See thrown about their lives the mesh
Of pain from thorns within the flesh,
Our charity would lend the grace Of goodness to every face.

—Nixon Waterman.

Notes in General.

The total Christian constituency in Japan, Protestant, Roman Catholic, Greek Catholic, is 500,000.

The Missionary Link states that thirty per cent. of the Christian women in India can read, but of the women as a whole only seven out of a thousand can read.

The number of dissenters from the Orthodox Greek Church of Russia who will benefit by the Czar's recent decree is estimated from twelve millions to seventeen millions.

Thomas Van Ness publishes twelve reasons for his belief in immortality. One of them is, "whether we examine the beliefs of the lowest Indian or Malay tribe, or those of the most cultivated European nation, we find everywhere, in all times, seasons, and places, a belief in the survival after death."

VANITY'S RESPONSIBILITY.—The London Graphic says: "It is the increasing vanity of women, the rage for dress, which has produced the race of white slaves, the women who toil on scanty food, herded together in stifling rooms for fourteen hours a day to earn a shilling, to produce the cheap goods in which smartly dressed women revel."

When Stanley made his journey across Africa, starting in 1874, there was not a mission station, church or school on all that vast tract. A chain of missions is now complete from Mombasa to the mouth of the Congo, while hundreds of churches and Christian schools are to be found in inner Africa and over 100,000 native Christians.

The sum of $50,000 has been already provided for carrying on religious work during the summer in New York in various tents to be located in the city. Most of the money has been given by ex-Mayor Low and other wealthy men. For several years Seth Low has been interested in such work and has carried on work in a tent of his own near Columbus Circle.

Anetta Mills, who is at the head of a deaf mute school in China, is now in this country seeking means by which she can enlarge the school. There are over 400,000 deaf people in China, and no provision has been made for them, as the Chinese have not considered them capable of being taught. Anetta Mills's school is not under any mission board or denomination, but the mission boards and missionaries of all denominations are in sympathy with her and her work.

The Pilot states that information has been received in New York that the Pope will accord to Luis Martin, general of the Jesuits, the extraordinary privilege of still celebrating mass, although his right arm has been amputated. One of the strictest rules of the Catholic Church is that in regard to what are designated the "canonical fingers" of the priests, which are the thumb and index finger of each hand, which alone are allowed to touch the "Blessed Sacrament."

Among the religious bodies who will benefit by the Czar of Russia's decree which abolishes the restrictions on the freedom of worship, are the "Old Believers," whose churches have been closed for twenty years by the order of the procurator general of the Holy Synod. The "Old Believers" refused to consent to the reforms introduced by Peter the Great, and have maintained their primitive faith unchanged ever since. The Independent gives an interesting sketch of these people and their religious customs.

Griffith John found on his arrival in China fifty years ago 300 members of the Protestant Church. To-day there are 100,000 members of that connection. Griffith John's fifty years of service in China has brought to him so great a knowledge of Chinese affairs and so sound a judgment concerning them that the London Times often sends a correspondent to obtain his views on Chinese affairs, and publishes his opinions as authoritative. Griffith John says the present cultivation of Western learning by the officials is the result of the Boxer uprising.

Indian Commissioner Leupp can hardly do a better thing than to stop the hiring out of Indians to Buffalo Bill to cultivate savagery in his Wild West Show. We are sure he will not allow the bad practice to continue, if he is not controlled by those above him. It is a life most corrupting and tends to counteract the efforts of the Government for the civilization of the Indians. We observe that new engagements were not long ago made and that some Indians took their families with them, thus removing their children from school.—Independent.

The difficulty of avoiding absurdities when one is translating from English into such a language as that of the Micmac Indians of Nova Scotia must be very great, says the London News. We hear from the Bible Society of a curious case. In the first edition of St. Matthew in Micmac the translator found, when he came to revise it, that in Chapter xxiv., 7, instead of "Nation shall rise against nation," he had written, "A pair of snow-shoes shall rise up against a pair of snow-shoes." And yet there was only one letter misplaced.—naooktukumiksijik (a nation), having been displaced by naooktakumiksijik (a snow-shoe).

SUMMARY EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A late despatch from Washington says: Among the most interesting exhibits at the American Railway Appliance Exhibition in this city is a new type of transportation system. It is intended to carry light traffic in places where the cost of a regular railway system would make the latter impracticable. The railway has a single rail. Over this rail the car is balanced and is kept from tipping by wheels at the sides like ordinary wagon wheels, which roll on paths of gravel or broken stones. The car is of steel, capable of carrying eight tons. It is claimed that it will be only a little more than a quarter as much as the cheapest railway line, and is below the cost of a macadamized road.

It is stated that Indiana University is to send an expedition to Spain to observe the total eclipse of the sun, which occurs Eighth Month 30th, and to search for the little planet supposed, from certain mathematical considerations, to revolve around the planet Mercury. Special lenses have been made for this observation.

Governor Pennypacker has signed the bill providing for the registration of births and deaths. Under its terms the Central Bureau of Vital Statistics shall be under the immediate direction of a State registrar, to be appointed by the State Council of Health. The registrar shall be a physician of no less than three years' practice and a competent vital statistician. Each city, borough and township shall constitute a primary registration district and be in charge of a local registrar, whose duty it shall be to make returns of all births and deaths occurring in their respective districts. Permits for burial and for the removal of the bodies of the dead must be issued by the registrar of the district in which the death occurs.

Passenger gasoline motor cars appear likely to be soon introduced as a means of transportation. One recently successfully tried on the Pacific Coast is described as a thirty-foot passenger coach of standard width, with cigar-shaped front and no flat surface to offer resistance to the wind. The six-cylinder gasoline engine of 100-horse power is designed to drive the car at the rate of about forty miles an hour. As the car is in itself both coach and engine, the ordinary train crew will be abolished. The fuel cost is exceedingly low. The whole cost of operation is estimated to be only one-tenth of the regular passenger train. It is said that it is expected that it will become of great service, particularly in "local" travel.

Serious rioting has taken place in Chicago in connection with the strike of the teamsters, in which several persons have lost their lives, and many others have been injured. About two thousand men, some of whom were armed, were added to the force. The instructions to the deputy sheriffs and policemen are to use every peaceable means to quiet the rioters before using their weapons.

The United States Geological Survey has been making an exhaustive investigation of the coals and lignites of the United States to determine their fuel value and the most economic methods for their utilization for different purposes, from which it appears that most of the American coals and lignites can be used as a source of power in a gas producing plant. From this investigation it is believed that extensive undeveloped beds of lignite in Colorado and other far Western States and Texas will be made use of in the near future.

Governor Pennypacker has vetoed the bill regulating the practice of and licensing of osteopathic doctors and the establishment of a board of examiners representing the State Osteopathic Association, before whom all candidates must pass before legally beginning the practice of the profession. The Governor's main objection was that it would tend to the exclusion of those who would constitute the science of osteopathy. He says: "The approval of this bill would appear to give the authority of the State to a system of practice in the healing art, which excludes the use of medicine and the use of surgery. Should the bill become a law it would be an invasion of the State Board of Osteopathic Examiners and not by the Medical Council of Pennsylvania, which would be an anomaly in our legislation upon the subject."

It is stated that the Remington-Martin Paper Company, of Watertown, has purchased 650,000 ounce seedlings from Germany to place on its large tract in St. Lawrence County to perpetuate the stock of pulp timber. The work will be done under the supervision of State Forest Commissioner Middleton. It is estimated that an acre will bear eighty cords of wood annually on the first pulp tract, and the experiment on these lines.

The beds of sulphur which have long been known to exist at a depth of more than 600 feet in Louisiana, at the little village of Sulphur, have lately been made productive, as is stated, by a novel method. Steam has been forced in with heavy pressure through one of the shafts or wells. The sulphur is then gradually reduced the sulphur to a liquid, and the pressure from the steam forced the melted sulphur out of other wells or shafts to the surface, where it flowed a molten, golden mass, into prepared vats. When cooled, it was broken and shipped in bulk, being nearly 98 per cent. pure, and it was worth, as it stood at the mines, about $28 per ton. Luther Burbank has succeeded in growing cactus without thorns, which, it is believed, may become very valuable as a food for cattle in arid and desert regions.

Chicago has lately entered upon a system of municipal ownership of street railways, having previously successfully, as is believed, operated systems of electric lighting and water supply. The Mayor of Chicago, John D. Mayer, of Chicago, largely resulted from his advocacy of the doctrine of municipal ownership.

FOREIGN.—The second great Zemstvo Congress opened at Moscow on the 5th inst.; this body met in accordance with the receipt of the Czar, issued Third Month 3rd and is composed of 132 delegates from all parts of Russia. The Mayor of Chicago largely resulted from his advocacy of the doctrine of municipal ownership.

It is stated that there are at present twenty-one revolutionary societies in Russia, which have divisions and subdivisions scattered throughout the Empire.

A report from London says: They have a definite programme for the reconstruction of Russia's government and in the main shudder with the rest of the world when anarchists perpetrate purely criminal deeds from time to time. The revolutionary movement in Russia is a dignified, determined effort to supplant autocracy with a democratic form of government. Its adherents believe that each day marks progress toward this goal; that no distant day shall see their dream for Russia fully realized.

In Warsaw the number of deaths from riots on the 1st inst. is stated to have been 62.

The Social Democrats of Poland have proclaimed a general strike throughout Poland, a renewal of violence is anticipated. In order to avoid exciting the populace, the newspapers have been forbidden to publish accounts of the rioting in Poland.

General good order prevailed in St. Petersburg on the 1st inst., but disorders have taken place in various cities and towns throughout Russia.

Japan is much excited upon the action of France in conniving as is charged at flagrant violations of neutrality in the present war. In view of the treaty existing between England and Japan: the London Times considers the situation a very grave one, and says: "Were the facts alleged by the Japanese Government to be their Government to call upon us to fulfill our obligations under the alliance, France must remember that we should have no choice but to comply. Nothing would gratify her enemies more and nothing would bring grief more profound to the vast majority of both peoples."

In a recent International Congress in Berlin, Professor Lazarus of Berlin, who is regarded as an authority on diseases of the skin, read a paper averring that he had now only three failures in using the Roentgen rays for cancer in some hundreds of cases he had treated. The ray was effective only where the growths were not deep-seated, because its healing effect only penetrated to a depth of one-fifth of an inch. The ray seemed ineffective for larger growths.

In Poland thousands of workmen are said to have quit the drinking of spirits and the smoking of tobacco in order to deprive the Government of the revenues from those sources, and have appealed to others to practice self-denial in order to mark popular discontent with admiration. It is maintained that the Russian and Polish drinkers comply, and the Russian journals express the fear that, with the spread of the movement, there will be a serious decrease in the revenues.

A despatch from Honolulu of the 7th says: There is marked activity in the volcano of Kilauea. The flow of lava is increasing, and a rising in the crater gives indication of an eruption to be over in a few days.

It is said that Sweden and Norway are the only countries where practically every grown man can read and write. Bavaria comes next in this respect.

NOTICES.

Western Quarterly Meeting of Friends.—The train which leaves Broad Street Station, Philadelphia, A. M., on the 19th inst., will be met at West Grove, Pa. (free of charge), those desiring to attend the Western Quarterly Meeting of Friends, to be held at West Grove, Chester County, Pa. It would assist the committee if those attending could be met by post-advance. HARRY E. COOPER, | Committee
BENJ. McFADDEN, | Chairman

Westtown School Committee.—The Committee having charge of the Boarding School at Westtown is requested to meet in the Committee Room at Fourth and Arch Streets instead of at the school on Third-day 16th inst., at 10.30 o'clock. The Committee on Institution is requested to meet at 9.30 o'clock in the Committee Room; and the Committee on Admissions, in second story of No. 304 Arch Street on the same day at 9.30 o'clock.

Westtown Boarding School.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage meets trains leaving Philadelphia 7.16 and 8.18 A. M., 2.48 and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested Stage fare, fifteen cents; after 7.30 P. M., twenty cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, West Chester, Phone 1143. EDWARD G. SHELLEY, Supt.

Friends' Educational Association.—The annual meeting will be held at Friends' School, Center Street, Germantown, Seventh-day, Fifth Month 13th, 1906.

DIED, Fourth Month 16th, 1905, at Wilmington, Delaware, REBECCA G. RHOADS, wife of Jonathan P. Rhoads, aged 82 years. She was a member and of Wilmington Monthly Meeting. In early life she covenanted with her Lord and Saviour, by the sacrifice her will to his; and ever after, it is believed, was a sear of the faith which overcomes the world. Christian graces were conspicuous in her character in different relations of daughter and sister; of wife and mother; in the wider field of religious society judgment and voice were on the side of piety, righteousness and love. Having fulfilled her day's work in daytime, her friends have the consoling belief, through the merits of Him who gave himself for us, she received "an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and fadeth not away."

At her home, Birmingham, England, on the 4th of Fourth Month, 1905, in the ninety-fifth year of age, EMMA J. GIBBINS, widow of Thomas Gibbins, youngest and last surviving child of Richard Tappan and Elizabeth Cadbury, of Birmingham. "Surely good and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever."

WHAT GOD HATH JOINED.—A determination to know nothing but CHRIST," or that side of the truth which they have determined to receive, may work admirably well for the high culture of some among men; but for the soaring heavenward with wings as eagles, and in a poor plight where both wings are supplied. Not only Christ the teacher is needed, but Christ "and Him CRUCIFIED," if we would know a Saviour who is complete.

SCATTERED MEMBERS.—In our late annual number we were reminded of the distant places where some of our members are scattered, hither and thither over the earth for various causes and interests. They may think of livelihood or gain, health or recreation, observation or Divine service. What may be the cause of local separation at their home meeting, there is one responsibility which they must everywhere be under, wherever they carry with them—that of membership in an association professing to stand for the immediate and perceptible witness of the Spirit of Truth.

It is well that members are scattered abroad, that they shall scatter broadcast this goodly seed of Truth—not merely by words about it, but by living everywhere actuated by it. It is not to have members distant and absent who are distant and absent from the principles of their membership stands for—travel, misrepresentatives of their religious society. Distance from our meetings has the right to emancipate us from the tenets imposed by membership. Whither shall we go from the presence of Truth? If the tenets of our profession are for the good of man, and more brightly do they need to be shown from day to day among strangers to us; and our moving in and out among men of every clime should be as standard-bearers of the universal and saving light of Christ. We are members not for ourselves alone but for the world, and not less so if it be a gaining world in which our lot is cast. Let each member in every place ask himself, "Why am I here? Am I under God discharging the purpose of my peculiar situation?"

THE HARRISBURG HORROR vs. THE WORLD-CONSTERNATION.—The explosions of bombshells of peace are more horrifying, when deadly, than those of war, because unexpected and not arranged for. But what unspeakable atrocity would have been added to disaster had men deliberately arranged for the terrific explosion by which six score were killed or injured at Harrisburg, and those eighteen at Point Breeze. Is there any earthly reason that could justify such slaughter, were it deliberate? And men will not forgive it, if they find it careless or thoughtless.

And yet men are employed by their respective governments deliberately to arrange for and to execute carnage much more wholesale by bombshells and mines, and to contrive each of them for just as large and larger results in suffering and woe upon those innocent of the causes of their war. Our Harrisburg and Point Breeze are but the prick of a pin in comparison with a single battlefield or battleship engagement. Does life-destroying lose its sin in proportion to its hugeness—lose its guilt by being made deliberate—lose its diabolism by being made official? Surely such works are not of the mind or method of Christ.

How long will governments continue to stultify themselves by such bitter depths of folly? How long will their subjects hurry to get under the curse of Cain by hiring themselves out as life-takers? How long shall men diligently prefer the blindness of the lower kingdom to the light of Christ? So long as they are taught systems of religion, even about Christ, which minimize or divert from the witness of his true light in the individual's heart.

JAPAN has surprised modern nations by her civilization in the arts of peace made possible by her long freedom hitherto from foreign wars. And now, with fitting irony her ambassador in Paris can thus address our so-called Christendom:

We Japanese have for many generations sent to all the civilized cities of Christendom the finest lacquered ware made in the world, enameled goods with vari-colored glazes inlaid with threads of precious metals which were marvels of beauty and miracles of human patience and skill; decorated porcelain, hand-painted, which had been repeatedly fired and emerged from the kilns pure and flawless, so that your most refined and cultured ladies placed them in silk-lined china closets, and feasted their eyes and those of select gatherings upon their beauty only upon holidays and state occasions; we have sent you the most exquisite wood and ivory carvings ever created by the cunning hand of the artist; bronzes which you have honored yourselves by placing in your museums; birds and animals, drawn anatomically correct, and colored in the beautiful hues of nature with infinite skill and cultured devotion; vases whose modeling, decoration and firing required the labor of months and years, so large in size and so exact in every detail as to startle your best artists and challenge the admiration of your finest connoisseurs, and despite all of this, you have persistently classed us among the barbarian people of the globe. But now, since we have killed several hundred thousand Russians on sea and land and won a series of uninterrupted military victories, unsurpassed in reckless abandon of life, in devotion to kin and country, in endurance and self-abnegation, and in bravery and the shedding of blood, you suddenly awake and begin to recognize us as a civilized people.

"And yet it is you who pretend to love peace and deprecate war. For was it not your glorious Milton who said, "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war"? And did not America's Quaker poet, Whittier, write:

"Peace has higher tests of merit Than battle ever knew."

FORMS FOR THE FORMALIST, THE SPIRIT FOR THE SPIRITUAL.—A non-member sends us the following as his religious concern in unity with our position:—Beyond all question there are those who do not find the formal routine of religious gatherings satisfying. Such seek God. As God is Spirit, He can be discerned by Spirit alone. Man can no more enter the secret place of the Most High by the action of brain than he can by the action of muscle. Spirit must have its opportunity of growth ere it becomes the dominant factor in individual life.

Routine prayer, an oft-sung hymn, the carefully prepared oration,—they do not expand the soul. Jesus ever sought solitude for communion; the source of his power was oneness with God. Oneness with the Father—as our portion—was the longing of his heart.

In our realizing this, how distasteful form in worship becomes; how patiently in silence we wait for the quickening of the Spirit; how unwaveringly we deliver the message.

George Whitehead.

An Essay prepared for the Moorestown Reading Circle, by Anna Wood Ritchie.

There were many old laws against dissenters still in existence, and several recent ones had been enacted, on account of some dangerous sects which had arisen; and persecution was the more increased because a fee was given to officers or magistrates for every dissenter presented and convicted, so that in spite of some declarations of indulgence issued by Charles II. for political reasons, there were, in 1672, in the twelfth year of his reign, no less than four hundred friends in prisons throughout England, some having endured ten or eleven years imprisonment, and some under sentence of banishment.

The state of these Friends deeply affected the mind of George Whitehead, and chiefly through his instrumentality the king was induced to discharge most of them, to remit their fines, and release the estates of those who had forfeited them. There were a few names of other dissenters who were prisoners in the same catalogue with the Friends, and released with them; "Which," George Whitehead says, "I was very glad of, that they partook of the same benefit, through our industry."

"Our being of different judgment and societies did not abate my compassion or charity even towards those who have been my opposers in some cases. Blessed be the Lord my God, who is Father and Fountain of mercies, whose love in Christ Jesus to us should oblige us to be merciful and kind one to another, we being required to love mercy as well as do justly, and walk humbly with our God."

This was an entirely unique sentiment at this time, for though there were many sects who believed in liberty of conscience, the Friends alone stood for this liberty, for all people alike.

Although Charles II. was inclined to be indulgent to dissenters, Parliament did not favor his views, and although George Whitehead and his friends were untiring in their petitions and interviews with the king on behalf of their suffering brethren, persecution reached its height during his reign, and it closed with fourteen hundred Friends suffering imprisonment in England and Wales.

Upon the accession of James the Second much fear was entertained as to what would become of the Protestant dissenters under a king who was an avowed Catholic.

But George Whitehead hopefully believed that they would have ease under this king, and he lost no time in using all his efforts to bring it about. A few weeks after the death of Charles he, in company with Gilbert Lathey, presented to King James an address of good will, appealing to his clemency in the case of the suffering Friends, giving a simple and affecting account of their situation. Between three and four months after this first interview, no relief being obtained, George Whitehead was deeply concerned to go to the king, to give him further information, and to endeavor to persuade him to put a stop to the ruinous persecutions.

Acquainting his friend, Robert Barclay, with his intentions (for whom the king had a particular respect, having known him in Scotland), he was willing to unite in the application, and they appear to have readily obtained admittance to the king's presence. George Whitehead took the principal part in this interview, giving a vivid account of the condition of the Friends, and asking for the privilege of presenting a similar account to both Houses of Parliament.

This request was granted, and further, the king issued a warrant to be presented to the Attorney-General, on behalf of the suffering Friends. This warrant George Whitehead and his friend, Gilbert Lathey, presented to the Attorney-General, and continued to attend upon him until warrants were signed for the release of all Friends, so far as the king's commission granted it; so, though many had died, there were a great number liberated from their severe imprisonment of ten to fifteen years, and returned to their families.

Great, however, as was the relief, the sufferings of the Society were by no means at an end. The clergy in general appeared decidedly unfriendly to toleration, and a great number of magistrates encouraged a set of dishonest informers, who made a business of informing against the Quakers for the fees they would receive.

George Whitehead now exerted himself earnestly to induce the king to put a stop to the proceedings of these unprincipled people. His exertions were very successful. He inserts in his memoirs a petition to King James, which was signed by several of the sufferers, stating the cruelty and illegality of the proceedings against them, and after presenting this to the king, he requested him to appoint a commission to hear them and the informers face to face.

This was accordingly done, to the great consternation of the informers, and with the result that the king instructed some of his ministers and magistrates to put a stop to the wicked practice of the informers, inasmuch that some of them were forced to fly, and others reduced to beggary.

As, during the severe sufferings which they had endured for conscience' sake, the Friends had exhibited great Christian patience, so also when their enemies, the mercenary informers, became destitute, they exhibited great Christian forgiveness.

The Friends, though they had been so severely impoverished by the proceedings of the informers, did not hesitate to supply the wants of these people in their destitute condition. George Whitehead gives an instance of this kind in his own case. "After the trade of informing was over," he says, "George Hitton, a notorious informer, came to my house, complaining to me that he was to be a servant to a great person, but wanted clothes, or money to buy him some; whereupon I gave him something, being willing to render good against evil, he having been a very injurious adversary against myself and many other of our Friends. However, I was comforted that the case was so well altered, as that from taking away our goods by force, these poor wretches were fain to come and beg of us."

The suppression of the trade of informers was a very important step, but it did not close the sufferings of the Society, nor the labors of its members to obtain complete liberty of conscience. They proceeded, step by step, pressing their grievances, one after another upon the notice of the highest authorities of the land. The sentiments of the court seemed also to be growing steadily in favor of toleration, so that in the next reign, that of William and Mary, the first act of Parliament "for the ease of scrupulous consciences" passed—known as the "Toleration Act;" William and Mary may be said to have planted the tree of religious liberty in England. The attitude of the king and Parliament was such that it seemed to the Friends a propitious opportunity to petition the government for an act to liberate the Friends from taking oaths. This accordingly done, and George Whitehead seems to have taken the most active part in solving the measure.

A case was drawn up, and a petition, embodying a brief statement of their wishes, presented to the House of Commons in 1701. It was followed by a motion for leave to bring in a bill that the solemn affirmatives of Quakers might be accepted instead of an oath. This motion was carried by a large majority. "Whereupon," says George Whitehead, "in the name of the members of Parliament came out to us with great joy, love and tenderness, and showed their satisfaction that they had so gained the point for us."

After much discussion and a good deal of opposition in the House of Peers, an Act finally passed, in 1696, which was measure satisfactory to Friends. In 1714 the Act made perpetual, and in 1721 the former affirmation was altered so as to meet the views of the more scrupulous members of the Society.

Though George Whitehead had now become quite feeble in body, he continued to attend at the meetings of Friends, both for religious worship and for discipline, bearing his testimony to the power of the Divine Grace which had been his support through life. And in meetings about church matters, when diversity of opinions arose, he would express thoughts with great force and conviction. In his eighty-sixth year he wrote a lively address to his friends, which was printed and circulated among them.

He died in great peace in 1722, in his eighty-seventh year, having lived during times of seven rulers, with nearly all of whom he had had personal interviews.

A few years before his death he had written a short review of the engagements of his life, which is characteristic of his Christian spirit:

"Manifold exercises, trials, tribulations hath the Lord my God supported me under carried me through, in my pilgrimage for Name and Truth's sake, having spent a whole time, even the greatest part of my life, in my youth upward, in the testimony, service and vindication of the living, unchangeable Truth, as it is in Christ Jesus, my Lord, whom I have suffered many things, both body and spirit, as also by reproaches, calumnies; and sincerely labored in his name, who has supported me, and hitherto helped me in the Gospel of the Grace of God, and of our dear Son, Jesus Christ; even the Gospel of life, salvation, and peace, to them who truly believe."

"And yet I esteem not all my sufferings, afflictions worthy to be compared to the peace set before me; for all which I must as-being, honor, glory, power and dominion to the Lord God and the Lamb, upon his throne, ever and ever!

"And when by the grace and assistance of my Heavenly Father, I have finished the work which given me to do, I firmly believe and shall hope in the Lord I shall die in the arms of Jesus Christ, and ever live with and rest in his Heavenly kingdom.

"O my soul! enter thou into thy rest, even unto eternal rest from thy manifold labors, trials, and sufferings; for the Lord thy God dealt bountifully with thee; glory to his precious Name for evermore!"

Second Utterance of Prayer and Praise.

BY ANN ELIZA BACON.

In Greenwich Meeting, New Jersey, forty years ago. Another petition probably read in a meeting prior to this, was given by the last number. Between these two copies in brown hand was found her statement, which we here print.]

"O, Lord, we bow before Thee, that we may thank you unto Thee for the loving kindness Thou wast pleased to manifest towards people who was lately gathered * before me; for as Thou passed by, the eye of Thy compassion rested upon them, and Thou, being the many precious plants of Thy own hand planting, Thou wast afresh enamored and drawing near, Thou didst spread out to them Thy wing of ancient goodness: giving Thy loving kindness, at seasons, to the dew; and Thou saidst in Thy heart, 'Surely this is none other than that which is sent to me of mine inheritance which mine arm gathered, and I will bless it. I will be their God, and they shall be my people. I will gather them. I will enclose them. I will be a wall around them and those who are younger, and bearers and testimony bearers in thy name, that shall stand continually before Thee: and the Lambs of the fold, as tender plants spring up around Thy heavenly table; so that nations around about, beholding the brightness of Thy rising and the excellency of Thy power, may come running unto Thee; as Thou Thyself declared through Thy holy prophet, saying, 'Nations that know not thee shall come running unto thee, because of the Lord God, the Holy One of Israel, for He hath justified thee.' And wilt Thou be pleased to bow to our hearts to be bowed under a sense of transcending goodness. So we may be able to return the glory, honor, thanksgiving and high renown which belong unto Thee.

money and ability for business organization that has worked the marvels in industrial and commercial achievement, and insists upon taking all the profit and glory is just as wrong as the laborer who, echoing what he has heard in some Socialistic meeting shouts: "There is no wealth that was not produced by labor, and therefore all wealth should be the reward of labor."

Capital, labor, brains, enter into the accomplishment of every great enterprise. One is of little value without the other two. Capital would be useless without the strong arm of labor, and labor would have nothing to dig if capital did not supply the necessary financial equipment. And without the education and training of the engineer and other professional men capital and labor would be powerless.

Andrew Carnegie is one of the greatest capitalists in the world. But he does not claim that his money has done it all. Sir James Kitson asked A. Carnegie if he understood an intricate piece of machinery in one of his steel mills, and he tells A. Carnegie's answer:

"No," replied the great ironmaster; "but I know how to gather about me men that do know machinery and all about the steel business. I don't know much about steel machinery or the steel business, but I do know the human machine."—Wall Street Journal.

A Visit to Algeria.

First Month 9th, 1905.

How shall I begin to give you an idea of what it means to have been in the real desert, or at least on the edge of it—to gallop into its endless reaches on a real Arab steed, to follow only the sand traces left by the turbaned guide who was galloping on before? I cannot tell—but yesterday was certainly an event in my life.

To be plunged from the bustling, congested life of European cities, suddenly into this realm of eternal sun, eternal splendor, eternal calm, is a transition so marvellous, that it takes some time to become really adjusted. I cannot yet tell whether enough of the spirit of the Sahara has penetrated me, to be able to convey the least idea of it—but certainly it is mystery and calm, mystery and calm so profound that those used to our madly rushing civilization can hardly hope in a few days or weeks even to begin to comprehend it.

Yesterday at noon we started out on Arab steeds—beautiful, lithe, graceful creatures, small, but strong and enduring. Our guide, Safti M'hamed ben Brahmine, rode on a mule. We had not gone far when M——, who is wholly unused to horseback riding, began to feel decidedly uncomfortable so far from the ground, and wanted to turn back. None of us were willing to do this and Safti persuaded her to change saddles and take his mule, which was much lower and perfectly gentle, he said. We went far out along the Caravan road to Tougourt, then turned out into the broad plains of the great oasis, all of which is under a certain primitive kind of irrigation, but which at this season looks barren as the desert itself. One of us stayed always with M——, and the other two took turns of galloping on ahead, and then turning back.

We passed several caravans coming in from the great desert—camels, with their long necks and sneering faces. They bore sacks of figs and barley, while their white-robed guides urged them from behind. All about, as far as the eye could see, there were dark specks, which Safti told us were Bedouin encampments. Towards one of these we headed our horses. Before we were very near, a pack of some eight or ten fierce, wolf-like looking dogs ran out, barking like savage creatures and snapping at our horses. Safti galloped into their midst, chasing them from hillock to hillock, the wind catching his white burnoose and swelling it to a balloon; a half-dozen black-haired women rushed out and a dozen or more children; they all shrieked at the dogs, and with wild gestures tried to drive them off, following Safti in his mad zig-zag chase. One of our number began to throw coins into the midst of the wild looking crowd, and then there was a scramble indeed. The women and children were all in gorgeously colored garments, so that with the fierce barking and screaming added to our uncontrolled laughter, the flashing of color and reckless riding, made a scene of a truly wild and picturesque desert life.

As we passed the tents, one snowy white baby dog fast to a post was barking with all his tiny might, leaping wildly and pulling at his cord, frantic in his efforts to be part of the general stir and hubbub that had suddenly come to the camp. The spirit of the occasion seemed to get into the horses, too, for at this moment Safti's horse broke into a gallop, mine followed, and in a moment more we heard a cry for help, and reining in, we turned just in time to see the mule leaping into the air and poor M——, but I simply closed my eyes and did not dare open them for long minutes, for I heard the thud already on the ground and knew that she had fallen. The mule began to prance around and kick his heels. The men rushed to her, and across the plains the whole Bedouin encampment came running, each trying to outstrip the other; women carrying babies and tumbling over their long skirts, boys straining on ahead, and all the while I did not know what had happened to M——. I saw them lift her up and the blood was streaming from her face, but soon she had come to herself, and found that no really serious injury was sustained, though her lip was cut and her face swelling badly. Soon the Bedouins were on us in earnest, but not with ill interest, rather the difficulty was to avoid their persistent offers of help. One of the boys was sent running back for a bowl of water—another held the mule; one woman grabbed a handful of dates out of the back of the baby she was carrying, and offered them as a solace; another knelt on the ground, threw back her long cloak, exposing long bronze-colored arms and shoulders, with coral beads, bracelets and armlets, belts and necklaces in profusion. She laid her hands with real concern on the injured one's forehead, unbund her own gaudy yellow and black handkerchief from her head and by signs endeavored to make it understood that if she might be allowed to bind the sufferer's head tightly, it would help things greatly. By this time Safti had jumped on his horse and was galloping towards the town four miles away, to get a carriage. We alone with the Bedouins and did not care to offend them.

They spoke only Arabic and their magpie chattering was wholly unintelligible to us. The old woman was as gently as possible made to understand that the handkerchief was not wanted. She then came nearer, and bending over the patient, brought the corner of the yellow shawl that she wore around to the front. In it was tied some sort of sweet smelling herb. This she made Mary smell, and, then opening the shawl, took out a part of the contents and tied it up into a corner of Mary's handkerchief.

Thus we waited for an hour, sitting on the drifted sands. It was not long before Mary felt able to get up and walk about. We left W— to play with the Bedouin children and entertain the women, while we went a little further on. All the while we strained our eyes for a sight of the wagon, which seemed to take a long while in coming. At length something was seen in the far distance headed quite away from us and going very fast. We were very far from any road and knew that we must go quite a distance to find a possible place for the carriage to meet us, but we had not understood Saffi's directions, so we waited.

As soon as we were sure it must be for us I mounted and galloped off towards the place it seemed to be heading for; the others started slowly on foot, leading the mule and the horse. As soon as the carriage was within hailing distance I explained where the others were. They came up to me, then they turned in and drove carefully as they could towards the slowly advancing pedestrians. M— and W— rode home in the carriage, I preferring to keep to the horse, since I was not needed.

Saffi had left his horse in town, so he mounted W—'s. The mule was then mounted by a burrheaded figure which had come in the carriage. I felt relieved, M— was not seriously hurt, the glorious desert air had penetrated my whole being. I did not want to turn back. Saffi saw it and said, "Domage Mademoiselle n'a pas vu les dunes"—the dunes were what we had come to see—the great heaps of sand brought in by the scorching sirocco when it blows in summer. I said, "Let's go to the dunes." "Bien," Saffi said and darted off; my horse followed. On towards the sunset we went, the blue distance looking like the sea, while the dunes loomed higher and drew nearer before us.

At length our horses were stepping lightly over the soft sand that was piled in inconceivably grotesque forms all about us—sand looking like golden snow, rippled by the wind, curved into domes, forming amphitheatres, terraces and mounds. I sat spellbound, looking out into the limitless expanse. Suddenly the voice of Saffi roused me, "Mademoiselle veut attendre ici le coucher du soleil?" (M. wishes to await here the setting of the sun?)

I looked around me. Far as the eye could see no human being was visible. Here and there a wreath of smoke told of a Bedouin encampment. Far to the north the giant mountains that form a semi-circular wall around the oasis of Biskra were glowing in the rosy tints of the late afternoon sun. The town was miles away, the nearest life was marked by the dark lines of palm trees that encircled the old village of Biskra far away to the northeast. Around us nothing but wind-swept heaps of sand, and no human being but this white-turbaned guide. I certainly was not afraid, but a sensation such as I have seldom felt came over me of being utterly cut off from everything connected with my past—connected with anything I had ever known.

As soon as I could collect myself, I said, "No; let us return at once," "comme Mademoiselle veut" (Just as M. wishes.) This is his constant remark. The sun was already very low. We turned our horses' heads towards the dark line of palms far off to the northeast. The mountains beyond were glowing with indescribable tints—rose, shading into amethyst where the shadows lay. Every moment the contrasts grew deeper.

A SUGGESTION.

BY M. FARMINGHAM.

I cannot tell why there should come to me
A thought of some one, miles and miles away,
In sweet insistence on the memory,
Unless there be a need that I should pray.

He goes his way, I mine, we seldom meet
To talk of plans or changes day by day,
Or pain, or pleasure, triumph or defeat,
Or special reason why 'tis time to pray.

We are too busy even to share thought
For days together of some friends astray.
Perhaps God does it for us and we ought To read his signal as a call to pray.

Perhaps just then my friend has fiercer fight,
A more appalling weakness, a decay
Of courage, darkness, some lost sense of right,
And so, in case he needs my prayer, I pray.

Dear, do the same for me. If I intrude Unasked upon thee on some crowded day,
Give me a moment's prayer as interlude;
Be very sure I need it, therefore pray.

John Woolman and His Friends.

BY EDITH BARDSEY BELLOWES.

It is easy to perceive that, going about in such a spirit of love and gentleness, and presenting his mission in such a way, he rarely, if ever, aroused passion or the spirit of opposition, even in those who were actually holders of slaves. In many cases they were persuaded by his very gentleness to free themselves from what, in the pure, clear light he had brought, they saw to be evil. "Wherever he went hard hearts were softened, avarice and love of power and pride of opinion gave way before his testimony of love." It was in 1758 that the first fruits of his labors appeared, so far as the Society as a body was concerned. J. G. Whittier, in his introduction to Jno. Woolman's Journal, gives this account:—

"The annual assemblage of the Yearly Meeting in 1758 at Philadelphia must ever be regarded as one of the most important religious convocations in the history of the Christian Church.

"The labours of Woolman, and his few but earnest associates, had not been in vain. A deep and tender interest had been awakened; and this meeting was looked forward to with varied feelings of solicitude by all parties. All felt that the time had come for some definite action; conservative and reformer stood face to face in the valley of decision. John Woolman, of course, was present,—a me humble and poor in outward appearance, his simple dress of undyed homespun cloth contrasting strongly with the plain but rich apparel of the representatives of the commerce of the city, and of the large slave-stocked plantations of the country. Bowed down by the weight of his concern for the poor slaves, and for the well-being and purity of the Society he sat silent during the whole meeting, and other matters were under discussion.

"My mind," he says, "was frequently clothed with inward prayer; and I could say, my David, that tears were my meat and drink day and night. The case of slave-keeping I heavy upon me; nor did I find any engagement to speak directly to any other matter before the meeting."

"When the important subject came up for consideration, many faithful Friends spoke with weight and earnestness. No one opposed justified slavery as a system, although some expressed a concern lest the meeting should go into measures calculated to cause uneasiness to many members of the Society. It was also urged that Friends should wait patiently until the Lord in his own time should open way for the deliverance of the slave. This was replied to by John Woolman. 'My mind,' he said, 'is led to consider the purity of the Divine Being, and the justice of his judgment, and herein my soul is covered with awfulness. I cannot forbear to hint of some cases who people have not been treated with the purity of justice, and the event has been lamentable. Many slaves on this continent are oppressed, and their cries have entered into the ears of the Most High. Such are the purity and certainty of his judgments, that cannot be partial in our favour.

"In infinite love and goodness He has opened our understandings from one time to another, concerning our duty towards the people; and it is not a time for delay. Show us now be sensible of what he requires of us, and through a respect to the private interest of some persons, or through a regard to some friendships which do not stand upon an immutable foundation, neglect to do our duty with firmness and constancy, still waiting for some extraordinary means to bring about their deliverance, God may, by terrible things, show his righteousness answer us in this matter."

This solemn and weighty appeal was responded to by many in the assembly in a spirit of sympathy and unity. Some of the bolding members expressed their willingness that a strict rule of discipline should be adopted against dealing in slaves for the future. To this it was answered that the root of evil would never be reached effectually unless a searching inquiry was made into the circumstances and motives of such as held slaves. At length the truth in a great measure triumphed over all opposition; and, without public dissent, the meeting agreed that injunction of our Lord to do to others as would that others should do to us should induce Friends who held slaves "to set them free, making a Christian provision for the and four Friends—John Woolman, John Sturtevant, Daniel Stanton, and John Sykes were approved of as suitable persons to visit and treat with such as kept slaves, within the limits of the Meeting." This painful ult duty was faithfully performed. In his journal for this important period John Woolman says but little of his own services. How zealous and delicate they were may be readily understood. One extract will serve to show of the nature of the service in which he was engaged and the frame of mind in which he accomplished it:—"In the beginning of the fifth Month I joined, in company with my friends, John Sykes and Daniel Stanton, in visiting such as had slaves. Some, whose souls were rightly exercised about them, appeared to be glad of our visit, but in some cases our way was more difficult. I often felt the necessity of keeping down to that root to whence our concern proceeded, and have done in reverent thankfulness to humbly bow before the Lord, who was near me, and preserved my mind in calmness under some of the conflicts, and begged a spirit of sympathy and kindness in me towards some who were grossly entangled by the spirit of this evil."

These labors were attended with much success. Dealing in slaves was almost entirely abandoned, and many who held slaves set them at liberty. But many members still continuing the practice, a more emphatic testimony against it was issued by the Yearly Meeting, 1774 (two years after Woolman's death), two years after that the subordinate meetings were directed to "deny the right of membership to such as persisted in holding their women as property."

John Woolman found a steady friend and tutor in his efforts to awaken the slumbering moral sense of his brethren in Anthony met, a descendant of the persecuted Dutch Protestants. He was born in France 1713, but his father, who had associated himself with the Huguenots, was compelled to flee to Holland in 1715, thence to England, settled in London, where Anthony was educated.

Of his very early life, his habits and education, little is known, only that when fourteen years old he joined the Society of Friends. In 1731, at the age of eighteen, he removed with his parents to Philadelphia, and for the first half dozen years or so after arrival seems to have been in a somewhat degraded state in regard to secular employment.

He seems to have been filled with a desire to dedicate his energies to the furtherance of Christ's kingdom on earth, and held himself in readiness for an appointment to any of this kind. In his twenty-sixth year he quitted school teaching as being the station in which he could best serve God and his fellows.

His first engagement was at Philadelphia; in 1742 he was called to fill a vacancy which occurred in the English department at Penn Charter school, and in 1755 he quitted a school of his own, for girls, and in the year 1750 the degraded condition of the negroes attracted his attention, and one of the earliest proofs of his compassion was the establishment of an evening school for which he taught himself. In this charitable work he was successful beyond his own expectations, for the proficiency of his colored pupils and the moral and religious advancement of many of them, powerfully contributed to commend them and their sufferings to the hearts of many persons of influence who had previously held both in contempt. From this he went on to make an appeal on behalf of the negroes to the justice and clemency of communities and nations. Beginning in a small way with detached pieces circulated through the mediums of almanacs and newspapers, he went on to the publication (at his own expense) of larger and more important works, and distributed these among persons of note and influence in Europe and America. The most noteworthy of his works were, "An account of that part of Africa inhabited by the negroes, published 1762." "A caution and warning to Great Britain and her colonies on the calamitous state of the enslaved negroes" (1767), and subsequently, "An historical account of Guinea, with an inquiry into the rise and progress of the slave trade, its nature and calamitous effects."

"The last of these," says Thos. Clarkson, in his History of the Abolition of the Slave Trade, "became instrumental beyond any other book in disseminating a proper knowledge and detestation of this trade."

When this book fell into Clarkson's hands he was seeking information that would enable him to construct a dissertation in Latin on the subject, "Is it right to make slaves of others against their will?" to be read in competition for a prize offered by Dr. Peckard, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge.

"In this precious book," says he, "I found almost all that I wanted," and in preparing this dissertation, the subject of negro slavery so took hold of Thos. Clarkson that he never relinquished it, but dedicated his whole life to the cause. His work, added to that of Granville Sharp, Wilberforce, and the Society of Friends in a body, with others whom God raised up for the purpose, enabled Great Britain, by the sacrifice of £20,000,000, and an incalculable amount of time and money spent in its accomplishment, to liberate her 800,000 slaves. Thus, what John Woolman was doing within the Society, Anthony Benezet was doing throughout the world: undermining the foundations of the evil, as it were, loosening the soil that others might pluck it up by the roots.

"From the magnitude of the object and his devotion to it we might suppose the abolition of slavery was the cardinal engagement of Anthony Benezet's life; indeed, for most other men it would have been sufficient, but the dreadful effects of war upon nations and individuals grieved his susceptible heart, and he wrote and distributed much on this subject, persuading mankind to desist "from such things as were calculated to produce wrathful tempers that could only be appeased by shedding each other's blood."

On this account he addressed an energetic and pathetic letter to Frederick, king of Prussia.

The Indians, too, came in for a share of Anthony Benezet's solicitude and sympathy, and he publicly and fearlessly expressed his opinions of the injustice and inhumanity of any measures, either of the provincial government or of individuals, which violated any of their rights of person or property. In short, wherever he saw his plain and simple duty to God or man he did it. "He was," it has been said, "a man of truly catholic spirit; one who loved piety and virtue in others wherever he found them, and who respected all sincere worshippers of God."

Towards those who went astray his attitude was one of unbounded charity; he sought diligently for any favorable symptom in their disposition, and when he discerned it, he cherished it with great solicitude, never breaking the bruised reed or quenching the smoking flax.

This totally inadequate sketch would be even more incomplete if I did not add that it is recorded of Anthony Benezet that he requested a friend, should he survive him, to prevent any posthumous memorial concerning himself should a disposition be manifested to offer such a tribute to his memory, adding, "But if they will not regard my desire, they may say, 'Anthony Benezet was a poor creature, and through Divine favor was enabled to know it.'"

In 1770 he was appointed an elder in our Society, and his useful and self-denying life ended in 1784, at the age of seventy-one.

John Woolman tells us that he owes the confirmation of his views in regard to slave produce to Anthony Benezet. In 1769 he believed it was required of him to go on a visit to some parts of the West Indies, and he accordingly obtained the proper certificates from Friends, and made some enquiries concerning vessels likely to sail to Barbadoes, but a doubt arose in his mind as to "Whether, after the full information I have had of the oppression which the slaves lie under who raise the West Indies produce, which I have gained by reading 'A caution and warning to Great Britain and her colonies,' by Anthony Benezet, it is right for me to take passage in a vessel employed in the West India trade." He then proceeds to employ a most remarkable piece of reasoning—he argues that if pure righteousness prevailed, a small amount of trade with the West Indies might be unblamable. But a higher rate of passage money would be demanded in the case of a small trade than of one more extensive. He ought not to take advantage of "great trade and small passage money," such a state of things being directly traceable to slavery, and his conclusion, therefore, is that if he takes the anticipated trip to Barbadoes, he "should pay more than is common for others to pay, as a testimony in favor of less trading." For a while he could not decide, and "was tossed as in a tempest." This continued for some little time, but just before the ship sailed it was revealed to him that he should not go, but "should pass through some further exercises near home."

In the spring of 1772 he made known that he had a concern to cross the seas, to visit Friends in the north of England. He obtained his certificate, and after much exercise in regard to avoiding any act that might appear to countenance luxury and attendant evils of excessive labor and oppression, he took passage in the steerage, in preference to the cabin, of the "Mary and Elizabeth," bound for London. "In those days the steerage passage was really dreadful; in fact, the most luxurious form of sailing was in many respects far inferior to what is now provided for the poorest emigrants." His friends were concerned for him, and expressed themselves so, but of course he persisted in his intentions; he must always support his convictions by his conduct, and they did not urge the matter. He says, in his quiet, matter-of-fact way, "They appeared disposed to leave me to the Lord," a very happy way, indeed, of leaving him, and with which the simple-hearted hero was quite content." The passage was wretched, if not dangerous, but Woolman turned it to good account. He held meetings, and had many earnest conversations with both crew and passengers. Several pages of his Journal are filled with expressions of tender concern for those who are obliged to follow a seafaring life under the conditions which existed in the steerage of a sailing vessel. But no word of complaint about the discomforts he himself suffered, and something of what they were may be gathered from the following entry:—

"24th of Fifth Month.—A clear, pleasant morning. As I sat on deck I felt a reviving in my nature, which had been weakened through much rainy weather and high winds, and being shut up in a close, unhealthy air. Several nights of late I have felt my breathing difficult; and a little after the rising of the second watch, which is about midnight, I have got up and stood near an hour with my face near the hatchway, to get the fresh air at the small vacancy under the hatch-door, which is commonly shut down, partly to keep out rain, and sometimes to keep the breaking waves from dashing into the steerage. I may, with thankfulness to the Father of mercies, acknowledge that in my present weak state my mind hath been supported to bear this affliction with patience; and I have looked at the present dispensation as a kindness from the great Father of mankind, who, in this, my floating pilgrimage, is in some degree bringing me to feel that many thousands of my fellow-creatures often suffer in a greater degree."

On this voyage he was accompanied (though not in the steerage) by one whom he repeatedly refers to as "my beloved friend, Samuel Enlen," about whom much that is interesting and profitable might be related had we time for it. On the 8th of Sixth Month, 1772, John Woolman landed in London, and the first thing he did was to present himself to the Yearly Meeting of ministers and elders which was then in session. He afterwards travelled through the principal shires, visiting in four months the Quarterly and Subordinate Meetings in seven counties, besides finding time to write essays on "Loving Our Neighbor," "A Sailor's Life," and "Silent Worship."

At last he came to York, to the Quarterly gathering, and attended most of the sittings, but before it was over he was taken ill with small-pox, and after about eight days' illness his departure took place, at the house of Thos. Priestman, on the 7th of Tenth Month, 1772. So passed from earth one of the sweetest spirits that has ever dwelt amongst men.

His Journal is a record of the spirit of a man whose feet trod the earth but whose heart was with God. There is scarcely a trace of theology in the record, but it is full of religion of the purest and most spiritual kind. This absence of any distinctive theology brings the book within the range of men of all opinions.

His liberality and freedom from all narrowness as to sects and opinions are manifest in the following passages: "There is a principle which is pure placed in the human mind, which in different places and ages hath had different names; it is, however, pure, and proceeds from God. It is deep and inward, confined to no forms of religion, nor excluded from any when the heart stands in perfect sincerity. In whomsoever this takes root and grows, they become brethren." And again:—"Men who sincerely apply their minds to true virtue, and find an inward support from above by which all vicious inclinations are made subject; who love God sincerely, and prefer the real good of mankind universally to their own private interests,—though these, through the strength of education and tradition may remain under some great speculative errors; it would be uncharitable to say that therefore God rejects them. The knowledge and goodness of Him who creates, supports and gives understanding to all men, are superior to the various states and circumstances of his creatures, which to us appear the most difficult."

As to simplicity of living, if we would read and heed all that he says concerning it, there would be no need for us to look any further for precepts of that nature. By careful compilation from his writings there could be published a book on "The Simple Life," quite as well able to convince the judgment and reach the heart, as any put forth in these days.

Charles Lamb's advice, in one of the "Essays of Elia," is, "Get the works of John Woolman by heart, and learn to love the early Friends."

Henry Crabb Robinson mentions the Journal in his diary as "a book which exhibits a Christian all love."

These words of John Whittier express exactly the sentiments of my own heart:—"I have been awed and solemnized by the presence of a serene and beautiful spirit redeemed of the Lord from all selfishness, and I have been made thankful for the ability to recognize and the disposition to love him."

Twelfth Month 19th, 1904.

NOTE.—The substance of this paper, and where quotation marks are used, the actual words I gathered from John Woolman's Journal, with introduction by J. G. Whittier, "Anthony Benezet," by Wm. Armistead, Bowden's "History of Friends in America," and "John Woolman, a Study for Young Men," by Thos. Green, M. A.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

This was done shortly afterward, but it was evident that many of the Indians were unwilling to consider favorably the suggestion to divide their lands, and in the Tenth Month, 1873, after the views of the Friends had been clearly presented by Thomas Wistar and Ebenezer Worth; the council, by vote of nine to two, concluded to reject it. While thus announcing their decision in regard to this subject, they inquired whether Friends would still continue to assist them, to which it was replied they would, to the best of their ability.

In this interview, held in the latter part of Tenth Month, the following interesting statements were made by Thomas Wistar, "During a long life I have devoted myself to aiding the red men."

"I have travelled thousands and thousands of miles in their service, and have never received a single cent from the Government, though commission was offered me. I have a right to speak on this subject.

"I have shed tears many times because I love you, and see your miseries. When I tried to speak, pleading your cause before General Grant, my heart was too full, and I was choked that I could not speak, by reason of the emotions stirring within me.

"What then? They put 26,000 Indians under our care, and I have been among them; I have travelled north, south, and to the far west; have camped out night after night in my own age, lying on the ground.

"I have never feared the Indians; soldiers have been offered me, but I refused. Why? Because I knew they would not harm me. For fifty years I have been among them, and have always been treated kindly.

"When William Penn died he told his people to be kind to the Indians, because when he came here, and the whites were few, they were taken in and cared for by the red men, a food given them to eat. The Quakers have been your friends ever since."

The councilors soon found the need they had of the help of Friends, as a bill in the interest of the white settlers was presented a few weeks afterward to Congress; which, by a formal resolution the councilors desired the Committee to delay the passage of, until their objections to it could be heard.

This bill provided for the division of the lands under the regulation of the Secretary of the Interior, and for the extinguishment of the claim of the Ogden Land Company, also for confirming the leases which had been made by the Indians. It was drawn in the interest of the white settlers, and in the Fifth Month, 1874, passed the House of Representatives.

The following session it was passed by Senate with some amendments, which required the appointment of a Committee of Conference and at this juncture two of the Indians who had been sent to Washington to oppose certain of its provisions, requested the assistance of one of the Committee, who, having joined them in an interview with a Committee of the House was helpful in having several of its provisions materially altered. In the form in which bill finally passed and received the signal of the President, it was believed to have been shorn of many of its objectionable features. While confirming the existing leases, it gave the opportunity to the Indians to renew them (many of which had been made at a very rental), at the expiration of five years, provided that the income should thereupon become the property of the nation, instead of individual Indians, and also providing that new leases should be renewable at period of twelve years. Three commissioners were appointed by the President to define the villages, within which only leases should be after be valid.

It appeared that at this time three hundred and ninety-four different leases had been made by individual Indians, and twenty-six leases by the nation, and the whole amount received as rental from these leased lands was $8,000, of which $7,450 went into the hands of a comparatively few individual Indians. This act allowed these individuals to continue to receive this income for a period of twelve years, after which it should be paid to the treasurer of the nation, as properly belonging to the Indians collectively.

The committee remark in their report to the Yearly Meeting in 1875, "The provision bill are as favorable to the Indians as could have been anticipated, considering the circumstances under which the white settlers obtained possession of their land. At the expiration of five years the annual income of a nation will be increased, by rents, from but $600 to more than $8,000, not including rents from leases, which may be made before the expiration of that period. This revenue, judiciously used, will enable them to relieve their poor, improve the character of the schools, and in various ways may be made to contribute to the advancement of their people. The provisions of the Act are represented to be satisfactory to a large number of the Indians, while others appear to regard them as an infringement upon the rights under a treaty with the United States, and an unavailing attempt was made to induce the President to postpone its execution.

The conflicting interests which have grown out of the construction of railroads through the Allegheny Reservation, and the increased business consequent thereupon, as well as the new acts of the Indians themselves, have brought about an embarrassing condition of affairs which seemed to render needful some new law as that recently enacted; and since so far as it relates to the leases, merely legalizes and makes legal what the Indians have hitherto done for many years, there appears to be no cause for complaint on their part. It is to be regretted that the provision in the final bill respecting the division of their lands, and holding it in severalty, was not retained.

This year the following interesting statements were also transmitted to the Yearly Meeting: "The United States Agent Sherman, in his report of Tenth Month 24th, 1874, states in his Agency, which includes all the tribes in the State of New York, there are 5,140 Indians, the greater portion being settled upon the Cattaraugus and Allegheny Reservations. In this number there are 1,870 children between the ages of five and twenty-one. Of these 1,418 have attended school some portion of the year. "An encouraging evidence," he says, "of the advancement of these people in civilization is found in the increasing interest they take in the education of their children. This year marks a decided improvement in the regularity and numbers of their children's attendance at school." There are thirty-one schools in the Agency, which have been kept up on an average of thirty-three weeks during the school year; "of the teachers employed in these schools in the past year, twelve are Indians, who have generally succeeded better among them are some successful and competent teachers." Some of the Indians, he also states, are becoming good mechanics. The wealth of the New York Indians in individual property, not including farm lands, is estimated at $381,214.00.

Science and Industry.

The most accurate clock in the world is one in the basement of the Berlin Observatory. It has been running since 1865, and often for months at a time with a daily deviation of not more than fifteen thousandths of a second. This, however, is not accurate enough to suit astronomers, and the clock is soon to be put in an air-tight underground room.

DRUGS LIKELY TO ADVANCE.—Dealers in American drugs are much alarmed at the scarcity and high price of most of the vegetable drugs indigenous to the country which have developed during the present year, says a New York Journal. Many of the drugs in chief demand have advanced from 100 to 300 per cent. in price, and the supply of all is said to be small.

Some of the drugs most affected by these conditions are golden seal, senega root, ginseng, wild cherry bark, white pine bark, elder flowers, sarsaparilla root, sassafras, and at least a dozen others of less importance. Golden seal in particular has advanced since 1st mo. from 74 cents to $1.50, and senega root from 82½ cents to $1.15. In 1899 senega root was selling at 24 cents. White pine bark has gone up in two years from 2½ to 4½ cents.

The plants from which these drugs are gathered grow wild, and are said to be gradually disappearing with the march of civilization and the settlement of the country. No steps have been taken to safeguard the supply, and the plants are gradually being exterminated. It is feared that this country will soon be in the same position as Germany and other countries of Europe as producers of vegetable drugs. Formerly Germany was a great producer of herbs and barks, but now these drugs are gathered chiefly in the wilds of Hungary.

Drug dealers say the result will be a heavy advance in the price of many of the commoner and more popular medicines.

THE FIRST TYPEWRITER OPERATOR.—M. A. Saunders, who is still a stenographer in New York city, was the first typewriter operator, says the Christian Advocate. On First Month 17th she received a gold watch from a typewriter company, inscribed: "1875-1905. To the pioneer typewriter operator. From the pioneer manufacturer."

In 1875, when she was a young widow seeking to earn her living as a church organist, she read an advertisement for "a woman to take an easy and remunerative position, musician preferred." Out of three hundred applicants she was accepted. She told the story to a reporter of the New York Sun:

"They showed me the machine. "What's that?" I asked. 'It looks like a sewing machine.'

"I'll show you," said the clerk. He put a piece of paper in the thing and began to tap with his forefingers. After a while he pulled out the paper. It was a note to me, all printed out.

"I was fascinated. He showed me how to put in the paper, and how to start a new line by pressing a pedal with my foot—that was how the old thing worked—and then I sat down and began to write.

It was a fateful moment, yet M. A. Saunders cannot remember just what were the first words she wrote.

"Some nonsense," she said. "Anyway, the first thing I knew, they had come around to close up the place. I had been at it for hours."

Being an expert pianist, she reached in two weeks the phenomenal speed of seventy words a minute, and there was joy in the heart of G. W. N. Yost, the inventor and promoter of the machine. From that time on she used to demonstrate it.

There came the time when the original lot of ten thousand typewriters was exhausted. Then M. A. Saunders, who was in New York for her vacation, had her say. The keys were awkwardly arranged, she thought, and she sketched out a better key-board. With the change of one or two letters that is the universal key-board of to-day.

"Yes, I'm the author of "Qwertuiop," said she, "the most widely read line ever written by a woman!" Later, she suggested the "double case" machine with shift key, the old machine having printed only capitals.

"I honestly don't remember the arrangement of the keys on the original machine, and I haven't seen one of them for many years. If I should stumble on one I believe I'd hug it, pedal, frail old wires, loose type, and all.

"I was traveling for three years, and by the end of that time they were selling everywhere. The company really didn't need me any more. I'd worked out the principles of fast operating from my knowledge of the piano, and had written the first book of instruction. And I suppose that I was then the fastest operator in the world. Good operators were in demand at high prices, and I got a place with an insurance company in New York. They wanted me to learn stenography, but I found that I was fast enough to take dictation on the machine direct. I think I was the first operator to do that."

"So for many years M. A. Saunders worked as stenographer and head bookkeeper with this firm, until, in 1890, Yost planned a typewriter invasion of England. He had left the original firm and had a machine of his own on the market. The British weren't taking to the new invention. M. A. Saunders was retained to go abroad and introduce it there. This she did by starting a free school of typewriting, where she taught their trade to the first British 'typists.' After two years England had accepted the new invention, though with reservations."

In a later issue the Advocate says: "We have ceased to publish statement from any source that a person or a thing is the only one of the kind left or the first of the kind, or that persons are the sole survivors or the only living witnesses. A few weeks ago great interest was elicited by the celebration of the thirtieth anniversary of the practical introduction of the typewriter. Mrs. M. A. Saunders, of New York, received for a few days the undisputed tributes of persons interested and the public. Now comes forward Miss Lillian Sholes, who claims that the first practical typewriter was made in Milwaukee in the early part of 1873, by her father, the original inventor, C. Latham Sholes. Miss Sholes states that she learned to operate successfully this machine at her father's residence in Milwaukee. The machine used by her was one of twelve built during 1873, which were pronounced successful. Out of twenty or thirty typewriters, not called by that name at the time, made by Mathias Schwabach, of Milwaukee, during 1873, all but about a dozen were destroyed as not being usable."

Notes in General.

John G. Paton reports steady progress in mission work in the New Hebrides. He says: "Constantly heathen are giving up idolatry and becoming Christians."

The imperial decree in China regarding the appropriation of temples for schools is being carried out in Anhui. At Luchoufu, four very large images, servants to the god of literature, have been torn down to make room for little Chinese boys to study English.

"Governor Hanley of Indiana has made it a rule that no man shall be appointed to office who drinks," says an exchange. If all the State governors and officials of the Federal Government who have appointive powers were to follow his lead they would accomplish more in the way of temperance than all the prohibition laws that could be passed.

"Life's great necessity," is what the Ladies' Field call it, but we look upon it as the disease of restlessness in minds uncentered in Christ, namely: "There is nothing the present generation finds more wearying than monotony, and it would be difficult to say whether we tire more quickly of places or of people. Constant change is the one necessity (?) of life to-day, and so long as we can gratify the craving for it and widen the area of our experience we will submit to any discomfort."

There is now a spirit of tolerance among the Chinese, and far less suspicion, while a growing interest in Christianity as the recognized foundation of all progress has been encouraged by many of the young reformers, whose numbers increase day by day in spite of the persecution and even martyrdom they have suffered at the hands of the Government. Even the Government itself seems to be gradually adopting the ideas for which the young emperor was dethroned a few years ago.

"The conversion of horses," in a certain sense, in Wales, is said to have become a necessary result of the revival. The ears of the noble animals drawing the loaded coal cars through the mines had become so contaminated and accustomed to the stream of profanity pouring from the drivers' mouths that when the drivers were converted and ceased their cursing the horses were bewildered and unplussed. It required a little time for the conversion of the ears of the horses and their complete readjustment to the new regime.

BLUEBERRY CULTIVATION.—The season of blueberry cultivation is beginning, and from now on will be in full blast in Washington County. The cultivation of blueberries is carried on much differently than that of any of the other valuable crops of Maine. While scientists all over the country have investigated the subject time after time, the same primitive methods are now in vogue as were used twenty years ago. At the conclusion of each and every experiment which these scientists have made, the conclusion has been the same, that burning the barren land was the only true way in which blueberries could be successfully cultivated. Once in two years it is necessary to burn over a blueberry barren or plain, if the crop is to be maintained. In order that they may be practically sure of their crops each year, the owners of the plants divide them, burning one-half this year and the other the next. This insures an income from the property every year.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—President Roosevelt returned to Washington on the 11th inst. after an absence of more than five weeks. During his stay in Chicago, on his return from Colorado, in the course of a public address he expressed the following sentiments in regard to railway legislation: "Personally, I believe that the Federal Government must take an increasing control over corporations. I do not think we have had the steady step toward it should be the adoption of a law conferring upon some executive body the power of increased supervision and regulation of the great corporations engaged primarily in interstate commerce of the railroads. I believe in corporations. They are indispensable instruments in our modern industrialism, but I believe that they should be so supervised and regulated that they should act for the interest of the community as a whole."

On the 11th instant a railroad wreck occurred on the Pennsylvania Rail Road near Harrisburg, by which 22 persons were killed and 126 were injured. It was caused by a west bound express train carrying two coaches and six heavy Pullman sleeping cars, going at the speed of a mile a minute, crashing into a car loaded with many hundreds of pounds of dynamite, which had "backed" in the middle of a freight train on an adjoining track, and toppled over in front of the approaching passenger train. The next instant there were two tremendous explosions, one having followed the other, which scattered death in all directions, and set fire to all the coaches. Heartrending scenes accompanied the identification of the dead and injured.

Statistics of deaths from typhoid fever in this city furnish evidence of the value of filtration of the water supply, by the comparison of a number of cases occurring in wards which have used filtered water, and those which have not. From these statistics it appears that filtration of the water has reduced the liability to typhoid fever 83 per cent.

At the meeting of the National Board of Fire Underwriters in New York it was stated that last year the fire loss by fire amounted to $230,000,000, which is the greatest sum on record; greater than in 1871 and in 1873, the years of the tremendous devastations in Chicago and Boston. This great destruction by fire during the year does not appear to be due to great conflagrations in a few large cities; but to an unusual number of smaller fires occurring throughout the country.

In a recent decision Judge Wheaton of the Luzerne County Court in this State refused to compel a turpentine company to allow automobiles to travel on its road. He stated that the managers of highways operated by private corporations have an undoubted right in the exercise of a sound discretion to prevent such use of the highway as will make it a nuisance for the general public.

Returns to the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture made up to Fifth Month last show the area under winter wheat in cultivation on that date to have been about 29,723,000 acres. This is 1,432,000 acres, or 4.6 per cent. less than the area sown last fall and 2,858,000 acres, or 9.2 per cent. more than the area sown winter wheat harshest last year.

The town of Snyder and the village of Olussee in Oklahoma were struck by a tornado on the 10th instant, causing great destruction of property and the death of about 120 persons. Heavy rains have added to the suffering of survivors. As a result of the tornado, inhabitants of the "new country" in Oklahoma are said to be digging 5,000 tornado cellars. City officers and town boards are urging the construction of such caves, and some towns have passed ordinances requiring the digging of caves.

Since the strike of the teamsters in Chicago began 4000 policemen and deputy sheriffs were engaged in protecting the men of several persons have been killed by rioters. A recent dispatch says: White men are being brought into the city from surrounding States at the rate of 250 a day to take the place of the strikers. The negroes employed at first are being sent home as rapidly as they can be replaced. The white men engaged as teamsters are men of good character, and none is accepted without personal reference.

School children in some parts of this city have been allowed to use plots of vacant ground, eight feet by twelve, to cultivate, and have been instructed in the planting of seeds in them, and other garden work.

FOUNDED.—A statement is published to the effect that the French government has instructed both the civil and military officials in Indo-China to maintain a close watch on the coast. Freo and other French merchant ships not to enter French waters. It is also claimed that France has adopted special measures to prevent breach of neutrality in its territory as between Russia and Japan. These statements, it is said, have eased situation somewhat, but have not removed the possibility of a conflict between France and Russia. The negotiations in Great Britain and France have prevented the controversy from assuming an acute form.

The 14th of this month, the last according to the Russian calendar, was passed in comparative quiet and large cities of Russia, notwithstanding grave apprehensions of disorders.

The Zemstvo Congress, meeting in Moscow, closed sessions on the 9th inst., after resolving that the house of the proposed national assembly be elected universal suffrage, and that the upper consisted of delegates from autonomous institutions. The main features of reported scheme are an organization comprising from 250 members elected by the Zemstvos, the number being extended to all parts of the empire, and the autocratic power of the Emperor will remain undisturbed, the assembly's privilege being advisory, with right of interpellating the Ministers and discussing budget when formulated, though the Ministers continue to be responsible only to the Emperor, whose will remains the supreme law.

An attack upon Jews is reported to have taken place at Zhitomir, in Southwest Russia, in which 14 were killed and more than 100 were wounded.

Canadian emigration agents in the United States said to expect a great increase in the number of American farmers who will migrate to the Dominion north of the line. Fully 60,000 settlers from the United States are expected in the Dominion. Last year the number was 45,000.

The British steamship Baton lately arrived with first direct shipment of benzine from Borneo. The vessel brought 1,250,000 gallons, valued at $75,000. It is said that there is a large demand for the Borneo north of the United States seaports. The spread of the automobile and power launches afford a ready market for benzine, as it is said to excel the home product for purposes. Yesterday's shipment makes the third shipment to reach Philadelphia, the total aggregate being about 2,500,000 gallons. The other shipments are by way of Liverpool.

The Community and the Power.

The words of our title will recall to many the repeated concern of a large heart, the image of a father in Israel and soldier of the cross whose form was laid away a week ago. In him a "public mind," and a universal in spirit and sympathies, embracing humanity both broadly and individually ever a call for help or love was felt, a living sense of the word community, intended only as the gospel can inspire. To the community his heart went out, and person and voice followed, even to distant lands and tribes. And the community about his own door and city felt the truthness of a brotherhood and fatherhood.

There is a Power which he yearned should unite the mass of humanity, the community whom Christ died, a saving power which could heal its woes, reform its abuses, cleanse its corruption, bring in everlasting righteousness. This power of God unto salvation was the gospel, which he would spend of his means and time spent in proclaiming—the power which would unite communities would receive by obedience to the Holy Spirit coming upon them, the least intimation of Christ's witness in the heart up to the pentecostal day for which faithfulness thereto would prepare a man or a nation.

Truly the community is constituted for the good, if each of its members is. A little seed of the gospel seed leavens the whole world if allowed its right of way to grow. But the power requires of its subjects that they be true to the agents in disseminating the seed of the kingdom. "To do good and communicate these should 'forget not, for with such seed does God is well pleased.'" Some have communicative hands, some have communicative tongues, some have communicative hearts, gifts of the Power of that gospel spirit which would pass from vessel to vessel, and have free course in and with the individual that it may be glorified in the community. "As every man has received a gift let him minister the same, as good stewards of the grace" that comes in many modes of presentation.

Can any speaker proclaim or hearer submit to a better banisher of the ills of the community than the operation of the inward word of God, which is living and powerful?—a discernment of the thoughts and intents of the heart; a distinguisher between that in us which serveth God and that which serveth Him not; that judgment may be brought forth unto victory, through repentance towards God and faith in the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world?

The true community-power is the communion of the Spirit running through all; and its operation would make of the community of mankind the holy catholic or universal church, which is the communion of saints. In this way only shall church and state rightly be made one, and "the kingdom of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ." He who is the Power is the soul of the community's fellowship, even the same who is the authority over the individual's conscience. As the community consists of members one of another, its true freedom consists in individual conformity to the authority of the in speaking word of the Power of an endless life. That power alone is safe to rule us, as freemen of the Spirit by submission to the Spirit, which makes a fellowship of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Individual conformity to the power and Spirit of Christ makes the community a holy nation and a royal priesthood, called unto the true liberty of the sons of God. There remains yet a world-wide use for our distinctive principle, as the secret of the holy and catholic church and state of Christ on earth, whereof He and no man is head over all things.

HE ANSWERS.

I know not by what methods rare,
But this I know—God answers prayer.

I know not when He sends the word
That tells us fervent prayer is heard.

I know it cometh soon or late;
Therefore, we need to pray and wait.

I know not if the blessing sought
Will come in just the guise I thought.

Hannah Rodman Fisher's Journal.

Written at the time of the yellow fever in Philadelphia in 1793.

Hannah Rodman Fisher was the wife of Samuel Fisher, and lived in this city during the prevalence of the yellow fever here in 1793. A manuscript account of the sickness and death of her sister, Sarah Rodman, of Newport, R. I., from this disease, while on a visit here, has been preserved, from which some extracts are herewith offered. Some general remarks upon the appearance and progress of this dreaded disorder, taken from Friends' Library, Vol. VIII., p. 57, etc., are prefaced.

"This malignant disorder, which, in the space of about three months swept away nearly four thousand persons, made its appearance in the latter end of the Seventh Month, in Water Street between Mulberry [now Arch] and Sasfras Streets [now Race]. It was some time before it attracted much attention, but it gradually extended to Front Street and other parts adjacent—its greatest ravages being nearest the river Delaware; and by the middle of the Eighth Month considerable alarm began to appear among the citizens, many of whom fled to the country and other places, where they supposed they would be secure from its attack. The number of deaths continued to increase—during the Eighth Month the daily average was about eleven—in the Ninth Month it was nearly fifty, the greatest number being ninety-six, and on two other days eighty-one and ninety-two; and in the Tenth Month it was nearly sixty; the highest number being one hundred and nineteen, and on the days preceding and subsequent one hundred and eleven and one hundred and four persons respectively died. When we consider the comparative smallness of the population in the city at that time [estimated at less than 50,000], it is not surprising that the steady progress of the disease and its great mortality should have spread terror among the inhabitants. The shops were shut up, the streets very much deserted, so that few persons or vehicles were to be seen in them, save the wheels on which were conveyed the dead to the grave, and the persons who attended them. All pomp and show at funerals were dispensed with, and the remains of the most worthy and respectable citizens were committed to the earth in the most simple manner, and in the presence of few, if any, more than necessity required. Pride and ostentation were laid in the dust,—the high and the low, the rich and the poor, were reduced to a common level; and the anxious, inquiring thought of most minds seemed to be, 'Who will go next? Will it be me?'"

"The disorder being considered contagious, the fear of contracting it, in many instances, overcame the feelings of natural affection, and persons who had been accustomed to all the comforts and attentions which wealth and the tenderest connexions in life could bestow, on being seized with the malady, were wholly deserted and left to die alone; or abandoned to the care of mercenary nurses, whose chief object was their own ease and emolument, and who often neglected the unhappy invalids entrusted to their care. Some died entirely alone, and the houses where they were, being deserted, the first intimation that a dead body was there, was the noisome effluvia it emitted while undergoing decomposition.

"The general consternation became so great that those whose particular province it was to have the oversight of the poor, all fled except three; and the distress and suffering among this destitute class of citizens became so urgent, that a public meeting was called to devise measures for their relief and assistance. At this meeting ten persons voluntarily offered their services to aid the overseers of the poor; and at a subsequent meeting others were appointed, making the whole number twenty-seven; but owing to sickness, death and other causes, the work chiefly devolved on twelve, who, with some others that afterwards offered their services, labored daily, with untiring zeal, in this work of benevolence, and were the instruments of affording essential benefits to their suffering fellow-creatures. Of the whole number thus employed, but one now survives [1844], our aged and beloved friend, Thomas Wistar; his last companion, John Letchworth, having been deceased about a year ago. Daniel Offley, an eminent and beloved minister in our Society, impressed with a sense of religious duty, and commiserating the accumulating distresses of his fellow-citizens, offered his services to the Committee on the 30th of the Ninth Month, and from that time continued to exert himself indefatigably in this work of humanity until he was seized with the distemper, which in a few days brought him to the grave, deeply lamented by all who knew him. A few days before his death, being in company with Thomas Wistar and another Friend, when they were about to part, he solemnly observed to his companions, 'The language of this dispensation to each of us is, "Be ye also ready, for at such an hour as we expect not, the messenger of death may be sent to our houses."' They separated never to meet again in mutability, both the others dying in a few days. Daniel Offley was taken ill on the 3rd of Tenth Month, and throughout his sickness evinced a cheerful serenity of mind, being entirely resigned to the will of God, in whom his confidence appeared unshaken; and on the 11th of the same month, in the thirty-seventh year of his age, he quietly departed, to inherit a crown of glory that shall never fade away.'" [An interesting sketch of the life of Daniel Offley is published in the volume entitled, "Biographical Sketches and Anecdotes of Friends."]

PHILADELPHIA, Ninth Month 19th, 1793.
Fifth day of the week.

Last night my endeared sister Sarah was taken with a chill and pain in her head, and this morning a violent headache, fever, and sickness at her stomach fills my mind with apprehensions painfully affecting. This, indeed, comes near my heart, which I hope measurably has felt far more distant scenes of distress. She lies, as usual, very patient. Daniel Offley was just now to see her, and spoke in a very comfortable manner something to this effect: "Dear Sally, it is a comfort to be with thee, to feel the quiet that attends thy mind. Thou hast not now to learn where to place thy confidence, or look for relief, or how to put up thy petitions unto Him who alone can help us, and although in bodily weakness it has been the lot of some worthies that their minds have been greatly stripped, so that they have been ready to conclude that the Lord hath forsaken, and my God hath forgotten to be gracious, yet he desired that if she should be tried with poverty and brought upon a bed of languishing, she might not be discouraged, but put her trust in Him who could enable her to look beyond the gloomy passage and shadow of death into the regions of light and day, and repeating that it was a comfort to be with her, and sit by her, affectionately bade her farewell.

20th.—My beloved sister still continues very poorly, but her physician, Doctor Carry, speaks encouragingly. Sister Lewis and myself had a bed carried in the room, and mutually attended her last night. She drank abundance, and was in great pain with her head all night. Dear Daniel Offley again visited her, and had to express in a manner very similar to the above communication his sense of the quiet of her mind—that sitting by her bedside, his mind had so partaken of it, that it seemed to him like a calm evening after a boisterous and tempestuous day. He had something again to say respecting a tried state of mind, but added, "The Lord is with thee and will be with thee, thy Caretaker, thy Supporter, and thy Comforter, however the present illness may terminate." And turning to me, her poor, afflicted, sympathizing sister, desired that I might endeavor after fortitude, and not sink too low, whereby I should be the less able to render her the necessary assistance. "Lift up thy head in hope, and place thy confidence in the everlasting Father, Friend and Helper." Then again to my precious sister, "I am comforted, dear Sally, in a sense of thy calmness and resignation. I have thought it well worth while to sit a little with thee to enjoy such precious quiet." Upon some enquiry how it was with her, she replied to this import, "I am not anxious respecting the event of my illness, but desire to be resigned."

Though we hoped her situation was not dangerous, yet, fearing the worst, we thought it best to have the advice of another physician, and Doctor Parke was called this day. It was Daniel Offley's opinion, as well as our connections, that they were equal to any of the faculty here.

21st.—I perceived for the first time the doctors apprehended her fever putrid, and cautioned me about being so much about her, taking her breath, etc. I have no language to describe my feelings, the anxiety and distress of my mind. Dear Daniel Offley again entreated me to endeavor after resignation, and take care of myself. Said he could feel for me, that he had known what it was to part from a wife dear as his own soul.

An affectionate, kind black woman was provided to sit up with dear Sally last night, with whom she appeared well satisfied. I visited her several times during the night, and perceived an abatement of the fever, but I was impressed with distressing apprehensions that she would not recover, and have no language to describe the depth of my concern, and the anxiety and solicitude of my mind on that account.

22nd.—The first day of the Yearly Meeting and first of the week,* she desired it might be inserted in her Journal, that notwithstanding her desire to attend the Yearly Meeting, she was satisfied with its being otherwise; that her great object and desire in taking this journey was her improvement, and it made a little difference in what way.

About seven in the evening, as I was sitting by her, she observed that she had felt so much sweet peace and quiet this afternoon, she thought she might build some hopes upon and if she was removed she had desired that her friends might be supported, particularly mother and me. She requested that each of the children and servants in this house might have a Bible given them to remember her, they had been very kind to her, and after visiting some little legacies to all her nephews and nieces, also the servants in brothers' and sisters' families at home, giving some directions respecting the distribution of other things, said she had not a clew of evidence that she should be removed at a time, but thought it not amiss to mention these things; and she would like that each of her brothers should accept some of her manuscripts.

23rd, second of the week, between eight and nine o'clock in the morning.—Last night I observed that my dear sister's strength was very much exhausted, and it so overcame that it seemed as if I could not stay by and leaving her under the care of sister L and an affectionate black woman, I retire and endeavor after more quietude and resign to this most trying dispensation, which in some degree afforded, my mind grew calm, and hearing that she was in a sleep, I was also favored to partake of refreshing influence. This morning I returned to her, and asked how she did; she intimated she did not feel as much recruited as she expected from her quiet repose, the pain in head continuing, and extreme weakness.

One day, on sister Lewis informing her a friend below desired her love, but that it most prudent to omit visiting her on account of the prevailing caution and dread, she thoughtfully excused her, observing that she thought a great favor not to be deprived and separated from all her friends. Dear brother Mier Jabez [Fisher], a very promising lad a few twelve years of age, was taken ill the night as my beloved sister, and is now near his end. His disorder is so extreme putrid that his parents have given him up to the care of black nurses, believing it best to separate themselves on account of other children, but now it makes little difference, as he is quite deprived of his senses, good man servant in their family, who taken ill one day before dear Jabez, is thought near his end; the distress of family is very great, particularly to brother Miers and sister Sally. I believe it my attend my dear sister, let her disorder prove at it may.

George Churchman called to enquire after me, and gave me a letter he had written to me. I told her of both; she desired the letter might be read, and said it was a sweet letter, and that she should be glad to see him if she were able. She desired her love to him, and that he might be informed she had been low in body and mind, but had kept up a little more.

Desiring some little alteration respecting my being that was doing for her, she remarked that she was so weak she thought she had very little patience, a very different sentiment from those about her, who have had to admire my patience and calmness. At another time I observed it was difficult to conceive such a state of weakness. She was removed this to another bed, which seemed to refresh me much, and she has borne the application of medicine and cordial beyond my expectation. Her feet, hands and face have been frequently bathed with old Madeira wine, which seems to refresh her, and a little hope is revived in the breast of her anxious sister. I have two affectionate negro women who attend her, and the rest of us omit nothing in our power that we can do to administer to her comfort.

Daniel Olley called to see us. I told him how little how it was with dear Sally; that she did not appear to be worse, and I had a little more, soon after which she spoke to the following import: "I feel desirous, dear Hannah, that thou may give her up, believing she is cured. We are all weak creatures, and unable to step aside, and if she should be removed, and that should be the case, how much easier it would be to thee and her other friends. She is the Lord's, and may his will be done. I have no doubt it will be well with her therefore, dear Hannah, seek after resignation; give her up freely, and then, if it please the Lord to restore her, it will be well; and if his will is taken, you will be better prepared than by living too much way to flattering hopes. I am much for thee on this trying occasion, and do not pretend to have any certain prospect but it may be respecting her getting up, but the best is to be resigned." He mentioned a letter he made to a dear young woman, who, upon his enquiring a little the state of her mind, replied that she felt resigned, believing in her little love for the truth would render her acceptable, and if she lived she should have many trials and exercises to pass through, and loved to stand her ground, and that looking back upon the world, the thoughts of returning to it seemed rather distressing. Soon after I mentioned a part of the above to dear Mary, and she told me she thought she was cured, and afterward asked me if Daniel Olley had a religious opportunity. I replied, "Yes, he thought it his duty to leave meeting this afternoon and visit the afflicted." She said, "I believe I am resigned." I have made a little choice on dear mother's account, and do not know that I have it now. While I believe in the world we must expect tribulation.

Dear Jabez was taken from his sufferings about twelve o'clock last night, and is to be buried this morning. The dear child told his mother last First-day that if he was fit to go he should be willing to leave all his dear friends and go to his Lord. His father, his two little brothers, Redwood and Miers, and my Samuel, were the only persons that walked to the ground following the hearse.

This afternoon Daniel Olley was concerned to visit my dear sister in her chamber, and to bow in reverent, fervent supplication to the Father of mercies on her behalf, that she might be supported on her bed of languishing, her spirits raised above the fear of death and centered safe with Him. It was a favored time, yet, notwithstanding we have every reason to believe our loss will be her gain, it is hard for me to say on this occasion, "Thy will be done." Oh, that I may be prepared to meet her in a better place should the sands of my life be but few; for this is an awful day of visitation, in which the messenger of death is going from house to house, and who of us may be summoned we know not. May you, my dear friends, be supported, and diligently endeavor to render yourselves approved, seeing the uncertainty of all temporal things, and knowing assuredly that those who will not bow in mercy must in judgment. My heart aches for my dear mother; what a comfort, I have thought, it would be to have her parental aid and sympathy at such a time as this.

Dear Thomas Scattergood and George Churchman called at the door and desired to see me. My Samuel informed them my beloved sister was very low. I added, "She is very sweet." They expressed they did not doubt that Thomas said he had been comforted concerning her since he heard of her illness. She lays like a sweet, patient lamb, says but little, seems entirely sensible, and looks up at me with heart-tendering affection. At times my heart seems ready to burst, but I am endeavoring as much as possible to prepare for the severing stroke.

Thomas Scattergood called at the door this morning expecting to hear that my dear sister was gone. I believe it is fully evident to all the discerning that have seen or heard respecting her conduct at this trying season, that her mind is divinely supported, and if she goes now, her sun will indeed set with brightness, and exhibit a striking example of the advantage of early dedication; may her dear nephews and nieces profit thereby.

About seven in the evening Daniel Olley kindly called again, and seeing me much affected, again desired that I would seek after resignation. "It is a close trial, and many of thy friends feel for thee, but as I told thee before, and have no disposition to recall it, she is the Lord's, and let Him take her. I have no doubt she will enter into the full fruition of that joy which is prepared for the righteous. She will be released from a troublesome world, and centered where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary are at rest. This is my faith concerning her; therefore try to compose thy mind, and not give way to sorrow, which may hurt thee. I know 'tis hard to part from such dear connections, having had to experience it."

As I was walking about in great distress, dear Thomas Scattergood and George Churchman, I believe providentially, entered, and the former feelingly addressed my dear husband and myself relative to our present situation, mentioning a family formerly to whom Divine regard was extended, as it is recorded; that Jesus loved Martha and her sister, and Lazarus, but Lazarus was taken sick and died, and one of them said, Lord, if thou hadst been here our brother had not died, comfortably believing that the removal of our beloved sister would not be in displeasure to us or our dear separated connections, as the deepest trials were sometimes the greatest blessings; that we might come with more purity and brightness, believing there was a work for us to do, and he desired that we might wrestle for the blessing as Jacob did, though it be as in the night season. That he had been comforted concerning us ever since the first visit he made us, hoping we should be united in a progressive walking in the way that leads to peace, and desired that we would consider the Lord as a God near at hand, and not afar off; that he had been comforted in a belief that a remnant, being in all things resigned to his will, would be spared through this day of awful visitation who would be cleansed and purified." He also expressed something like a belief that my dear mother and connections would be supported. These minutes are truly imperfect, but the opportunity was very solacing to my poor, afflicted, tossed mind, and served to revive a degree of faith in a season of the deepest affliction.

27th, sixth of the week.—My precious sister quietly departed this life about twelve o'clock last night. When she was gone my mind was favored with a calmness from a full belief she is one of the number of whom it may be said, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

She was put in a neat black walnut coffin, and interred in Friends' burial-ground in this city, about eight o'clock, attended by my dear husband, brother Miers [Fisher], Daniel Olley, and several other friends, with Prince and Caesar, two black servants.

Her disorder is supposed to be the yellow fever, though we have no way to account where she should have taken it.

HANNAH FISHER.

A STORY OF GRANT.—Gen. Fred. Grant's favorite story of his father is one that very aptly illustrates that great soldier's faculty of sizing up a situation in a few words.

"We had an old coachman," he says, "who was not the brightest man in the world, but what he did not know about a horse was not worth knowing. Mother used to call on him to do all sorts of things that were not in his line, and old John, of course, was always making mistakes that annoyed her. Once she sent him to the bank to do some business, and he did it wrong. She told father about it, and said:

"I guess you'll have to let John go. He never does as he should anything I want him to do."

"Well, mother," said my father, "if John could do everything you want him to do, and do it right, he would not have to be our coachman."—Philadelphia Ledger.

A Visit to Algeria.

We were standing on a huge mound of sand ending in an abrupt amphitheatre that had been swept out by the wind. Our horses plunged their forefeet into the loose sand and slid to the bottom. Once upon the level and headed home they shot out like arrows sent from a strong bow. Saffi's took the lead. No motion that any one has ever imagined can be more deliciously smooth and even than the gallop of a real Arab horse. But ours by this time were going like the wind, simply devouring the ground, and every moment were warning to the sport and increasing their speed. It was the first time I had been on a horse for nearly fifteen years. I felt the muscles by which I clung to the saddle begin to tremble, for we had been riding several hours. I called loudly to Saffi to slacken his pace, for my horse did not want to be left behind. He did not hear—I called louder—he drew his horse on his haunches, wheeling round, and with alarm in his face, said, "Mon Dieu, mon Dieu! est-ce que Mademoiselle va tomber aussi? Mon Dieu, mon Dieu!" "No," I said, "I am not going to fall, but I'm too tired to ride so awfully fast; let's go a little slower." "Comme Mademoiselle veut." and we started again.

Soon we had reached the great palm-forest and were passing into its shadow. The sun had set, but a golden light was still in the sky. At a junction in the road Saffi turned and said, "Par ici—je montrera quelque chose qui sera tres interessant pour Mademoiselle" (This way; I will show something that will be very interesting to Mademoiselle). Passing along a narrow road between two high walls of brown earth covered with thickly set thorn branches, behind which rose towering palms, we soon were plunged into the heart of old Biskra.

I have no words with which to convey to you an idea of what these native villages are like. But first of all let me tell you that they are clean, really clean. Whether it is the purifying sun, the wise law of Mohammed, or both, or what—nowhere—absolutely nowhere, have we found any suggestion of a disagreeable odor, and everything looks wholesome and reasonably comfortable. The houses are all built of sun-dried bricks, chocolate colored, with no windows, but a doorway that can be closed, and on the flat roofs, encircled with high walls of the same material, the women live, and there they sit spinning or weaving in the sun, wearing their gorgeous colors and chattering like magpies. They never are seen in the street, unless veiled, and the best families do not allow their women to go out at all, excepting Sixth-days (which is the Mohammedan holy day) when they go to the cemetery. It is a religious feature, but it becomes a sort of picnic, and the poor things seem to have a good time.

But as we entered old Biskra the brown walls of the houses were lined along their base by lounging figures—men who, wrapped in their burnooses, were reposing after a more or less idly spent day. On one side ran a stream of water with here and there a stone fountain with large stone basin, into which and out of which the water constantly ran, children in brilliantly colored garments—orange, red, yellow, rose, magenta and green flashed about in the shadow, while every now and then mules and donkey trains were stopping to unload. We turned, wound and twisted about the narrow streets, and always the same brown walls, the same silent hooded figures, the same flashing colors greeted us. From the roofs everywhere savage wolf-like dogs barked fiercely at us, tugging at their chains. When we at last emerged into the open the color had died out of the sky and out of the mountain—the crescent moon with the evening star were shining serenely over the palm trees in a sky of infinite blue.

Another short gallop and we were entering the real town, the modern half-French town of Biskra. Half French in appearance, though ninety-nine one-hundredths of its inhabitants, so far as one sees, are Arabs or negroes—mostly the former. Through the dense crowds in the streets we made our way with difficulty back to our hotel, where I dismounted and gave my horse over to Saffi's care.

I found M—in bed, feeling quite comfortable. She had the satisfaction of having seen the same old mule throw its Arab rider flat on the ground on the way home. He, wrapped in his burnoose was not hurt, but his fall was a convincing proof to all unbelievers that she was not to blame for having been thrown. Their carriage, too, broke down on the way home, so they had to get out and walk a space; but they managed to rig it up so as to reach Biskra at last.

This for one afternoon on the Sahara! and I could write as much about every day that we have spent here. But where to begin, where to leave off—how to give you an idea that is in any way adequate of this oriental desert life, I am in despair. In the first place you never heard of Biskra, nor had any of us until just before we started for Algiers; and the book in which we read about it is the one I must recommend to any one who wants to know in detail about the desert. Of course it is a story, but apart from that, line for line, we can discover everything the writer had in mind when he wrote that description. All the names are changed and there are other slight discrepancies, but the life, the color, the mystery, the charm is all there as they exist in reality. The book is called "The Garden of Allah" (an Arab name for the desert), written by Robert Hichens, an Englishman.

To-day I showed the book to Saffi, and he held up his hands. "Ah," he said, "Monsieur Robert! mais c'est mon ami" (It is my friend) and then he went on to tell how he, Saffi, had conducted him everywhere, how M. Robert would stand long writing, writing, taking down all he would say.

To-day Saffi took us over to old Biskra—took us into his own house, introduced us to his wife and daughter, the latter fourteen, who is to be married in a few days. She has never been out of the house since she saw light. Her entire knowledge of the world consists of what she can see from the flat roof of her father's house. She was very pretty; her mother was loaded with jewels. He took us in other houses and showed us women, weaving and spinning, and who opened dark rooms and where immense quantities of dates were stored. The women chatted in Arabic, and he translated.

Doukhor School Work in Canada.

The writer, feeling interested in the school education of the Doukhobors, offered to furnish a coin to each pupil in the Good Spirit Lake school, who would write a single letter page, upon any subject of his own selection. Thinking that the many readers of THE FRIEND who have contributed to the physical need of these people might like to know something of the result of the efforts of the three English teachers who have, during the past three years, labored to impart a knowledge of the English language, and with it to sow good seed for developing moral and religious character, the following letters are selected from among several that have recently come to hand. In an accompanying note their teachers says: "They [the letters] are all quite spontaneous—subjects, etc., etc., all being left entirely to themselves, and of course the letters have had no correction."

Dear Mr. William Evans.

When the snow was melted in a river. A boys made rafts to swim & we had a great fun. Next summer we will move to a village "Think what a lot of trouble it would take." When we came from Russia to Canada we had no house, no horses, no cattle & we have fifteen cattle, four big cows, & five heifer cows, & two oxen, & four small heifer calves. Two horses, & twenty four hens & 12 roosters generally they lay eighteen eggs a day. When we came to Canada we were very poor even we hadn't a dollar. In Canada mu better to live if a man is very poor he will soon get on better if he works hard, but Russia people work very hard & yet they are as poor as ever.

Now Russians fight with Japanese, we are glad that we gone from Russia before the war began. In Canada there are no robbers. In Russia lot robbers they often kill people. Once my Uncle my mother's brother went tatars* to buy some land to feed cattle, he came there & went into the house & the were tatars, & he asked for land, but it did not sell the land. So he sat on his horse & went away. He rode not very far, the tatars call him to come back, so he went back. They cooked for him some dinner & as was eating, one tatar took a gone & shot my Uncle two times & he was fell dead. They laid my Uncle on a horse & they hit him with the ropes on the horse's back. They led the horse to the river & threw him into the river & let horse go where he want. The horse went home. Then my grandfater came to the horse & saw the blood on the back. Then he told it to the family & they search & search. Then my grandfater went to the river where he was & he saw boat then he dismount his horse & went with the boots were & laid him on a horse & brought him home & then they buried him. Once in Russia we left our little house didn't lock it; at night tatars came & took everything. At dawn my grandmother went into the little house, she saw the doors were ed she thought someone was in the house, she saw nobody was in the house & what she was in it they took everything. Then family found few things in the caves. y often they kill shepherd & take away all sp. Armanians are very good. My family two friends & they were Armanians, & names were Waskan, & Apartsoon; They are very good true men, but they not very . They had lot fruit. When come to our e everytime they bring something. Some apples, prunes. They were friends with family because we sold them sheep My father was dead in Russia. My grandp & my father & my uncle live together ve one sister & one brother.  Canada.

April 8th, 1905.

Dear my friend Mr. William Evans. Do you want to get a letter from me. I suppose you do want. How are you getting on? I am getting on very well, & also my family. Now there are 11 boys go to school, & 3 boys move to other village to live there. Now we are learning in school Arithmetic Reading, Drawing, Geography, Poetry, Bible, Spelling, Singing, History of Canada, & History of Russia, & several other kinds of things, I'll tell you what are they about. About tea plant, sugar cane, coffee, salt, sun, Pen, glass, coal mines

This winter we have had very little snow, & often frost very big in the morning, & now snow has melted early. In our new village men had began to sow seeds in March 23rd. This year the river is little.

Russia is a warm country & plenty every kinds of fruits.

But in one thing there was bad, because Tatars killed plenty people & steal things, & if a person would get to other village, then Tatars would met & take money or something or other & then would let person go. But in Canada there is cold, & just only wild fruits grow. But there is no stealing, & not killed people.

And there in Canada is very flat country. But in Russia there is hilly country. Now we have 14 cattle & one team of horses, & 5 cattle we had sold. We have 24 hens & to cocks, & hens laid 14 to 17 & sometimes 21 eggs a day.

I have 3 brothers, & one of them go to school with me, & other two stay at home, because they are to small to go to school, one 6 years old of age & the other one 4 weeks old.

There is a railway near to our village, about one mile & half away, & a station near same as railway, and it called sign Buchanan.

Once in Russia Doukhobors burned their guns & swords, because they didn't want to go to fight in the battle against other countries, & so instead that government put them into prison for 4 year. This village is called Slavianka, where they burned guns and swords.

They made heaps of guns & swords, & then put coal oil on them and then fired them.

Goodbye from your friend
 Saveli Vishlov.

Novotroitskoe

 March 30, 1905.

Dear Mr. William Evans I hope all your family are well. Now I have one stallion & 1 mare & 5 cows & 4 oxens & 11 hens & 1 dog & his name is Puddy, a dog which could laugh.

Would you want to hear about our school which is in the end of the village.

First our teacher give Arithmetic to do, then we read some parts of the Bible & Stories & History & also we read in our 3rd reader & often we try to do our writing best then teacher will go around & look whose is the best. Now we have a Station very near about a mile away & we call it Buchanan's. In this Station a great house was building. Dear Mr. William Evans we have a great trouble over here. Because our friend had died on Monday 13 March 1905 & his name was John Novokhovon. He was in bed nearly 2 Months & he had a great sickness on his lungs. Now we live in company, so we have a saw-mill in our village & a threshing machine & also an engine.

Would you want to know how many families live in our village? in our village there are 25 families & from those families just 14 boys who go to school. Now I hope you are well. Now I suppose you want to know how our village is divided. First I must say a name of our village. We called our village Kerijova & the other name of village is called Kapostina & those who will be left their village is called Novotroitskoe. Now I think you want to know how many families go to Kerilova there are 7 families. And to Kapostina there are 4 families. And in Novotroitskoe there are only 14 families are left.

Would you want to know how we lived in Russia. In Russia we lived very rich & also we have many dogs which look after the cattle with my grandfather And in Russia there are very big wolves & also the dogs are very big. In Russia there are great many flowers & great many mts, and also there are many robbers. And in Russia there are lot of people who drunk whiskey. And in Russia there are very warm weathers.

In Russian country there are very dear guns. In Canada we live not very poor or not rich. In Canada we have only 1 dog and he is very small from our Russian dog. And in Canada there are very small wolves. And in Canada there are not so many as in Russia, & there are a very few Mts. In Canada there are few robbers. And so in Canada not very many wars because there are very few robbers. In Canada there are very good people, because there are very few men who drunk whiskey & so it is very dear. In Canada guns are very cheap about 20 dollars 1 gun, but if you would take it to Russia there it will be 40 dollars. Would you want to know about our journey from Russia. First we started to Butoom & then to Tooretiskland & then I didn't remember to where I was going. And when we get to the end of the sea we went to Halifax to St. John & then from St. John we went straight to Winnipeg & from Winnipeg to Yorkton & from Yorkton we went to Good Spirit Lake & from Good Spirit Lake we went over Canada, & then we settle in Canada by putting on tents to keep off the rain. Then when we live a little time we saw lots of Mosquitos flying about. I think I would like Canada better because there are no robbers or no wars since we came to Canada. Now we have a raft which we use to push it into the water & sit on it. Now our creek is not very deep just in some places about 4 ft or more. Would you want to know all the names of all boys.

TEMPERANCE.

The matter under this heading is furnished to THE FRIEND on behalf of the "Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia," by Benjamin F. Whitson, 401 Chestnut St., Phila.

For right is right, since God is God,
And right the day shall win;
To doubt would be disloyalty;
To falter would be sin.

"What is morally wrong can never be politically right."—Burke.

An industry that makes necessary police and courts, penitentiaries, alms-houses and insane asylums to care for its products is one that good citizens ought easily to find a way to destroy.—The Voter.

How can you tell your boy to avoid the saloon's free lunch when you patronize a whisky department store to save two cents on a can of beans?

The man who lives for self alone Lives for the meanest mortal knave.
—Joaquin Miller.

Last Christmas Prince Henry of Prussia presented all in the navy with the temperance pamphlet, "The Poison Tree of the German People."

The Constitution of the new Republic of Panama includes common drunkards among those who are not entitled to a vote.

The saloon is a parasite—it feeds upon prosperity, but it never produces it.

The only solution of the saloon problem is NO SALOON.

The Pennsylvania Railroad has filed remonstrances against applicants for liquor licenses in Altoona and South Altoona, Pa., on the ground that these communities are composed exclusively of railroad employees. The exposure of the men to temptation to drink means a menace to public safety.

SUCCESS IN POLITICAL TEMPERANCE WORK consists not merely in securing prohibitory laws, but as much or more in the subsequent enforcement of those laws. The courts, including the juries, are local in their jurisdiction, and are influenced to a great extent by local public sentiment. A jury will hardly condemn a man to punishment for an act which they do not themselves consider a crime. The local court cannot be forced by a national, or even a State mandate, to enforce what is to them an obnoxious law. Where a community has suffered the effects of legalized liquor selling, and a majority of that community has, through suffering, become sufficiently awakened to secure a prohibitory law, it is then, but not till then, prepared and able to secure also its enforcement. Political temperance work will thus succeed as fast as the people are prepared for it; it cannot be made to succeed more rapidly." Thus writes a sympathetic correspondent in recognition of the effort of this page. His years of experience and serious thought give weight to his expression, but does he realize that judges, juries and communities are being thwarted in their efforts to legislate and act consistently with the advance of public sentiment? Does he not perceive that in many places in our land the government is not "by the people" nor "for the people," but by the mandate of men who act at the behest of the liquor interests? A national temperance movement is imperative, though it may thwart its own purpose by outrunning public sentiment instead of co-operating therewith in every little forward step. We need prophets to warn us, but not less do we need leaders and teachers.

WHEN REDEMPTION WILL COME.—When every man who puts love of country and duty to God above all other considerations shall have taken his rightful place in the councils of his party, the redemption of this nation from the curse of drink will not be far away.—Minnesota Issue.

The work has multiplied like stars at night
When darkness deepens; every noble deed Lasts longer than a granite monument.

Statistics recently published by the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor show that the per capita consumption of intoxicating liquors during the year 1904 reached a higher point than at any time in the history of our country, being 20.29 gallons. This consumption, however, is chiefly beer, as 18.28 gallons per capita are designated "malt liquors." The individual consumption of wine and spirits shows no marked change during the past twenty-five years. A correspondent of the New Voice asks why, with the increase of territory under legal prohibition, there should be no diminution in the amount of liquors consumed by the nation at large. The reply calls attention to the indubitable evidence that the per capita consumption is less in territory under prohibition, and that if the increase in the use of liquors is due to any system of dealing with the traffic, license and not prohibition must be held accountable. Under high license the traffic has greatly increased, while under prohibition it has in many places been abolished entirely. Attention is directed also to three important factors in the case:

1. The interstate commerce law operates to nullify more or less the efforts to keep the traffic out of prohibition territory.
2. For many years there has been a striking drift of the people to the cities. The rapid growth in prohibition area has been in country districts, and in towns of less than 8,000 population. While both rural and urban population is increasing, the increase has been much more rapid in the urban centres, and these are the licensed centers.

3. During the past decade there has been tremendous influx of immigrants, most whom are notoriously drinking people. We are now receiving nearly a million of these people a year, and their thirst for liquor is in no way lessened by their arrival in this country.

"SCIENTIFIC TESTIMONY ON BEER" is the title of a pamphlet published by the International Reform Bureau, 206 Pennsylvania Ave. Washington, D. C., 35 cents per hundred, postage free.

"It is everywhere conceded nowadays that the man who drinks to excess is totally unfit for business, but there is a sort of belief that moderate drinking is quite harmless, nay, good, in some instances, beneficial."

This latter view is not sustained by the testimony of science nor by the records of experience. It is even contended by some physicians that "beer kills quicker than any other liquor."

THE SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN ON BEER.—"In some years past a decided inclination has been apparent all over the country to give up the use of strong alcoholic drinks, using beer as a substitute. This is evidently founded on the idea that beer is not harmful and contains a large amount of nutrient; also, that it may have some medicinal quality which would neutralize the alcohol it conceals, etc. These theories are without confirmation in the observation of physicians and chemists. The beer of high quality is found to produce a species of generation of the entire organization, and is found to be deceptive. Fatty deposits, increased circulation, conditions of congested perversion of functional activities, local inflammations of both the liver and the kidneys are constantly present. Intellectually, a person amounting almost to paralysis arrests reason, changing all the higher faculties into mere animalism, sensual, selfish, sluggish. In appearance the beer drinker may be picture of health, but in reality he is incapable of resisting disease. A slight cold or a severe cold will commonly provoke a disease. The beer drinker is generally easily and very incurable. The constant use of beer every day gives the system no recuperation, but steadily lowers the vital forces." "It is asserted by competent authority that the evils of heredity are very positive in drinkers. Public sentiment and legislation should comprehend that the use of all forms of alcohol are dangerous."—Scientific American.

MORE BEER, MORE WHISKY.—In the year 1900 the beer consumption of Germany was 27.5 gallons per capita; in America, 10. Of course, we ought to find that the "drove out" distilled liquors. On the contrary, we discover that the Germans demand 1.9 gallons of spirits per capita to be consumed in America. In France, "on the other hand," where the wine-producing countries were, "the vellers assure us, "there is no drunkard among them there were consumed 25.4 gallons of wine per capita, and more spirits than in Germany nearly twice as much as in the United States. These facts are just as patent as the population, or import and export; but, nevertheless, the professor and tutors who b-knack for mugs and bottles will go on during the innocent public that the only way to keep a man from whisky is to fill him up on —Chicago Interior.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"
Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Among the Friends who during a period of ten or ten years previous to the year 1876 occupied the position of teacher or of helper in the family were Catharine Lee, Marianne Battin, Louisa Smith [afterwards Eckburn], Mary Vail, Eliza A. Cheyney, Miranda G. Dewees, and Mary Millhouse. The named Friend died at the Institution on the 29th of Fifth Month 1876, after having lived but a few days before from her home in Iowa. Aaron Dewees, Jr., the husband of A. G. Dewees was also usefully employed in instructing the boys out of school and assisting in the work of the farm. Thomazine Valen who had at intervals for many years been concerned to assist the Indian women in the care of their homes, had also spent several weeks acceptably during this period in visiting in the reservation.

The Act of 1875, provided for the appointment of three Commissioners, who were ordered to lay out the villages in the Allegheny Reservation, within the limits of which, as decided by the Council of the Seneca Nation, would be valid: Two weeks had not elapsed before a petition had been circulated and signed by thirty prominent Indians addressed to President Grant asking that Thomas Starr, Ebenezer Worth, and Joseph Scattergood should be appointed the Commissioners under the Act. The wishes of the Indians were complied with so far as to appoint one of those proposed by them, viz: Joseph Scattergood, Commissioner; John Manly a resident of Warburg County, N. Y., and Henry Shanker from the state of Kansas were associated with Joseph Scattergood and these three Commissioners entered upon the work of surveying the boundary lines of the Reservation determining upon and marking the limits of the villages of Salamanca, West Salamanca, Mahalia, Carrollton, Great Valley and Rede, and of making out a map of the same, which was completed, and finally reported on the Twelfth Month 30th, 1876.

This Act of 1875, instituted a new order of things in the dealings between the Indians and the whites upon the Allegheny Reservation, although very relieving in many respects soon found to need some amendments to protect the Indians. In the Twelfth Month Joseph Scattergood and Henry Shanklin addressed a letter to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs pointing out some of its deficiencies, and offering a draft of a bill to be acted by Congress making the Agent appointed by Government an umpire in cases where the lessor and lessee could not agree on the amount of the rental. They also say in their letter, "With the consent of the Indians, we believe there would be much pecuniary advantage to them, if he was authorized to collect or have the rents payable to the land collected, and hold the money received subject to the order of the duly elected Councils, to be accounted for under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior might prescribe."

This suggestion in reference to the Agent was favorably considered at different times during subsequent years, and in 1901 an Act was passed which empowers the Agent for the New York Indians appointed by the United States Government to collect the rental of the leased lands in those villages and pay $2500 of the amount received, to the Treasurer of the Seneca Nation for the general expenses of the Nation and to distribute the balance among the members of the Nation individually with their regular annuity. In his report for the year ending Sixth Month 30th, 1903, the Agent for the New York Indians, B. B. Weber, stated that for the first time in accordance with this act he had after the payment of the fixed sum of $2500, divided among the Senecas $9828.32 or $4.24 per capita together with the annuity of about the same amount.

This service was the last one of importance which Joseph Scattergood was able to perform for these Indians, in whose welfare he had become deeply interested. He was at this time suffering from a serious affection of the heart, which continued to increase, until his valuable life was ended the 9th of Sixth Month, 1877, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

At the Yearly Meeting held in 1876, the following Friends were added to the Committee, viz: John S. Comfort, Ephraim Smith, Henry Wood, Joseph L. Bailey, John Sharpless, Joseph Passmore, and John Bishop.

In the Third Month, 1876, Aaron P. Dewees, writing from Tunesassa, remarks in his report to the Committee, "There is a dissatisfaction among the Indians on account of the present superintendent (of public schools in the reservation) employing white teachers to the entire exclusion of all Indians who may apply: hence the schools are very poorly attended, and but little interest manifested in them."

The Friends' Institute for the Year 1904 and 1905.

The work of the Institute has gone quietly on through its Committees and its various channels of activity during the past year. At first thought there would seem to be but little to report, but when we begin to think of the different functions which the Institute performs, we realize the place which it fills in the needs of our various Quaker concerns, and we can perhaps best appreciate the importance of its work if we consider for a moment what the result would be should it be removed from us. Its usefulness seems to be increasing from year to year, as is evidenced by the number of Committees which use its rooms and of the large number of people who frequent them for social or other purposes. It is hard to conceive what we should do without them if for any reason the Institute should cease its activities.

LYCEUM, RECEPTIONS AND INVITATIONS.

At the first meeting in the autumn of 1904, the separate Committees which had previously had charge of the Lyceum meetings and of receptions and invitations, decided to combine forces, and sub-committees were appointed to take charge of the various departments of the work. The sub-committee on receptions and invitations arranged for two meetings at the Institute, to which a few strangers living in the city were invited. They were attended by only a small number outside of the managers, but early in the First Month, through the courteous generosity of our president, Asa S.

Wing, a gathering was held in his home in West Philadelphia, at which about fifty people were present on a very stormy evening. It was a time of social intercourse and enjoyment, which was apparently heartily enjoyed by all who were there. The value of such gatherings as this can hardly be overestimated. There are always many Friends who are strangers in the city, and it should be one of the chief objects of the Institute to extend a welcoming hand to them on every possible occasion.

There were three meetings of the Lyceum held at No. 140 North Sixteenth Street, as follows:— Eleventh Month 4th, 1904, an address by Wm. Evans Darty, Secretary of the English Peace Society.

Sixth Month 24th, 1905, "Mosquitoes, how they live, how they breed, how they carry disease, and how they may be destroyed;" by Dr. L. O. Howard, of Washington, D. C.

Third Month 10th, "Farming in the City," by R. F. Powell, Superintendent of the Philadelphia Vacant Lots Cultivation Association.

In addition to this, the members of the Institute were invited to the address at Haverford by Charles Wagner on Eleventh Month 24th, 1904, it being considered a Lyceum lecture.

There is a strong feeling on the part of some of the managers that the Lyceum has largely fulfilled the purposes for which it was organized. There are in the city many good lectures on almost every evening during the winter months, and it has seemed to some members of the Committee that it is hardly worth while to continue the meetings. For this reason it was determined to have fewer lectures this winter, with a view to determining, if possible, the feeling of Friends in regard to it. The Committee, on the other hand, has by no means lost sight of the social side which the Lyceum meetings have fostered, and realizing the importance of this, it is not at all prepared to conclude that the Lyceum lectures should cease. It does, however, seek an expression of opinion from members of the Institute and all interested Friends as to the advisability of continuing this work which has had so much influence in bringing together all classes of Friends.

The tables at our rooms have been supplied as usual with newspapers and periodical literature. After the close of the year, donations are made of magazines, six months or more old, to those who desire them for distribution to reading-rooms, prisons and other places where they may be again utilized to advantage.

The work of the House Committee has gone on quietly and in the usual satisfactory way. The report of the janitor shows the following figures:—

There have been meetings of 439 Committees, representing an attendance of . . . 3882 people
 The day visitors have been . . . 5392
 Evening visitors . . . 1062
 Teas and receptions . . . 2118

Total . . . . . 12,394
 The corresponding total last year was . . . . . 12,797 showing a small decrease for the present year.

The membership of the Institute is as follows:—

Membership on Fifth Month
 1st, 1904 . . . . . 644
 Resigned . . . 18
 Died . . . . . 4 622
 New members . . . . . 20

Total Fifth Mo. 1st, 1905, is 642
 The report of the Treasurer, which is submitted independently of this report, shows a balance in hand of $221.79. As shown by it, the annual dues of our members are quite insufficient to meet our expenses, and the generosity of a few Friends in meeting the deficiency should be recognized and appreciated. Without their timely aid, the work of the Institute would of necessity have been curtailed. It would seem that there are many Friends whose interest should be enlisted, if the opportunities and advantages which the Institute afford could be brought to their attention.

We feel thoroughly convinced of the value and importance of the work which the Institute is striving to do, and the co-operation, both financial and otherwise, of a wider circle of Friends, is most earnestly desired.

Items Concerning the Society.

John B. Garrett attended Springfield Meeting at Marple last First-day.

Harry Moore, of West Grove, has been liberated for religious service in Rich Square Quarterly Meeting, North Carolina.

The arrival this week has been expected of Jesse Derbyshire and Catherine Smith, ministers, and Lydia B. Sargent, an elder, of a General Meeting of Fritchley, England, for religious service in the Friendly American Meetings, including some in North Carolina.

The funeral of Joseph S. Elkinton, held in Arch Street Meeting-house last Seventh Day, was attended by a remarkably large concourse from many quarters—a tribute to the love of many wherever his sympathetic heart had ministered privately and publicly. Many brief and feeling testimonies were uttered, and a sense was manifested that he rests from his arduous labors, and his works of faith and labor of love do follow him; who leaves so large a place empty, save as it shall be filled by successors obedient to their service in their day.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is stated that President Roosevelt has authorized the Isthmian Canal Commission to buy any and all materials and ships required for the Panama Canal in the markets of the world wherever the price invites.

It is urged that iron and steel could be bought abroad cheaper than in the United States, and even the best products of the steel foundries of this country could be had at lower figures after they had been shipped out of its borders. The President consulted Secretary Taft, and found that he agreed in the purpose to buy where the best material at the lowest price could be had. This, it was held, was the duty of the Commissioners as faithful servants of the Government.

It was announced on the 19th inst. that no foreign-built ships will be purchased at present for use in connection with the work on the Panama Canal, and no materials for the canal construction will be bought in foreign countries beyond such as may be required for immediate use.

The most productive oil well in America is said to be one recently drilled at Butler, in this State. Its production has been increased from 100 to 150 barrels per hour by "shooting" it.

The steamer Kingstonian, which recently arrived at this port, brought an assortment of birds and animals collected chiefly in Africa, and consigned to a dealer in this city. The complete list of birds, beasts and reptiles which survived the voyage is given as follows: 1000 canaries, 74 goldfinches, 66 hulfaltnes, 16 cickins, 28 linnets, 20 Blue Mountain lories, 400 Australian paroquets, 25 bearded paroquets, 10 Rosella paroquets, 10 Barnard paroquets, 6 Indian woodpeckers, 4 macaws, 40 snakes, 1 squirrel, 5 wildcats, 2 young leopards, 160 monkeys.

The Coroner's jury, investigating the wreck on the Pennsylvania Railroad in South Harrisburg, on the 11th inst., returned a verdict exonerating the Pennsylvania Railroad from any blame for the disaster, giving the cause of the accident the equipment of freight trains with only 50 per cent. of airbrakes, and advocating an investigation by the proper authorities for the purpose of establishing proper regulations for brakes on freight trains, so that similar accidents might be avoided.

A heavy frost occurred on the night of the 20th inst., in the neighborhood of Egg Harbor City, N. J.

The Standard Oil Company is engaged in completing a pipe line for oil extending from Kansas to Bayonne, N. J.

The recent strike of teamsters in Chicago, which has caused much rioting and disorder in that city appears to have been a "sympathetic" one. It is stated that the teamsters were satisfied with their wages and hours; the unions were recognized; there was no dispute; but in an evil hour some irresponsible person put the heads of the teamsters to test.

On the 17th inst. the 20th Month, 1905, a disputation between garment workers who had had a dispute with their employers in the Eleventh Month, 1904. Large wholesale and retail firms which used only union labor; firms which had no dispute with their teamsters, but, on the other hand, were on terms of the closest amity with the unions, were told that the teamsters should not under any pretext deliver goods bought before the strike to any firm whose teamsters had struck. In many instances the firms thus boycotted have not on their part any dispute with their workmen. There have been fresh outbreaks of disorder in the city, and marauding attempts have been made to end the strike by conferences between the opposing parties.

FOREIGN.—It is said that Russia has a third fleet, including two new battleships, practically ready to sail for the Far East.

A despatch from St. Petersburg, of the 16th, says: An Imperial receipt issued to-day modifies the restrictive clauses in nine of the western gubernias, Russia, giving to the Roman Catholic Church freedom for acquiring, alienating lands and purchasing landed properties and industrial premises, permitting schools to instruct in Polish and Lithuanian languages.

A later despatch says: Almost at one sweep the whole burden of the vexatious restrictive laws in Poland and Baltic provinces have been removed, and the privileges of the assemblies of the Polish nobles are re-established and all the harsh administrative measures introduced at the time of the policy of reaction and Russification are abolished, unless later, for purposes of state, after the recommendation of the Council of State, they suffer imperial sanction.

A prominent liberal, who is especially interested in the Polish question, declared that the latest receipt, together with the receipt on religious toleration, would go far toward the settlement of the most burning political problems in Poland and the Baltic provinces and produce an era of better feeling than had prevailed in Poland for half a century.

It is stated that statistics show in fifty years the average height of British men has increased one inch. The present average height of a man of 20 years, is 5 feet 8 inches.

Russia has named terms upon which the present tariff restrictions against American products can be removed and a country profited by the most favored nation clause.

It is stated that the recent report of the librarian of the Imperial Library at Tokio shows that there is little demand for light literature in that capital, for fiction of any sort, contrary to the experience of most of the popular libraries of England, France and America. The Japanese prefer books on science, mathematics, medicine, health and what may be termed the graver forms of literature. More than 40 per cent. of the works taken out of the Imperial Library are of this character.

A despatch of the 17th from Toronto, says: The first conviction of a Christian Scientist in Canada was recorded at the village of Trent last night. The defendant was charged with wilfully conspiring, to deprive a man of proper medical care and nursing, whereby his death was caused.

Since the expiration in the Twelfth Month last of the treaty between the United States and China, which excluded Chinese from this country, efforts have been made to negotiate a new treaty, but the officials in China is said to be so strong in opposition to a new exclusion treaty that at present efforts in that direction have been abandoned. In the mean time the treaty made in 1880 remains in force which provided that the limitation or suspension of Chinese immigration to the United States "shall be reassessed and shall apply to the Chinese who are natives of the United States; laborers, other classes not being included in the limitation."

There are manufactories in Germany and Spain where thread similar in appearance to cotton thread, is made from wood pulp. The strength of this fibre is less than half that of cotton, but it is thought that in some fabrics it may be used to great advantage. The Chinese in Japan it is said, one person in twenty is more or less a fisherman, and fish appears in some form upon the table of every Japanese family daily, if not at every meal. The annual value of the water products is now about thirty million dollars. Half a million tons are engaged in fish-taking. Almost a million tons are professional fishermen and one million and four hundred thousand more give part of the time to fishing. Only one hundred and fifty thousand men are so employed in this way in the whole United States.

DIED, Second Month 5th, 1905, at her home, near Barville, Ohio, SARAH D. SHAW, daughter of the late Peabody and Phyllis Soars, in the fifty-first year of her age; member and overseer of Stillwater Monthly and Partion Meeting. Although in delicate health for the past few years, and thus prevented from mingling much with her friends, she was known to many through her occasional poetical contributions to THE FRIEND and the Friend. Her possession of more than ordinary talent was concerned to experience their consecration to service of Christ, in whose steps it was her desire to walk not only in her station as a member of our Society, but in her quiet and beautiful home life, where the graces of her devout Christian character were most conspicuous. She bore a tedious illness and much severe suffering with patience and a sweet resignation to the Divine Will, contemplated her approaching dissolution with calmness, being favored with a sweet evidence of gracious acceptance. A Friend would add, "Blessed are the pure heart, for they shall see God."

Third Month 25th, 1905, in West Chester, MARY ANN TEMPLE, in the thirty-third year of her age; and was the daughter of the late Norris and Susan Temple; a member of Birmingham Monthly Meeting Friends.

At Burlington, N. J., on Third Month 23rd, 1905, ROWLAND J. DUTTON, in the seventy-second year of age; a much loved member of Burlington Monthly Meeting Friends. His daily life bore witness to his concern to maintain a conscience void of offense toward God and man. His Christian rectitude in business transactions was a continual and appreciated example in community. His friends and relatives and the church feel that, although they sadly miss him, he has gone to the better country where the pure in heart shall be with God.

At his residence near Bloomfield, Prince Edward Co., Ontario, Canada, Fifth Month 12th, 1905, EDWIN BOWERMAN, (formerly HAIGHT), wife of Levi V. Bowerman, in the seventieth year of her age. A member of West Lake Monthly and Four Month Meeting Friends. Our dear Friend was firmly attached to the doctrine and principles of ancient Friends and consented to uphold them by a consistent life and conversation. Thirty-seven years of her life were spent caring for and young with three, and most of the time four generations in the family. After about three years of illness, which greatly increased toward the end and which she faithfully bore, only wishing to be released, she peacefully passed away without a struggle.

Shall the Dust Praise Thee?

The dust of John Paul Jones has been well praised to be "no better than any other" and so, as dust, is that of William Penn. The former can be gotten to America in a war-ship, but the latter, by consent of its customs, could not in any ship. Though the same composition, the two dusts represent opposite principles; though both be accounted as representing patriotism, it is a patriotism of opposite methods.

That which is needed of William Penn can come to America, even to his once cherished city, Philadelphia, as much needed, as dust is not,—that is, the spirit which animated his holy character and in government. The latter-day grieving of his righteous name, and putting his image, though exalted above our civic temple, to an open shame in the monuments below, may well re-invoke the aspiration which he once made over Philadelphia: "Oh, that thou mayst be kept from the dust that would overwhelm thee; that faithful to God thy mercies in the life of righteousness thou mayst be preserved to the end. My prayer is to God that thou mayst stand in the midst of trial, that thy children may be blessed of the Lord, and thy people saved by his power!"

For unscrupulousness nothing fails like success. Its series of temporary triumphs, stroke after stroke, are forging the sword of its suicide. The more one wins by iniquity, the fiercer he makes himself. Becoming dead to the low moral sense, he is found obtuse to the moral sense of others. This he sooner or later, some further deed of darkness, outrages, and in the rude awakening which the community gives him, is surprised to find that the moral blindness of the people has not kept pace with his own. But whether it be the people or some other agency that becomes the executive of Divine law, the law is unrelenting that "as ye sow, so shall ye reap."

Though we observe it with some satisfaction, it is not the fullest that where the people or their representatives are not sensitive enough to the highest considerations,—for purity and virtue against vice and immorality,—they become readily sensitive to coarser grounds of protest. The same party who could not be disowned where winking at sin and licentiousness was the moral concern, can now be summarily discharged, amidst acclamations of popular approval, on an issue of financial policy. To integrity affecting dollars and cents the popular mind can be sensitive, when it has not yet reached the same standard towards honesty with the Spirit of God, who, without purity of heart, cannot be seen. But honesty in the one application is from the same spirit with that in the other, and so we take satisfaction wherever we see it applied. "That is not first" in a community's development "which is spiritual, but that which is natural,—and afterwards that which is spiritual." "If, therefore, ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches? And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?"

The dust of a privateer noted for preying on the private property of men, may come to America. We are sorry should any municipal piracy mark hers as congenial soil. For apart from its imputation or motive of patriotism in its own field, privateering would be all one with piracy. But for looters of a city, though under legal form, we cannot claim that grace. Where governments are administered for the benefit, not of the governed, but of the secret managers, these are the pirates. And though their nature is exposed only on a financial side, yet this begins to open the way for a clearing of the seas in righteousness.

But some trace of the dust of Zion still comes to us in the words of William Penn, who, being dead, yet speaks: "They who would serve the public must have public minds; else they will serve private ends at public cost." What is the truly public, all-embracing mind but "the mind of Christ?" The heart converted into his Spirit is a purifying agency at the root and at the fruit of every public ill. Though one Christ-like heart be but a single cell in the tissue of the body politic, its germ of Christ may multiply, as from vessel to vessel, till the whole lump is leavened. May the spores of the small dust of the sanctuary emanate from many in the spirit of William Penn among us, and his holy experiment be found "holy still."

The church has need of deep, unremitting watchfulness, lest in an anxiety to be supported by the money of the natural man, she tends to cater to the religion of the natural man.

The more our ministers are beguiled by sympathy to pander to the lust for words, the more rapidly they prepare the itching ear to hire a ministry of words.

"The corrupting influence of worldly associations," or the purifying influence of heavenly associations,—choose which to serve. Wilt thou be a daily associate of Christ, or a friend of the spirit of the world? Follow Him afar off, and so deny Him: or follow Him in close fellowship, and this will be a denial of the world, the flesh and the devil.

The Word of God.

William L. Pearson, commenting in Western Work on a book of one Dr. Burrell, thus writes:—

The long-continued custom of calling the Holy Scriptures the Word of God is to be regretted. The Book of books (the Bible, from the plural biblia) is nowhere called collectively the Word, nor even the Written Word, nor does Christ ever so designate them. They contain hundreds of Divine messages, or words of God, inspired and profitable, making wise unto salvation, complete unto every good work. In Scripture "the Word of God" means: first, Christ the Eternal Word who became the Incarnate; secondly, an inspired discourse or proclamation of truth, as the "Word of God," or "Word of the Gospel;" thirdly, any, however brief, divinely authorized message impressed upon a man by the Holy Spirit either directly or independently, from Scriptures or other source, or more commonly through human agency. Such a "Word" is living, active, penetrating. It is the "sword of the Spirit" in the hand of the gospel-clad soldier. It represents the Greek krema, God's simple, definite word directed to the heart. The use of the "Word" for the whole Bible or for any book veils in a measure the glorious face of Christ and blunts His Gospel message, as it frequently does the faithful message of the book under review, which [except for that blemish] the writer cordially recommends as most useful.

OF "THE FRIEND,"
The Grave of Morgan.

The following poem, which I have never seen in print, I find in a manuscript collection of Whittier's early poems, in the possession of his cousin, Ann Wendell, of Philadelphia. It is a political curiosity, being a reminiscence of the excitement caused by the mystery of the disappearance of William Morgan, in the vicinity of Niagara Falls, in 1826. It was written in 1830, three years before Whittier became especially active in the anti-slavery cause. He was then working in the interest of Henry Clay as against Jackson, and the Whigs had adopted some of the watchwords of the Anti-Masonic party.

Wild torrent of the lakes! fling out
Thy mighty wave to breeze and sun,
And let the rainbow curve above
The foldings of thy cloud of doom.
Uplift thy earthquake voice, and pour
Its thunder to the reeling shore,
Till caverned cliff and hanging wood
Roll back the echo of thy flood.
For there is one who slumbers now
Beneath thy bow-encircled brow,
Whose spirit hath a voice and sign
More strong, more terrible than thine.

A million hearts have heard that cry
Ring upward to the very sky;
It thunders still—it cannot sleep,
But louder than the troubled deep,
When the fierce spirit of the air
Hath made his arm of vengeance bare,
And wave to wave is calling loud
Beneath the veiling thunder-cloud;
That potent voice is sounding still—
The voice of unrequited ill.

Dark cataract of the lakes! thy name
Unholy deeds have linked to fame.
High soars to heaven thy giant head,
Even as a monument to him
Whose cold unheeded form is laid Down, down amid thy caverns dim,
His requiem the fearful tone
Of waters falling from their throne
In the mid-air, his burial shroud
The wreathings of thy torrent-cloud,
His blazonry the rainbow thrown Superbly round thy brow of stone.

Aye, raise thy voice,—the sterner one
Which tells of crime in darkness done,
Groans upward from thy prison gloom
Like voices from the thunder's home,
And men have heard it, and the might
Of freemen rising from their thrall
Shall drag their fetters into light,
And spurn and trample on them all,
And vengeance long—too long delayed—
Shall rouse to wrath the souls of men,
And freedom raise her holy head
Above the fallen tyrant then.

The above poem, and the paragraph introductory to it, are taken from the new book, "Whittier-Land," descriptive of the Haverhill-Amesbury neighborhood, compiled by Samuel T. Pickard, author of the biography of the poet, in two volumes. The poem is deserving of a place in Whittier's authorized works, as well for its phrases descriptive of the beauty and grandeur of the great cataract, as for the topical importance of the more immediate subject matter relative to the martyred victim of Freemasonry. Why it was not included in the original collection of "Poems of Freedom" may never be known. The same language, applied a little later to the forbidden cause of the Africans in bondage, Whittier here forcefully uses in characterization of the shackles of the oath-bound secret lodge. Young as he was, he thus surely apprehended the peril which menaced his fellow-men from the side of "the hidden empire." Read again the last section of the poem, and then turn to the "Lines written on reading the message of Governor Ritter, of Pennsylvania" (against freemen catching fugitives from slavery), composed six years later, and observe the similarity of sentiment. It should be noted that the word "vengeance" is to be interpreted according to the Scripture, "Vengeance is mine: I will repay, saith the Lord," for the whole animus of the poem is plainly against that manner of murderous reprisal which had been aimed at a brother whose soul rebelled against the imprecatory oaths of the secret lodge—so like, indeed, to those of the Endowment Order of Mormonism, recently revealed to the nation and the world at large.

["The Grave of Morgan," it is probable, will be better understood by many, upon reading the following narrative of facts taken from the writer's booklet entitled "Secret Societies: an Inquiry into their Character and Tendencies" (Phila., 1888, 45 pages) not at present in print.]

The first formal revelation of Masonry in this country is stated to have been made by William Morgan, of Batavia, New York (a seceder from the order) who, in the year 1826, published a pamphlet entitled "Illustrations in Masonry," in which the ceremonies of initiation and the obligations of the first three degrees were disclosed. For this publication, Morgan was abducted by Freemasons, confined in the magazine of the United States fort, at Niagara, and from thence taken in a boat, and, as is alleged, drowned in the Niagara River. Miller, the publisher of Morgan's book, was also forcibly carried off, but the citizens of Batavia, being apprised of the violent procedure, pursued the kidnappers, and finally rescued the prisoner.

As a result of Morgan's exposure, and the excitement upon the subject thence following, probably nine-tenths of the fifty thousand Masons then in the United States, turned their backs upon the lodge to enter it no more. Although the number of the adherents of the lodge at that time may not seem to have been dangerously great [Myron Holley estimates that there were some thousands more than above given], yet they even then were found to boast that the civil offices of the country were largely in their hands. Finney remarks, "I do not recollect a magistrate, or a constable, or a sheriff, in the county [where I resided] that was not at that time a Freemason." The adverse combination was years in the locality where Morgan had been abducted, that the fact of the murder was never judicially proven so as to fasten it upon the alleged perpetrators—courts, sheriffs, witnesses, jurors, seemed struck with an inability to do anything in the premises. Likewise, the newspapers fell into a similar conspiracy of silence, and refusing generally to publish the disclosures, it was found necessary to establish other newspapers for that purpose.

In 1826, an encampment of Knight Templars at Leroy, New York, after a protracted debate between the members, concluded to close all the tenets of the order, including twelve degrees of masonry beyond the first three revealed by Morgan. Several months later eighteen others were added, making thirty-three in all that were then revealed. A committee, of whom the late Thurlow Wever was one, reported the following year that New York State four hundred initiates had publicly denounced the institution, and thousands had silently withdrawn.

Meanwhile, Freemasonry became an issue politics, the Anti-Masonic movement culminating in a National Convention, held in Philadelphia, in 1830. It was attended by 100 hundred and twelve delegates, among whom were Amasa Walker, William H. Seward, Thaddeus Stevens. They issued an "Address to the People of the United States," which appears to have been attended with good results. Chief Justice Marshall writing Edward Everett (1833) that he had not attended a lodge for thirty or forty years, got on to say: "I thought it, however, a harmless plaything, which would live its hour and pass away; until the murder or abduction of Morgan was brought before the public. That atrocious crime, and I had almost said, still more atrocious suppression of the testimony concerning it, demonstrated the absurdity of which the oaths prescribed by the order were susceptible, and convinced me that the institution ought to be abandoned as one capable of producing much evil, and incapable of producing any good which might not be effected by safe and open means."

Too Much Publicity.

Most young men are weakened by publicity too much social fellowship. They may have any time alone. In the morning dress as rapidly as they can and then rush into the work of the day. When the time release from work or business comes, they hurry with the crowd to seek enjoyment, the evening they come in late and drop to bed. There has been not one hour in the when they could sit down and be calm, think of God and duty and let their souls grow strong and grave. Doubtless, there are many young men who are too much alone who brood over themselves and whose needless meditation and more society. But they are the rarer men. The average young man runs with the crowd, and his life shallows more and more until the bottom begins show through and the power, the beauty, the freshness, the capacity for various uses are gone. Men ought to stop now and then think. If John the Baptist had not been years in the wilderness he would probably never have burst on Israel with a prophetic message of such power and persuasion as uttered when he came. One of Hugh Beau favorite quotations was:

"If chosen men had never been alone
In deep mid-silence open-doored to God,
No greatness ever had been dreamed or done

Account of Lucy Choppin, Widow of John Choppin, the Son of Jos Choppin of Stebbing's Essex.

From an ancient manuscript preserved in Friends' Conference Library, Devonshire House, London, N.P.1

She was Religiously inclined from her Youth, born in Worcestershire, and her Name was formerly Wiat, and as I have heard her relate, a Soberly, and religiously educated by her Mother, (who was of a great Age, & I tell her of the hard Sufferings, that many of her Family had went through, for their Religion in Queen Marys Days; she was of a perfect Memory and could walk a Furlong, and had a Needle, within two weeks before she died, which was in the hundred and fourteenth year of her Age) & she then was left to the care of an Uncle who was a Puritan, and used to give her very good advice, and she gave her Charge to shun all bad Company, and go to hear the best Men that she could, and be sure never learn to Dance, or wear Ribbons or Lace on her Cloaths, nor to sing or read a Ballad, all which she shunned; I have heard her say, it was good for her that she was so warned, and that she had advised her uncle to mind it. She came to London at y<sup>e</sup> time the Civil wars were, and was in a religious Family, but they wanted her to learn to sing Psalms, but that she would not do; and after a years Service, she returned into Worcestershire, & there being a Meeting that were then going to New England, she was Inclined to go, thinking all that went were good Religious People, and it must be a pleasant living in such a Land, where they were all such, she spoke her mind to one who was Accounted a Worthy man, who had been a Preacher, his name was Vavesor Powell, when she told him that it was on a religious account that she inclined to go, he said to her, that the Word was near her, in her heart, and Month that she might hear it, and obey it, and she need not go beyond the Sea, for that, this stopped her Journey; and she being still earnest to go, to hear those Teachers that were Accounted Gifted Men, she went several times hear Humphrey Smith, and was much Affected, he having an excellent Gift, & did not think it Lawfull to take any money, for Preaching that which was freely given him, and he being at a Meeting sat a great while Silent at w<sup>h</sup> the congregation wondered, when he stood up he said to them, that he formerly had spake what he Opened to him but now my Mouth is opened, and I believe, when ever it please the Lord to open it again, it will be more to his glory than ever it hath been; this made her very desirous to learn where he went and in a little time it pleased the Lord, to send one of these Servants, (Called a Quaker) by whom Humphrey Smith was more fully Convinced, and also Lucy Wiat & in a little time it pleased the Lord to Concern him in the Ministry, and he travelled through several Counties, came into Essex to Stebbing, to John Choppin, and returning again through the West, was imprisoned, as were Abundance of Friends, Lucy Wiat then Visited them, & went from Prison to another, as she had service to do for many of them, these being hardly any of them from having some of the Lords Ministers (Called Quakers) in them and some others that were Zealous, among whom was Vavesor Powell before mentioned, with whom Lucy Wiat had some discourse, and told him, he had prevented her going to New England; but she found him short, of Adhearing to that word he had spoke to her of, and told him that the Lord, had made her wiser than those who had been her Teachers, he had much to say, but wanted the Powerful work of the word, w<sup>h</sup> he had Advised her to regard, and in a while he took the Oath so was released out of Prison, but Humphrey Smith, having partly agreed w<sup>h</sup> a friend in Essex to take his Son Apprentice the Men friends being Generally Impressed Lucy and his Son Came on foot, taking John Choppins house for a sort of Home, as his Father had done, Lucy stayed some time, till he was bound and settled, with Henry Abbot Earls Couln in Essex; then she returned through London, Visiting the Prisoners and doing what was necessary, as mending and making for them, many being far from their Homes, she went and Visited their families, and Constantly Attended the Yearly meeting in London, so that many years she spent in that service which was then very Acceptable to those that could not have Liberty to see their Families themselves, & great was her Labour of Love in that she did it freely and walked always on foot.

After Humphrey Smith was released out of Prison he visited Friends and travelled much, and was desirous to come up into Essex, but after a Meeting at Alton in Hampshire, was taken and Carried to Winchester Prison, where after about a years Imprisonment, he laid down his Life in Perfect Peace and recommended y<sup>e</sup> Care of his Son to Lucy Wiat who came from y<sup>e</sup> following Yearly Meeting in London to see him, and having Occasion to stay some time, took John Choppins of Stebbing, for her home as formerly, and when her service for him was over, she returned into Worcestershire, and Acquainted his Mother and Sister, (who lived in Hertfordshire) of his being well Inclined, &c. & about the time of his Apprenticeship being out, she came into Essex, to Stebbing again to see after him, and he having taken John Choppins for a home, did Effectually make it so, in a bout a years time by taking Elizabeth Choppin y<sup>e</sup> daughter of John Choppin aforesaid to Wife, & John Choppin his Son did Likewise take Lucy Wiat to Wife both in one Day, but he said John Choppin, lived but about two years after with her after his death she lived with Humphrey Smith and was mostly with us for Twenty Eight Years being very Serviceable in the Family, and had a great Care over our Children when Young, & tho I do not remember that ever she struck any of us a blow, yet we stood in as much Awe of her, as Father or Mother, and she had us all at a word, and if she bid us do anything, we always did it with Readyness, or we must not do anything for her; She was Really a Mother in Israel, of a good Understanding, and would constantly visit those in Affliction, to whom she had a word of Advice, and Comfort oftentimes, and she not only visited those that were afflicted either in Body or mind, Rich or Poor, but she also Visited those who had been Convinced of the blessed Truth & grew Careless and she would warn them, and Exhort them to Faithfulness, w<sup>h</sup> mostly had a good Effect, she was wise in advising, Tender in Admonishing, Gentle in her Exhortation, yet sharp in reproving and faithful in warning so that she often reach'd y<sup>e</sup> witness in those she discoursed with, and made the Tall Cedars to bow and the Sturdy Oaks to bend, Inasmuch that I have heard some say she made them shed Tears, that no Mortal ever had done before by any discourse. She was not only a Constant, but Early goer to Meetings, and about two weeks before her Death walked six Miles to a Meeting, and she told me her Chief end in going thither, was to Call and Visit a woman that was eaten up with y<sup>e</sup> Cares of this world, whom she advised, & warn'd to get out to Meeting, and seek better Treasure, and more Durable Riches w<sup>h</sup> would stand her instead in a Dying hour w<sup>h</sup> had a good Effect on her, so that she did get out to Meetings several times after it, and did not Live long after. My Aunt, who was taken ill, in her return home the next day from the Meeting, and she said I cannot say, that w<sup>h</sup> I feared is come upon me but that w<sup>h</sup> I have Long'd for I am very ill, & do think it will be my End but it will be well with me, I shall go to my Mansion, w<sup>h</sup> is prepared for me and all the followers of the Lamb, & I have nothing to do but to die, y<sup>e</sup> Lord hath been with me even as with Jacob when I knew it not, and Blessed be his Name, He hath been with me, and made known y<sup>e</sup> way of Life and Salvation to me, and preserved me through many Exercises, and Deep Afflictions, & Sorrowfull Travels in Spirit He hath been w<sup>h</sup> me through my Pilgrimage, and kept me safe through many Long Journeys in w<sup>h</sup> I have walked many Hundreds of Miles, to serve my Friends in the truth and for y<sup>e</sup> Truths sake (and mostly alone) & the Lord preserved me, so that none were suffered to do me any harm for w<sup>h</sup> I have often been Humbly thankful, and now I feel Peace, and shall in a little time rest with him in Everlasting Joy and Peace; at another time she said, "it is good to have nothing to do but to die, for now I find it hard to bear the Pains and Sickness of this body she often Expressed her Concern for the Churches, that good order might be kept up, and for the Poor, for whom she always had a great Care and one day there came a topping woman with a Relation to see her, to whom she spoke for a great while, & Advis'd her to prepare for such a time telling her, She had Peace, and that was more worth than all the Pleasures in this world, and advised her to mind the Gift or Manifestation of the Spirit, w<sup>h</sup> would lead her in y<sup>e</sup> way of Life and Peace, the woman being filled with Admiration, said, she never heard the Like before, that any Person could have such a Satisfaction, and Victory over Death, that there is no Terror, or Fear of Death in her, to whom Lucy Choppin answered, perfect Love Casteth out Fear, I have loved the Lord with all my Heart and served him with all my strength, and I have Peace y<sup>e</sup> Lord is with me, and It will be a Glorious Change; and much more she spoke to her & to several Friends as they came to see her, and also spake to one (called a Muggletonian) that had Cursed her and said she should be afraid of Damnation, Concerning w<sup>h</sup> she said, it is false, for I have never had any such fear since that day, but the Lord hath been with me in many hard Afflictions, and given me hope w<sup>h</sup> have been an Anchor to my Soul He hath (I can say with David) plucked my feet out of the Mire and Clay, and set them upon a Rock and I shall not be moved. She growing weak, and having very sick fainting fits the day before she died, I offered her something to Comfort her, she said I want nothing, the Lord is with me & his spirit comforts me I have Bread to Eat the world knows not of, and y<sup>e</sup> wine of the Kingdom refresheth me and I desire no more of this, so do not Endeavour to keep me here, for to Die will be my gain and tho' this Body grows weak my Inward Man grows strong, & she gave me seasonable Advice, and said it is good to be Faithfull to the Lord. He is with me, and I have an earnest of that Enjoyment, I shall in a little time Launch into a full Enjoyment off—

She departed this Life in great Peace (being Sensible to y<sup>e</sup> Last) the 6 mo. 5th day 1705, & was buried in Friends burying Ground at Stebbing, the 10th of the same, where was a large Meeting.

Modern Mammonism.

I was urging a man to send his daughter to college, and he said he was perfectly willing to do it if he could have any assurance that she would not marry as soon as she got her education, and "throw it all away." Says B. M. Bogard, in the "Baptist Flag": "His idea of an education was the commercial one, a commodity, which can be used for making money. If his daughter would use her education by teaching, or engaging in some business, and by it make money, he was willing to educate her, but if she married he could see no use in her being educated. In fact, it would be throwing her education away.

College men go out drumming for students, and they tell the young men that if they will educate themselves, they can get a good position and make several times as much money as they can make without an education. Young preachers are encouraged to go to college because, with a college education, they can get a church that will pay a large salary. Instead of telling the young preacher that a college education will enable him to be more useful, he has a money consideration held out to him.

"He has been a successful schoolman. He took the school when it was run down. He has put up a large dormitory, improved the main building, beautified the campus, and he closed the last year with a balance in the treasury."

I actually heard this said of a college man. His ability as a schoolman was measured by his ability to get and use money. What he did for his students, what they learned was not even worthy of mention. If he could build dormitories and beautify the campus, what is the difference even if the students learn nothing?

Reports of pastors concerning their work generally runs about as follows:

"Pastor Hustler of Richtown has enjoyed a successful year's work. The church contributed $1500 for missions, built a new parsonage, costing $2,000, paid the pastor's salary in full, and the prospect is that greater things will be done next year. Several wealthy members have been received during the year. The best people in the town attend this church."

At the Southern Baptist Convention a few years ago the pastor who had pulled the largest amount of money out of his church was given a special seat on the platform, and the money worshippers did him honor by making a great parade about it.

In that church were millionaires whose ill-gotten wealth, one a wholesale liquor dealer, ought to have caused those who were making the parade, to blush for shame. But the widow with her pure heart, noble impulses and two mites was forgotten, while the praises of the worldly-minded were sung!

Money rightly used is a blessing, but elevated to the position in which commercialism has placed it, the love of it becomes a great monster of modern times.—Safeguard.

Head Religion and Heart Religion.

There are two religions in the world. One is head religion, which is, and always was very popular; the other is heart religion, and is rarely met with, because perhaps its possessors, conscious of their frailty and weakness, retire into themselves and shrink from outward profession.

When Christ came in the flesh He found the religious world consisting, his disciples excepted, almost wholly of head religionists, full of forms, ceremonies, rites, scripture quotations, temple worship, prayers, charities, tithing, payings and fastings; full of wise, prudent, and learned men—Doctors, Rabbis, Scribes, High Priests and Priests.

Christians of our day have other names, but have the same natures exactly, and strive to do the same things—they aspire to a learned ministry, thinking the best scholars make the best divines. Their worshipers are a continual round of entertainment, their motive often being to please the people and get their esteem and pay, and to do that they must amuse their hearers with music, singing, chanting, intellectual prayers and eloquent sermons. Some preach for hire, well knowing the people love to have it so. But with all their religious services they do not excel the religious people of the Saviour's day, either in devotion or personal sacrifices.

But when Jesus came He seemed to turn all these things upside down, and reverse them. His words were few, and simplicity itself. His teaching was free; his raiment little more than a sheet, with a girdle to bind it round. He was moneyless, friendless, and homeless. His disciples were not much better, and as to learning, or wisdom, or intelligence, they were amongst the lowest orders.

Little wonder the learned and wealthy people despised Him and crucified Him. All his doings and sayings were, by contrast, the opposite of theirs. They called Him the carpenter's son, quoted records to show nothing good ever came out of Nazareth, and said He had a devil, and was mad. The fact is they were practising head religion, and He simply introduced heart religion, or an inward life with God, as the real and genuine religion which alone his Father would accept. He taught his disciples to love not their friends only but their enemies; to do good to those who did them evil, and to pray for those who spoke against and persecuted them; to rejoice in tribulations; to be poor and humble in spirit, and instead of fighting or going to war, to turn the other cheek to be smitten also. He told them not to lay up treasures on earth but in Heaven, for where their treasure was, there would be their heart also. He told them when they preached the Gospel to do it freely, because freely they had received it, and when their ministry was accepted, to proclaim peace to that house.

Such were Christ's samples of his new heart religion.

His language to mankind was—My son, give me thine heart! Whether worshipping, giving, or whatever be done to please God let it be all done in secret, in and by the heart and then his Father, who seeth in secret would reward them openly. He asked professors how it was possible they could believe when they received honour one of another, sought not the honour which cometh from God only?

Take stock of the two hundred religions sects in our day, and see if you can truthfully say they are practising Christ's heart religion. Is it not head religion, based on the false light of reason or priestcraft. But it may be asked, Why is heart religion so good, and preferred before a learned and eloquent exposition of bible passages, appealing to the reason and intelligence of the congregation? Because such may exist in the highest perfection without the speaker's heart co-operating. It goes into the heart, so it passes into the draught.

The heart means that central place within man where the spirit of God is to be found. He is to be found everywhere in nature, and can admire his wonderful works, but so far man is concerned, God is only to be found individually within man, knocking at the door of his heart. The heart represents man's affections, his free will, and his eternal soul. Christ said, to love God with all the heart, the sum of all the law (and gospel, too).

But the heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. Why then turn to it? Because man's fall and malady was inward malady, a heart disease, and where to bane, the mischief is, there also must be the antidote, the remedy. Nothing outward cures an internal poison, so God has placed His Spirit, His Light, in this dark place, or heart, which although small at first will, if heeded, shine more and more, until the day dawn, as the day star arise in our hearts; until the sun Light in our heart, compared to a grain of mustard seed, shall take root, and grow, and become a power, which shall turn out the strong man once having possession of our heart, and become a great and good tree of righteousness, that fowls may lodge in its branches.

Head religion lives and thrives in rituals and outward display; in subtleties and sophistries, and learned disquisitions; in the use of long, refined and complex words and sentences not understood by the common people; in interpretations of the Bible by human judgment only; in philanthropic deeds to give sanctity to their lives.

But their whole tendency is to place religion outside and not inside the people. God at distance, Christ in Heaven above, at the right hand of God. Salvation by imputation. Atonement effected by an outward confession and outward works. Ministers in all their teaching disperse, scatter, and contradict the idea of central power at home, in man, in his heart, which is able to save to the uttermost all who to it. They dissipate and dispel the light, that Immanuel is God with us, God in that God's grace, appearing to all men, for salvation, and is the one true teacher of religion or righteousness.

Jesus in gathering his disciples did other things. He touched their hearts, their affections, their wills, almost without words. Had He spoken in skillful language, they would not have understood Him, for they were unlearned and ignorant. But their hearts were attracted and opened, they had the true Faith, which is the gift of God; they felt his Divinity, and when He said "follow me," they left all and followed to the end, which was less than three years. Jesus on leaving them said, I go! but let not your hearts be troubled, nor yet afraid. My Father I give you, and leave with you, which gives all understanding. A peace the world cannot give, nor can it take it away. Although I go away, I will come again. The comforter, the spirit of truth, will come in my name, and will guide you, and teach you, and lead you into all truth, as ye are able to hear it. The Father cannot see this spirit, and therefore does not know, and cannot believe in me (the Comforter), but ye know me because I dwell with you, and shall be in you.

Large volumes and commentaries cannot express the true heart religion better than this short, simple lesson to his disciples. It is language plain and applicable to all mankind in all ages, every tongue, nation and people, however ignorant or illiterate. It is the everlasting gospel, the heart religion.

GEORGE FITT.

JAPANESE TESTIMONY TO GOSPEL LOVE. The boys had great curiosity to see this English lady, and not caring about Jesus, we did not go to see how everything looked, her dress, her books, her furniture, her pictures, but at the same time she would have us read the Bible. We had Gospel of Luke; soon we read till we came to crucifixion; she could not speak Japanese; she had English Bible, we had Bible in Japanese language.

When we read the story of cross, she got down on her knees and pray for us. We could not understand what she prayed, but we watched her face; soon she began to cry; then she fell on her face weeping bitterly. Then twenty-five Japanese boys cry too.

Then inside of three weeks all us twenty-five give our hearts to Jesus. She did not speak to us through our heads, she reached our hearts; and when you have Jesus in the heart, you will love. Some Japanese get head religion, but when it turns from their old religion, but when it comes, then all their head religion goes, they are left without any; but if they get the heart they become strong. Many of those twenty-five boys are evangelists and preachers. My father he kept a wine shop; soon I went to my mother to Jesus, and my business was given up. Then I lead many more people to Christ. It is not so necessary for the missionary have the language if she has the love of God for souls in her heart; it was what won those twenty-five boys; that was what won me; all because this woman who could not speak our language loved our souls." — S. S. Kimura.

To greater our power, the greater our love; if we walk not in the fear of the Lord.

A Visit to Algeria.

We mounted the adobe minaret of a mosque and had a glorious view of the mountains and the oasis, and looked down upon the roof life of the village. Such flashings of color as the women moved about! It was all so strange and like a dream. We came back through the section called the Ouled Nails, the region where the dancing girls go about the streets. They wear gorgeous and barbaric clothing, with enormous quantities of jewels. They are of course unveiled, for they make no profession of respectability. They come from remote desert tribes, stay for two or three years, and gain all the money they can. Then they return and are married immediately. The groups about these cafes are picturesque beyond comparison—but why try to describe them?

Perhaps nothing is quite so fascinating as the camels. Poor things, how they do hate to be loaded. How they do snarl and roar and show their teeth. I have tried to be friendly to so many, but they do scorn me so, turning up their noses and sneering at me with withering contempt. Even the baby camels do this; and then the donkeys. They are so cunning, and do have to carry such loads.

Every morning and evening the caravans leave and arrive just below our hotel. Sometimes they have come all the way from Tougourt, a hundred and more miles away across the desert. "The complaining camels," someone has said; and to realize the truth of this expression one must have been in some desert place and heard that bitter sound dominating all others, when morning and evening they are loaded and unloaded. Perfectly harmless, patient and pathetically submissive, their one revenge for being beasts of burden of the desert seems to be these loud and hideous plaints they utter. One morning we went in, as we often do, to the place where they are fed—big enclosures walled in by sun-dried bricks. One of the Arabs in attendance wanting to entertain us, made one of the camels, which was crouching on the ground, get up, then get down again, then repeat both actions. I wish you could have seen and heard him—the camel, I mean. He obeyed always, but did it with such a bad grace, howling cursing at us and his rider all the time, and showing his long teeth and sneering disdainfully. (Let me say right here that my mistakes must be forgiven. There are so many distractions about me as I write, it is hardly ever I get a moment alone.)

One afternoon since we came we had a rare treat. Saïti succeeded in getting for us the entrance into the home of the greatest woman of Biskra,—the sister of the Bach-agma, the ruler of the Sahara tribes. He made us understand that it had never been possible for him to do this for any one before, and at the hotel they told us that it was the rarest privilege. It was a house built like other native houses, only larger, with stables and a large garden. One room had a table and chairs in it. (The Arabs use no furniture, and need none in this land, where everyone lounges lazily in the sun.) We were met in the courtyard by a beautiful young man in a turban and elegant burnous, who was a nephew of the Bach-agma.

He spoke French perfectly, and we talked to him, and through him to the women. His mother and two aunts—one of them was beautiful, with beautiful eyes whose blackened lids made them shine almost supernaturally. They were all in brilliant colors, and wore many ornaments. We shook hands with them—expressed our great pleasure at meeting with them, at being permitted to penetrate into their home. They said they were very glad we had come. They told us their ages, and we told them ours. While coffee was being prepared we went to walk in the garden. The young man, Elhadj Mohamed ben Masseraï, talked fluently in French. He explained how dull was the life of their women, unable to travel, to see the world, to leave the enclosure of the garden. He himself had great desire to travel; he hoped to go to France to see Paris. We gave him our visiting cards, and I wrote Nantucket, Mass., U. S. A., on mine. He was intensely interested, pronounced it all over and over, made me explain what the names meant. Then coffee was served—the Arabian coffee we learned to like very much as soon as we came. The coffee is ground, or pounded, rather, to powder, browned with sugar, then the boiling water is poured over it. When served it is quite thick, but is delicious. As we sat sipping it, we smiled benignly on the gay ladies—told them how gladly we would talk with them if we only could. They expressed themselves very warmly in return. They shook hands, and we bowed ourselves out of their presence. As we left a beautiful girl in a bright green dress and yellow shawl, or haik, I should say, with much jewelry and the same brilliant eyes, was presented to us. It was Elhadj's sister, who was fourteen, and to be married in a few days.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

An Eighteenth Century Newspaper.

In direct contrast to the voluminous sheets comprising the daily paper of to-day is a copy of The Pennsylvania Evening Post and Daily Advertiser, dated "Thursday, October 2, 1783; Vol. IX., Numb. 939," and page "221, 222." It measures eight by ten inches, and was issued in "Philadelphia: Printed by Benjamin Towne, in Pewter Platter alley. Price only two shillings the month, at the rate of twelve coppers to the shilling; or two coppers the single paper." The quality of the paper is also in contrast to the flimsy material of the present day, being strong and tough enough to withstand the ravages of time. Its preservation apparently is owing to the chief article, covering two-and-a-half columns, an account of an aged Philadelphian, whose death in his one hundred and third year causes the comment written on the margin by my grandfather when sending the paper to her sister in England,—"Convincing proof that long life is not confined to our country."

The article in question is taken "From the New York Gazette of September 24, 1783." In quoting at some length, the change from long to short s is the only one made in the original copy.

"Reflections upon the life and death of Edward Drinker, of the city of Philadelphia, who died on the 17th of November, 1782, in the one hundred and third year of his age, written by a very ingenious literary gentleman of that city, for the amusement of a lady.

"Edward Drinker was born on the 24th of December, 1680, in a small cabin, near the present corner of Walnut and Second streets, in the city of Philadelphia. His parents came from a place called Beverly, in Massachusetts Bay. The banks of the Delaware, on which the city of Philadelphia now stands, were inhabited at the time of his birth by Indians and a few Swedes and Hollanders. He often talked to his companions of picking whortleberries, and catching rabbits, on spots now the most improved and populous of the city. He recollected the second time William Penn came to Pennsylvania, and used to point to the place where the cabin stood, in which he and his friends that accompanied him were accommodated upon their arrival. At twelve years of age he went to Boston, where he served his apprenticeship with a cabinet-maker. In the year 1745 he returned to Philadelphia with his family, where he lived until the time of his death. He was four times married, and had eighteen children, all of whom were by his first wife. At one time of his life he sat down at his own table with fourteen children. Not long before his death he heard of the birth of a grand-child to one of his grand-children, the fifth in succession to himself.

"He retained all his faculties till the last year of his life. Even his memory was but little impaired; . . . and so faithful was his memory to him, that his son informed me he never heard him tell the same story twice, but to different persons, and in different companies. His eyesight failed him many years before his death, but his hearing was uniformly perfect. . . . The character of this aged citizen was not summed up in his negative quality of temperance; he was a man of the most amiable temper, uniformly cheerful, and kind to everybody; his religious principles were as steady as his morals were pure; he attended public worship about thirty years in the rev. dr. Sprout's church, and died in a full affluence of a happy immortality.

"The life of this man is marked with several circumstances which perhaps have seldom occurred in the life of an individual; he saw the same spot of earth in the course of his life covered with woods and bushes, and the receptacle of birds and beasts of prey afterwards become the seat of a city not only the first in wealth and arts in the new, but rivaling in both many of the first cities in the old world. He saw regular streets where he once pursued a hare; he saw churches rising upon morasses where he had often heard the croaking of frogs; he saw wharfs and warehouses where he had often seen Indian savages fish from the river for their daily subsistence; and he saw ships of every size and use in those streams where he had often seen nothing but Indian canoes; he saw a stately edifice filled with legislators, astonishing the world with their wisdom and virtue, on the same spot probably where he had seen an Indian council fire; he saw the first treaty ratified between the newly confederated powers of America and the ancient monarchy of France, with all the formality and seals, on the same spot probably where he once saw William Penn ratify his first and last treaty with the Indians, without the formality of pen, ink or paper; he saw all the intermediate stages through which a people pass from the most simple to the most complicated degrees of civilization. He saw the beginning and the end of the empire of Great Britain in Pennsylvania."

Following the leading article there is news from the Supreme Court, the trial of four Genoese sailors for the murder of their captain; also two new attorneys admitted to the "court of common pleas." Items from the "Naval Office" of Sloops, Schooners, Ships and Brigs, "Inwards," "Outwards," and "Cleared."

The printer is a center of information for the advertisements; of him the reader may "inquire" when desiring an "apprentice to a genteel business;" or a "good cook and housemaid, proper recommendations expected," and, lastly, "a store in one of the best stands of the city to be let. If a single person takes it he may have board and lodging in the same house."

Prospective purchasers will also "inquire of the printer;" a lot on Almond street near Front street; a lot on Lombard street between Second and Third streets, each containing a brick or frame message. There is a "pasture" for sale, "on the west side of Wissahickon road, little more than a mile from the court-house, of four acres and twenty perches with a fine stream of water running through the middle." Also to be obtained, "Thirty-one acres on Greenwich island near the stone bridge."

After remaining for over a century in the one family, the present destination of this ancient sheet is among the archives collecting by the Friends' Historical Society, which was formed at the centenary of the Arch Street Meeting-house in Sixth Month, 1904.

SARAH CADBURY.

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In the Sixth Month of this year it was thought that a visit to the Indians by some members of the Committee, bearing a letter of counsel and advice, might be timely, and an address was accordingly prepared, which contains an urgent appeal upon the evils of intemperance, the disregard of the marriage covenant, and other subjects, and thus alludes to a divided state of feeling then existing among them. "Brothers, there is one thing which has greatly troubled us at this time, and that is to hear that you do not seem to be so united in feeling as you once were, and thus there is much strife and division among you, so that even your government has been divided, and two parties are now trying to carry it on. We cannot say who is in the right, but we greatly desire you may see that while this state of things lasts you cannot get along comfortably together. Harsh words will be said, and unkind thoughts felt towards one another, so that those who may have been good friends will come to hate each other and in this way the strife will go on, and spread throughout your people. Our blessed Saviour who so loved men everywhere that He came into this world to save us, has taught us that we should love even our enemies, forgive those who have wronged us, and bear with those who may differ from us, and He left us an example that we should walk in his steps.

May you and we therefore come to be more and more like Him, and then we may feel sure that as his good spirit rules in our hearts, shall have no comfort in strife and discord, when differences spring up we will do all our power to settle them and bring back peace and good feeling."

Among those who visited them at this time and had interviews in several places, in which this letter was read and interpreted, were Henry Wood, Ebenezer Worth and John Comfort. A Friend who was present at several of these interviews, writes as follows, undated of Ninth Month 10th, 1876, "Notwithstanding the dark cloud which appears to be over the prospects of this people in look towards the future . . . yet there are things to encourage us in laboring among them. (Friends Henry Wood and John S. Comfort, I have been favored at times, in speaking, in the view of the ministry, and the former has at times appeared in supplication, both in the religious opportunities at the Boarding School, and the (councils held on this Reservation. I have even in a particular manner, our hearts have been tendered together, in the evening collections: and J. S. C. preached the gospel so that many of the children were much affected; of which H. Wood knelt imploring the continuance of the mercies and protection of Heavenly Father upon those assembled. I have rarely seen more sobbing and weeping among children than on this occasion; and the caretakers of the Institution were also alluded to so that it seemed a renewed visitation of Divine love to the hearts of many present, and were, an owning of the labors of the Committee. After the meeting was over several of the girls desired to stay down stairs to have talk with Ebenezer, thus giving him an opportunity of relieving his mind to them, which has improved in a free, fatherly, and affectionate manner."

The Inner Attraction.

A famous lady who once reigned in Persia was so plain when she was a girl that her mother one day said, after gazing at her for a long time with a distressed expression, "My poor child, I fear it will be very hard for you to win love in this world—indeed, even to make friends!"

It was from that hour that the success of this woman, known to the world as Madame Circourt, dated. For a little time she was troubled sorely to heart. Then, humbly, sweetly and untriflingly, she began to be kind to the pauper children of her native village, to the servants of her household, to the birds that hopped about the garden wall. Nothing so distressed her as not to be able to render a service.

As the years wore on, her good-will to every one made her the idol of the great world, which was eventually her home. Although her complexion was sallow, her gray hair small and sunken, yet she held in devotedness her some of the most noted men of her time. Her life-long unselfishness and interest in others made her, it is said, irresistible, young and old forgot the plainness of her features in the loveliness of her life.

Count Tolstoy was so plain a boy that his mother said to him:

You know, Nikolinka, that no one will love for your face, and therefore you must endeavor to be a good and sensible boy." "Istoy said when he was an old man that through his life these words had helped to bring him true to what is most worth while in an character.

"I knew when my mother spoke them," he said, "that I should without fail become a noble boy."—Youth's Companion.

Questions of Conscience and the Law.

Germany recently private Menzel, of an infantry regiment at Metz, refused to perform military service on "Saturdays," on the ground that he is an Adventist of the Seventh-Day type. His colonel pointed out to him that duty to obey military orders is punishable, and if a military motive cause the refusal, a court-martial sentenced Menzel to imprisonment for twenty-three days, and a higher military court to which the case was appealed affirmed the verdict, but advised Menzel to appeal to the emperor for clemency.

Such controversies often occur. In 1780 Joseph Lee, distinguished in the South and in the East, one of the most eloquent of the preachers, the founder of Methodism in England, and subsequently chaplain of Congress of the United States, was drafted into the Revolutionary Army and compelled to go into camp. His conscience revolted against war, and his own account of the matter was this: "I weighed the matter over and over again, but my mind was settled; as a Christian and as a preacher of the gospel, I must not fight. I could not reconcile it to myself to bear arms, or to kill one of my fellow creatures. However, I determined to go, and I went in the Lord, and accordingly prepared for my journey." He was about two weeks away to camp. When he came in sight of the camp, he says, "I lifted up my heart to God and besought Him to take my cause into His hands and support me in the hour of need." He was ordered on parade. The sergeant offered him a gun, but he refused it. The lieutenant brought him another, but he refused that. The lieutenant reported the matter to the colonel and returned again with another gun and set it down against him; he still refused to take it, and was then delivered to the guard as a prisoner. The colonel came to the guard and expostulated with him, but Lee was quite unable to answer his objections, and the colonel ordered leaving him in custody. What followed then will certainly interest everyone.

He considered himself a soldier of the cross. He remembered Paul and Silas, and this cheered him: "After dark I said to the guard, We must sleep before we sleep, and there being a British guard I asked him to pray, which he did. I then told the people that if they would come out early in the morning I would fight with them. I felt remarkably happy in my condition under all my trouble and did not doubt that I should be delivered in due time. Some of the soldiers brought me straw to lay upon, and they offered me their blankets and greatcoats. One evening, I slept pretty well that night, and was the first and the last night I was under guard. As soon as it was light I got up and began to sing; some hundreds soon gathered and joined with me, and we made the plantation ring with the songs of Zion. We then knelt down and prayed; while I was praying my soul was happy in God; I wept much and prayed loud, and many of the poor soldiers also wept. I do not think that I ever felt more willing to suffer for the sake of religion than I did at that time."

A neighboring tavern keeper while in bed heard Lee's prayer and came, entreating him to preach, which he did, standing on a bench near the tent of his commanding officer, and it was no flattering text that he took, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." The sermon produced a great effect. Some of the "well-to-do" men who were drawn to it went around to make a collection for him, but Lee ran among the people, getting them to desist. Finally the colonel heard of the preaching and it affected him deeply. He took Lee out and talked with him on the subject of bearing arms. This is Lee's account of what followed: "I told him that I could not kill a man with a good conscience, but I was a friend to my country and was willing to do anything I could while I continued in the army except that of fighting. He then asked me if I would be willing to drive their baggage wagon. I told him I would, though I had never driven a wagon before. He said their main cook was a Methodist and could drive the wagon when we were on a march, and I might lodge and eat with him, to which I agreed. He then released me from guard." For four months he was in the army, during which time he preached to the troops on Sundays; he visited them frequently, practically became their chaplain, went about among them where they lay in barns, begging them to prepare to meet God, attended the funerals of those who died, and prayed at their graves.—Christian Advocate.

Open the door of your heart, my lads,
To the angel of love and truth,
When the world is full of unnumbered joys,
In the beautiful dawn of youth.
Casting aside all things that mar,
Saying to wrong, "Depart!"
To the voices of hope that are calling you Open the door of your heart.

Notes in General.

The Woman's "National Sabbath Alliance" offers a prize of twenty-five dollars for the best essay on the theme: "The Brain's Need of a Sabbath Day of Rest."

Her essay, says the Atlanta Constitution, is not sitting nearly as heavily on the mind of the sweet girl graduate as is the fairy garb of white in which she will read it.

DANGEROUS FASHIONS.—Some say that a woman should never be in the fashion over anything but her clothes, but our manners and morals are as subject to the passing laws of fashion as are our wardrobes. It is undoubtedly the fashion at the present time to be rich or, if not, to appear so.

J. F. Pollock of Pennsylvania, in writing of the religious condition of the 41,000 Slaves in the antislavery region, says: "While nearly all are Catholics, the adherence is nominal and traditional, for many are agnostic, socialistic or deistic." The Presbyterians, who have a Bible worker among them, find nevertheless quite a demand for Bibles, and religious books.

The British Weekly in commenting on the Rockefeller gift to the American Board, says: "The Christian Church, and for that matter the American public, might do well to consider whether such vast accumulations of wealth should be legally possible. But to say that these accumulations cannot be taken for beneficent purposes is surely to take an impossible position."

At a recent meeting of the Churchman's League of Washington, D. C., G. C. Bratenahl, in a strong and startling paper on "Immigration," pointed out the dangers caused by the incoming of such vast hordes of aliens every year into this country. He strongly commended the plan of the last General Convention to place a chaplain on every immigrant steamer, who should win the confidence of the immigrants during the voyage and thus be able to aid them after landing here in various ways.

So much is said and written these days concerning the dense population of certain parts of the world, and the constant cry among nations for more territory, that perhaps the following may prove interesting: The population of the whole world could with ease stand upon the Isle of Wight. Roughly, the population of the world is 1,500,000,000. If each person was allowed two square feet of standing room, they would occupy about 67,341 acres. The area of the Isle of Wight is 93,000 acres.

Argentina and Chile have been our shining examples in the lesson of peace and arbitration. Have they not made the broadest treaty of arbitration in the world's history, and disposed of their navy, and built on the Andes a colossal statue of the Messenger of "Peace on Earth"? What is this we now hear, that President Quintana, of Argentina, says that the fleet must be built to "maintain a preponderant position in South America"? That news will throw a damper on the Mohawk Conference for Arbitration soon to meet.

The total number of enrolled students now in the Moody Bible Institute, in Chicago, 1457, with a staff of eighteen regular instructors and about twenty-five special lecturers. Transient students, if included, would increase the total to five times that number. About every Protestant denomination is represented, almost every State in the Union and at least twenty-five foreign countries. The plant represents in realty and investment nearly $100,000, and its financial budget last year reached over $150,000.

Sir Frederick Treves, who stands at the head of the surgical profession in England, has stirred the public by declaring that alcohol is a poison, that it is an injury to the system when taken even in a moderate degree. He would favor the extreme of total abstinence. Being a surgeon he has seen the effect of the use of alcoholic liquors on the system of those who have to be operated upon, and who recover from the knife with less success than do those who use little or no such beverages. The use of liquors in Great Britain is decreasing, and public sentiment is more and more against them. Even in Russia the Old Believers, a very rich community, are total abstainers. In Scotland they are trying to get a law passed by Parliament allowing local prohibition of the liquor traffic.

THE AGLIPLY SCHEM.—An American who has been three years in the Philippines, and is a careful observer, returns home to say that of the 7,000,000 people always heretofore counted as Roman Catholics, Agliply claims to have fewer than 2,000,000. The observer in question says he made careful inquiries from those in the best position to know, and he found no reason to doubt the Agliply claim. This observer declares the Agliply movement to be practically a Protestant one, although it is not connected in any way with any of the Protestant bodies from the United States that are now working in the Philippines. When Aglipay first inaugurated his independent work, he went to the Protestant leaders for conference, and the story goes that he offered to make all of them bishops if they would come with him. They declined, saying they were already as near bishops as he could make them. This observer thinks the whole tendency of the Aglipay movement, as it is developing, is to be toward Protestantism, and he says it is stated on good authority that Aglipay himself does not expect the movement to last.

It is said that Aglipay, the Philippine bishop and leader, made his movement a Reformed Catholic one, rather than a Protestant one, because by so doing he felt sure of drawing more heavily upon the Catholic membership. The observer before referred to thinks that Aglipay's judgment to have been good, since in one province alone the American Bible Society agents sold last year to Aglipay leaders no fewer than fifty thousand Bibles and Testaments. He thinks that eventually the Aglipay movement will disintegrate, and a small part go back to the Catholic Church from whence it came, and the rest be absorbed by the various Protestant bodies that are now getting footholds and commanding the confidence of the Filipinos in their own islands.

TO AID THE BOERS.—A very interesting work is being carried on among the Boers by Emily Hobhouse, an Englishwoman who was a warm Boer sympathizer, and who suffered considerable persecution in consequence during the war. Since its close she has organized and carried out a practical scheme of relief.

The country was utterly devastated, 30,000 farm-houses burned, 16,000 orphans left destitute, and the surviving men and women without means to rebuild their ruined homes or replant their fields. The relief measures instituted by the British government have been quite inadequate to meet so widespread a need.

Emily Hobhouse, a little over a year ago, went out to South Africa and "trekked" hundreds of miles through the country districts, personally investigating. She found the conditions heart-breaking, especially on the lonely farms many miles from any town. In an appeal published in the London Speaker, she wrote:

"Whole families are face to face with starvation. The man has probably tramped away to seek work; the women and children sit silent at home. No word of complaint is ever heard. There is nothing to do, no clothes to wash, no food to cook, no grain to till, and neither seeds nor water. They sit in a row, silent."

Emily Hobhouse instituted practical measures to help these brave people to help themselves. She sent through the poorest districts relief teams, distributing seeds for the men to plant, and cloth for the women to make up into clothes. She came back to Europe, and she and her committee raised money to purchase oxen for ploughing. Now she has gone out to South Africa again to introduce a system of home industries among the women and girls of the Veldt. She takes with her two skilled teachers of lace-making, and those women who sat silent with nothing to do will soon be earning money. The Boers, both men and women, are hardy and energetic, and after they once get on their feet again, they can take care of themselves.

The distress is terrible and widespread, and the sums already raised do not cover the need. Alice Stone Blackwell, 45 Buntwell Ave., Dorchester, Mass., will be glad to forward any contributions.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The citizens of Philadelphia have lately been greatly aroused by an effort made by political leaders to secure a large sum of money from the United Gas Improvement Company by changing the terms of the lease made by the city with this company a few years ago. By the proposed change the city would receive about twenty-five millions of dollars immediately, but would grant to the gas company the power to sell gas to consumers for a period of fifty-five years at a profit of at least 10 per cent on the invested millions of dollars. The City Councils having agreed to make a new lease embodying those provisions; and the mayor of the city having announced his intention to veto it, many large public meetings have been held to uphold the hands of the mayor in his proposed action. The latter has also dismissed from his office the Director of Public Works, who is believed to have been actively engaged in opposition to the public interests, and has appointed others in their places. The dismissed officials obtained an order from one of the lower Courts enjoining the mayor to desist from removing them, but upon application to the Supreme Court an order was obtained directing that of the lower Court and the new officials, Potter and Acker, have continued upon their duties. These actions of the mayor have received the cordial approval of a large proportion of the better element of the city, and are believed to mark the downfall of the power of the "machine" politicians who have long ruled in an arbitrary and oppressive manner in the State and National government. In consequence of popular opposition the project of making a new lease of the gas works has been abandoned.

A despatch from Washington, says: "President Roosevelt is thinking of sending the immigration problem to Congress and urging drastic action to overcome what he regards as the most serious part of the country's problem."

Immigration this year is breaking all records. A total of over a million is indicated for the year, and most of it comes from Italy, Hungary and Russia.

Two methods are under consideration—the limiting of the number of immigrants who can be landed in a month and the increase of the head tax to a prohibitive figure. The purpose is to check and reduce the immigration as much as possible.

It is stated that in ten years, including 1895 and 1904, according to the figures furnished by the Railway Mail Service, 102 men were killed, 590 seriously injured and 2040 slightly injured in mail cars. The casualties in the past year included the Post Office Department to require stronger cars in the future, and in order to meet this demand a steel car has been built in which it is believed the men in the postal service can work in safety. It is constructed with heavy steel work at the ends, a strong steel canopy overhead and a heavy steel underbody.

The use of woodwork is questioned, as stating that electricity is fast displacing steam as the motive power on railroads, and that the sum of money which will permit a railroad to run one steam train an hour will pay for the cost of running an electric train every four minutes, or, in other words, under ordinary conditions, where the track is unimpaired at all, the cost of a steam train service is fifteen times greater, expressed in the frequency of the trains, than electrical service.

The first wireless message between Havana and New York was lately received at the office of the Atlantic De Forest Wireless Company. It came all the way by wireless, with several relays.

The first wireless transmission from Havana to Key West, thence to a steamer between Key West and Cape Hatteras, thence to Hatteras, to Atlantic City and finally to Broadway, New York.

In reference to the value of the weather reports furnished by the Government it has been recently stated that the Weather Bureau company which has the value of the Weather Bureau made a careful investigation of the workings of the bureau several years ago, and estimated that the people of the United States were saved on average at least $30,000,000 annually in property alone, not counting human life. Forty-five minutes after a storm warning is issued at Washington it is reported to the steamers in Chicago has struck the lumber yards, and rioting has occurred in several parts of the city. It is estimated by the Chicago Tribune that the strike on the 23rd ult., entering on its fifty-first day, has cost almost $14,000,000.

A recent despatch states that the police census of Washington, just completed, shows a population of 325,345 in 1899, an increase of 48,628 over the Federal census of 1900. The greatest increase was in the white residents, who number 227,812, while there are 95,534 negroes. The census shows in eight years since the last police census a white increase of 20 per cent, and negro 8 per cent.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has declared unconstitutional so much of the act of Sixth Month 2, 1895, which provides against the adulteration of food as to drink, which described food as adulterated. The row was made on the ground that the constitutional requirement that the subject of an act shall be clearly expressed in the title was not fulfilled.

The Carnegie Hero Fund Commission has lately accepted nine cases in which efforts were made to save lives. Three silver medals and six bronze medals were awarded. The widows, whose husbands lost their lives in the performance of acts of heroism, are included in award, and four of the awards also included a sum of money of $500 or $600 to each. It is stated that the establishment of the fund, on Fourth Month 15, 1891, to Fifth Month 15, 1900, a total of 407 cases have been awarded. Of the $239,000 raised for the fund, $159 are awaiting investigation 9 have been granted.

It is said that the largest blast ever set off was accomplished by contractors for the Pennsylvania Railroad of 23d ult., at Safe Harbor. More than seventy tons of explosives were used in cranking in places an immense tunnel in the path of a line being constructed along Susquehanna River. The cost of the blast is estimated at $18,500. Sixty-six holes were drilled into the iron rock, and when they were set off simultaneously the country for miles around was shaken as though by an earthquake. Because of extra precautions not a person in the neighborhood was injured. The blast was 100 feet in width and 60 feet in depth was broken into small pieces.

FOREIGN.—The Council of the Russian Empire has received the recommendations of the Passport Commission which embraces the concession to this Government of the treaty of 1854 that American Jews bearing passports issued by this Government shall be allowed unimpeded passage and privilege to travel to Russia. A provision of this city has said in reference to it: "It is the greatest achievement of this great nation, and a great victory in behalf of religious liberty. It makes the American citizen what it really purports to be; it eliminates all class distinction and places us all on equal footing. It is the only step in the correct way toward the overthrow of the cruel and barbarous attitude of opinion that has so long marked Russia's domination over Jews."

A naval battle is reported to have taken place between Russian and Japanese war vessels on the Straits of K. In which two battleships and three cruisers of the former are reported to have been destroyed. The Japanese reported to have lost one cruiser and ten torpedo boats.

Three-quarters of a million people have died of plague in India this year, according to figures furnished by Indian Secretary Brodrick in the House of Commons. The mortality from First Month 1st to Fourth Month was 471,744, which included 215,301 accounted for the four weeks ending Fourth Month 29th.

It is stated that the latest official census of Russia shows that the country has a population of 125,640 comprising thirty-seven tribes and nationalities. Russians comprise two-thirds of the population of empire, but in some of the districts they are in the majority. In Poland only 6.7 per cent. The percentage of illiterates among the Russians is high. Only 30 per cent. of males and 9 per cent. of the females can read and write. The number of foreigners in the country is said to be only 650,000.

LEADERS and POINTERS.—The editorial air of some papers are called leaders. As stars, we take no thought to lead, but would point. Not leaders then, but stars, the suggestions on this page are remarked as being "in the right direction." That is encouragement enough. Looked into, it sometimes exceeds the reality. We can so point Friends, we are happy to lead where it belongs. And we point with a plain finger. We have seen pointing done by a finger as not plain. Probably it pointed straight and accurately, but it was so brilliantly jeweled that we saw only the gems and glitter and lost its direction. It might as well not be pointed at all, as to have pointed brill-

ly. Many a well-pointed article or discourse, drawing the attention to its brilliant style, we fail to see the point. A preacher generally a failure from whom people come and say, "Wasn't that a good sermon?" When hearers have been so impressed with the truth, or their own condition has so reached that they forget the sermon absorbing end to which it points, then preaching not in vain. As the preacher is a man but Jesus only, so will men see the teacher but Jesus only. It makes a vast difference to the church and to the world, when men preach Christ or preach sermons, to neglect style makes as much diversion from the right direction, as to affect in a slounchy manner. Both attract attention to lives, and away from its right object. The excellency of the end in view, aimed in single sincerity, will tend to rectify the preaching according to the mark of the high end intended.

What is this "right direction" of Friends' literature and declaration? It proceeds from Christ's directing and unto Christ's leadership and fellowship, as the owned and witnessed Head over all things to his church. Both source and tendency is Christ's Spirit. That is where the verdict "in the right direction" stamps remarks so described.

Shall we quail before so high an obligation? Surely we are not sufficient for these things. But from the Source of all sufficiency may help come to point in the right direction. "Is there not a Cause?" And if that is held to there will be the effect. Both start and terminus will be Christ.

Before us often stand two bulky volumes containing thousands of mere titles of books of Friends' literature. Most of these hold up to view the right Director of the words of our mouth or pens, and of the meditation of our hearts. And some of them bear the spiritual stamp of being so directed. Were our words in this day in and under the right direction, there would be little need of arguing about the right directorship. The people would witness it and acknowledge it in our works.

The Protection of the Family.

An article from "The Christian Statesman" on the Revised Marriage Rules of the Society of Friends, Adopted by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, 1903.

The Friends of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have lately revised the Marriage Rules of their society and a copy has been handed us by an esteemed member of the society who is also one of the vice-presidents of the National Reform Association. So far from being a matter of interest only to Friends these rules are of interest to all the friends of good morals and of personal and public purity. We think parents and religious guides and teachers will find great pleasure in reading them and they will be of interest to all thoughtful and earnest young people. The preparation, publication and observance of rules such as these are a fine example of the care which every Church ought to maintain over the marriages of her young people. This care has been almost wholly abandoned in wide sections of the Church, and even parents, with the result that the young are left largely to form their own attachments and make their own engagements, the office of parents and pastors being reduced to the mere ratifying of arrangements which have been already made. Nothing is more manifest than that the Church ought to resume, by careful systematic and persevering instruction from the pulpit and otherwise, the oversight which she formerly exercised over the alliances of her sons and daughters. Pastors and parents will find helpful counsels here for the young people under their care.

The marriages of Friends are a beautiful example of godly simplicity joined with a most impressive decorum and solemnity. The marriage certificate, the form of which is prescribed in the rules, is usually handsomely engrossed on parchment, and after the ceremony is signed by great numbers as witnesses. It was the privilege of the editor not long since to examine a great number of these certificates reaching back, with other historical treasures, for more than two hundred years and preserved as priceless heirlooms in one of the oldest Quaker families of this city. The evening thus spent was one of peculiar pleasure, and fruitful of reflections as to the value of usages and observances which express the religious convictions of a people through their successive generations. Such usages become more impressive with the lapse of time. He who would lightly change them must lack both sympathy and imagination as well as reverence. In contrast with the decent and well ordered marriage arrangements of the Society of Friends how rude and how vulgar are the sudden and hasty courtships, the runaway or other scandalous marriages, and the frequent subsequent resort to the divorce courts for relief from ill-assorted unions. It is needless to add that divorces among Friends are almost utterly unknown, indeed almost inconceivable.

We desire to add that the seventh paragraph of these rules states correctly, in our judgment, the relation of a Christian minister to the solemnization of marriage. Of course, those who believe that marriage is a sacrament believe also that it can be administered properly only by a Christian minister. But the prevailing view among Protestants is that the minister officiates at a wedding only as one whom the law of the land and the usages of society have recognized as a fit person to receive and sanction the vows of the contracting parties.

The figures appended to the several paragraphs show the dates at which the rule was first adopted, or was modified, or re-affirmed.

When the Head of the Church led our forefathers into an organization for their mutual help and religious fellowship, He gave them to see that unity in religious belief is essential to the full enjoyment of the blessings of a married life, and to that unrestrained confidence and sympathy between parents and children which are so important to their growth and settlement in the Truth.

They also felt that this religious sympathy in family life is highly important to the body itself, designed as it is to uphold, not only doctrines more spiritual than those generally accepted in the religious world, but also that life of faithful obedience which those doctrines require; for in this life of obedience alone can a belief of the doctrines themselves be retained, or their further unfoldings be received. 1881-1903.

He who is ready to supply all our needs and enable us to fulfill His purposes, whose watchful eye is ever upon His Church and people, looks with tender regard upon all that relates to the marriage union. He turns the hearts of parents to their children to watch over their associations from early life. Those who will listen to His voice He warns against forming unsuitable intimacies. He gives the encouraging feeling of His approval where the affections are being drawn as He would have them to be, and withholds it where His gracious designs would be frustrated by the connection; and where He sees meet, He prepares hearts to be joined in religious fellowship before they enter upon a union in marriage. 1881.

It is advised that all young and unmarried people in membership with us, before making any procedure in order to marriage, do seriously and humbly wait upon the Lord for His counsel and direction in this important concern; and when favored with satisfactory clearness there in, they should early acquaint their parents or guardians with their intentions, and wait for their consent; thus preservation from the dangerous bias of forward, brittle and uncertain affections would be experienced, to the real benefit of the parties and the comfort of their friends.

The disregard of our rules in going from us in the important engagement of marriage is often from want of care on the part of parents and those having charge of educating the youth, early to instruct them in the principles of Truth professed by us, and to impress upon their minds the duty of religiously observing them. We tenderly advise Friends to increase their care over the youth in this respect; to restrain them as much as possible from such company as is likely to entangle their affections in an improper manner, and to impress upon their minds by precept and by upright lives that our principles are consistent with the nature of true religion, and their observance most helpful to a growth in the Truth. 1682-1761-1903.

In the exercise of parental care to guard children from unsuitable connections in marriage, let it be borne in mind that to be joined to persons of religious inclinations, suitable dispositions and industrious habits will contribute more to the happiness of married life, than alliances formed with a view to worldly advantage. 1729-1903.

Marriage being an ordinance of God, He alone can rightly join man and woman therein. Neither priest nor minister of religion is requisite to its accomplishment; nor do we find in the Scriptures that the priest had any part in the marriage further than as a witness among others who were present. We cannot therefore countenance the exercise of a function which we believe to be no part of the office of a Gospel minister. 1881-1903.

It is advised that no misdemeanor be treasured up against a person until the time of presenting marriage, and then brought forward, though perhaps long before known to the object. 1712-1903.

Where parents or guardians have approved the addresses of a man (a member of our religious society) to any of their children or those under their care, they should not retract the same without giving such reasons as shall be satisfactory to the Monthly Meeting to which they belong. 1719-1903.

In accordance with the ancient and commendable practice amongst Friends, care should be taken that those who make or admit of proposals of marriage with each other, do not dwell in the same house from the time they began to be so interested until the marriage is accomplished. 1714-1903.

No Monthly Meeting shall permit any proposal of marriage to be made in it, if either of the parties thereto has lost a former husband or wife within a period of one year. 1749-1903.

It is directed that marriages be accomplished in public meetings for worship, held (except in extraordinary cases) in Friends' meeting-houses, and not on the first day of the week, nor at the time of a Monthly Meeting.

On these occasions Friends should be careful to set a becoming example of moderation in accordance with the simplicity and self-denial which our holy religion enjoins. Let all marriages be accomplished with the gravity and solemnity befitting the importance of the event; and let every propriety becoming a people fearing God be observed at the entertainments given in connection with them. 1716-1903.

Preliminary to the accomplishment of marriage it is directed that the intentions of the parties shall be laid before the women's and men's Monthly Meetings to which the woman belongs, by stating either verbally by their personal appearance in each meeting, or by a written communication that (using words to this effect): "With Divine permission and the approbation of Friends we intend marriage with each other."

Whereupon two Friends should be appointed in the women's meeting to inquire whether there is any objection to the woman's proceeding in marriage. If the man belong to the same Monthly Meeting two men should be appointed in the men's meeting to make the same inquiry concerning him. If he is a member of another Monthly Meeting a certificate of his clearness from any objection should be produced from his Monthly Meeting, either then or at the next Monthly Meeting.

The Monthly Meeting should be informed of the consent of parents and guardians either verbally or by writing. Should their consent be withheld without sufficient apparent cause, Monthly Meetings may permit marriages to take place between members after taking care that there is no valid objection. At the next Monthly Meeting if careful inquiry has been made and no reasonable objection to the further proceeding of the parties appears, the meeting is to leave them at liberty to accomplish their marriage according to our rules, and appoint two Friends of each sex to attend and see that good order is observed.

The men of this committee should take care that the legal requirements have been complied with; that the marriage certificate is drawn in correct form and entered on the Monthly Meeting's records, and where either of the parties about to marry has children by a former marriage that the rights of the children are legally secured.

Those bringing their proposals of marriage before a Monthly Meeting should, if possible, be present when the decision in the case is recorded. 1721-1881-1898-1903.

In the ceremony of marriage the parties rising to their feet, and taking each other in the hand, should say: "In the presence of t Lord and of this assembly I take . . . . . to be my wife (or husband), promising my Divine assistance to be unto her (or him) loving and faithful husband (or wife) unto death shall separate us." 1903.

The form of certificate shall be as follows [a reprint not requisite here].

That the marriage of persons too near may, as much as possible, be prevented, directed that no marriage between first cousins be permitted among us. And that where a of our members thus related shall intermar their so doing shall be a relinquishment of their membership in the society; and the Monthly Meeting of which they have been members shall make a minute to that effect, and inform th of the fact.

Such persons may, however, be restored membership by making a satisfactory acknowledgment of their error to the Monthly Meeting their sincerity being manifested by an upright life.

The term first cousins fully applies to descendants in the second generation from common grandparent. 1721-1807-1903.

If any of our members join in marriage w such as are not in membership with us, marry in any other way than in accordance w the regulations of our discipline, they sh be treated with in the spirit of Christian i and tenderness, in order to bring them into unity and fellowship with Friends; but wh after patient waiting, this labor of love failed in its object, the Monthly Meeting sh make a minute to the effect that such are longer members of our society, and expres of the desire that the individual may be prepared to unite in religious fellowship w Friends. The committee in the case sh continue, or another committee be appointed to furnish the person with a copy of this minute.

When any of our members have married th not of our religious profession, and are brot to feel the value of association in a relig society which practically believes in immed Divine guidance, both in individual life in the affairs of the Church, and are in good gree convinced of the correctness of our trines and testimonies which faithful Fri uphold, such may then be retained in or rest to membership by offering a suitable statem to the Monthly Meeting, expressing their agreement with the principles of our Society, their desire to be members of it.

When communications of this kind are ferred, in consideration of the sacredness of marriage covenant, and from a tender regard the right feelings of the parties, such pe should not be required to express regret the marriage connection when considered a personal point of view. 1702-1881-19

DOES THY BROTHER STUMBLE?

Does thy brother stumble? Look and see! Is anything that has been done by thee anything that thou hast failed to do spread dark clouds of gloom across his view? Other things, when he, perchance, had silently one of good example looked to thee.

It is, early in his pilgrimage in hopes of heaven beckoned each daily page in his life's record, that near thy side own self-righteousness and pride led him to stumble, darkened hope's bright ray, made him falter in the "narrow way."

When before the tribunal bar of Justice thou shalt stand Son beholding, at the Father's hand, Books are opened and that happy throng
 All alike thy righteousness or wrong
 I think thou the Heavenly King wilt say, O'ut hast caused one of his sheep to stray?

Thou, who easily stumblest at another's fault,
 Be wary that's right, be careful lest thou halt!
 Use some other one has failed to be Bright example thou had wished to see,
 Not excuse; and if thou turn aside,
 A weaker one, that's watching thee, may slide.

A Visit to Algeria.

Day. —To-day has been another event in my life. How can I ever put it all into a letter! I am sure I do not know, for I could say a volume with what we have seen and felt since we touched Africa. Oh, this great! Oh, the infinite expanse of it, the fact that has nothing to do with anything we have ever seen or known! How I should like to talk with you, each one of you, and tell you what has occurred. But I can only make a few attempts.

Well, at dinner last night, Walter suggested a walk to Sidi-Okba, an Arab city thirteen miles across the desert. I at once offered to accompany him. We called the head waiter and discussed the matter. He was horrified when he thought of our walking—said it was very long, very far—no one had ever done it, etc., etc. We, of course, told him that we counted that nothing—ordered breakfast at eight past seven, and bargained with Safti to accompany us for ten francs. He had never offered to Sidi-Okba in his life, but was willing to devote himself. We left about eight. I need to say that the morning was superb under a cloud, not a breath of wind, neither an nor cold, but superb—fresh, bracing, delightful. Safti carried the lunch, slung in a sash over his shoulder, for at Sidi-Okba, they do everything we could get to eat was "very passive, very bad, and very dirty." No need of trying to give you any idea of the life in the streets that we went through—camels loaded uttering their woeful plaints—men getting under way—lounging figures along the sun—French soldiers in brilliant uniform—native and French zouaves in blue and red balloon trousers—Sphas, or mounted soldiers wearing the splendid native costume over their red leather boots and red skirts. Negroes from the far south and Bedouins from the desert—brilliantly dressed children flashing in the sun—all this a few feet behind, and took the road passing the colorful garden, "Landon," of which I have not yet said a word, but which is certainly considered the sight of Biskra. Then we crossed the wide, cobble-covered bed of the Biskra river, mounted the bank beyond, and were upon the level road that runs direct to the southeast, to the native city of Sidi-Okba. For twelve miles there is nothing—absolutely nothing upon the road to mark the distance—to give one an idea of a landmark. To the north the eternal mountains, with the cultivated oasis stretching from their base; to the south the eternal desert, stretching endlessly away. Behind us the palm groves of old Biskra; before us, on far-distant horizon, a dark line that, after hours of walking, becomes the palm groves of Sidi-Okba. The infinite expanse, the infinite solitude—the glorious sun, the delicious air—all together gives a sense of exhilaration really possible to experience. But, after all, it was the strange life of the road that was of the most thrilling interest. Constantly we were meeting or being passed by Arabs mounted on horses, on mules, on donkeys; Bedouins walking behind and among the camels, which in long trains advanced slowly, bearing heavy burdens, stretching their long necks and eying us with calm indifference. By their side, in most ridiculous contrast, walked tiny donkeys, heavily laden, too, looking meek and submissive. Three diligences passed, crowded to overflowing with burlesque covered figures. Everyone showed the same surprise; incredulously asked the same question of Safti: "Why are you taking that family like that on foot to Sadi-Okba? it is impossible." "Qu'est ce que je peux faire moi? c'est la famille qui le veut." ("What can I do about it? It is the family that wants it.") Once a fine carriage dashed by—it belonged to the Bach Agha, the ruler of the region—two Frenchman, his guests, were with his son; they were going to visit the ruler of Sidi-Okba, who is the Bach Agha's brother. We reached the palm trees about noon, and went direct to the one French restaurant, kept by pathetic-looking people, but who had a very pleasant garden. Here we had our lunch, sitting under the shade of pomegranates and palms for about an hour. We took a cafe maure (Arab coffee), and started with Safti to view the town. It contains five thousand inhabitants, and many, many thousand palm trees. The place is like old Biskra, only more picturesque, more typically Arab than it. We made our way through dense crowds which thronged the streets, along both sides of which merchants of every kind were seated with their wares spread out for show. Repeated, before we could realize it, droves of camels or mules or donkeys were upon us, but only the two former were alarming,—the first because of their great height and advancing heads, the others for their heels. Everything that I have said of the Arabs before was here intensified. At last we came to the great market-place. Here Safti took for our further protection an armed police, for the Bedouins, he said, were too much for him to manage. Even as it was, they nearly overwhelmed us in their determination not to let us go until we had bought all they had to sell. But the most interesting thing that we saw was the mosque. We have been in many mosques, and some quite fine ones in Algiers, but none so interesting as this. The town, and the oasis, and everything takes its name from the Mohammedan saint who is buried there; Sidi, in Arabic, means "my lord"; Okba is the man's name. He was a cousin of Mohammed, and the first Musselman invader of North Africa. The mosque is the oldest in North Africa. Because of its fame and its sanctity, hundreds of young Arabs from everywhere come here to study the Koran, a school being attached to the mosque. About the courts are innumerable cells—high enough for a man to sit, long enough for a man to lie down—in these places the students live. We saw numbers of them all reading intently their sacred books. Slippers were brought to us (the Mohammedans remove their shoes and stockings and wash their feet before entering). We put them on—or rather, the muezzin (or muezzin) put them on for us—we had to slip along to keep them on our feet. The floor was covered with prayer rugs and mats upon which kneeled a great many of the faithful. Afterwards we mounted the minaret. The muezzin was very communicative, and spoke French very well. He very cheerfully repeated the words many times that he calls from the minaret five times during the twenty-four hours, turning first towards Mecca, then to the other three corners of the heavens. From the top the view was superb—over the whole of Sidi-Okba's chocolate-colored houses, with their brilliant decorations in the way of women and children, its palm gardens, its marketplace and moving throng of hooded occupants, and away to the northward the eternal mountain wall, to the southward the apparently infinite stretches of the sand desert. The walk home was even more interesting than the morning walk had been; there were the same groups of Arabs, Bedouins, soldiers, travelers, but there was the added glory of the sinking sun—the unutterably soft lights caught and reflected by the wild mountain slopes—the blue of the desert looking like the sea. Then the radiant west after the sun was gone—its gradual fading light and the night settling down, the wonderful night on the desert, calm, still and radiant, with stars of unutterable brilliancy, while the moon, near its first quarter, gave a strong light. No sound but the barking of dogs guarding the Bedouin encampments, no object on the horizon but the glare of their fires in the darkness. To understand in the faintest way the desert one must put out in the night in it; only so can one realize its infinite peace and its infinite calm. There was one pathetic incident of our trip. On our way home we met a band of Bedouins with three camels and a large flock of goats and sheep. One beautiful white lamb was separated from the rest, and crying piteously. I ran towards it and, with Safti's help, succeeded in getting it in my arms—it was the sweetest, whitest little thing. The moment I took it up it nestled to me, dropping quite limp in my lap, evidently utterly exhausted. A strange group of wild desert men gathered around me as I sat caressing it. Ragged, almost jet black they were, and half famished; we listened to their simple words, which Safti translated. It had been a terrible year—no rain, and half their flock had died of thirst and hunger. It had been three days now since they had found any food—going, going, going, the poor sheep dropped one by one and perished. The little white lamb nestled to me;

I could not bear to leave it, but we had to hasten on. I put it in the arms of one of those fierce men, begging him to carry it, and to be gentle with it—poor little thing! I hope its mother has found something to eat by this time, but the chance looked very small. What wonder those fierce men are lawless and desperate—I pitied them all. But in spite of what they suffer, nothing could induce them to leave their wandering, uncertain life—the freedom, the wild freedom of it! one does not wonder they love it. Three days of rain makes them kings and princes. But here the rain does not come often, and yet they wander, hoping.

In two days we leave them. I have grown very fond of them all, and especially of Safti, who is really a very intelligent, fine man. His family, before the French came, had great power. He shows his birth by his majestic bearing and easy manners. He would be very handsome (nearly all the men except the very lowest are superb) but he has lost one eye. He has six children; his eldest boy of nine he is very proud of. He is very intelligent, and will go to the university at Algiers when he has finished school here. Every day he gets up at six, has his breakfast, goes to the Arab school till eight, where he learns Arabic and the Koran. From eight to eleven he goes to the French school. He has two hours' noon. From one to four he returns to the French school, and after that has an hour at the Arab school. We saw his French copy-book; it was excellent. He studies everything, and speaks French perfectly.

But I must stop. Think what I shall have to tell you next time—Timgad, Carthage, Tunis—and not a word yet of the trip from Algiers! Dear me! be continued.

On the Tin Roof.

Dr. Bernardo, the rescuer and friend of London street waifs, was thus called to his work:

As he was closing the rooms of a city mission one night after the children had gone he saw a ragged urchin standing by the stove, without shoes, stockings, or hat. "Boy, it is time for you to go home," he said. The boy did not move. Bernardo went on closing things up, and by and by said again, "My boy, why don't you go home?"

"Ain't got no home." Bernardo did not believe it, but asked the boy to come to his house, and, after giving him something to eat, heard his story. He was an outcast, without father or mother, without place to sleep.

"Are there more like you?" asked Bernardo.

"Lots of 'em," said the boy.
"Will you show me some of them?"
"Yes."

So at midnight Bernardo went. They threaded their way through the streets and into a "close." The boy pointed to a kind of calbin in this area, and said, "There's lots of 'em in there."

The doctor stooped down and lit a match. He saw no one. But the boy was not at all abashed. "Cops have been after 'em," he said; "they're on the roof."

So saying, the boy went up a brick wall to a tin-covered roof, and pulled the doctor after him. And there on that winter night were thirteen boys cuddled close together, nothing under them but a tin roof, nothing over them but the starlit sky!

"Shall I wake 'em?" the boy asked.
It occurred to the doctor that he had one more boy than he knew what to do with, so he said no. But that night as the stars shone on the thirteen waifs huddled together on a tin roof, he promised God that he would devote his life to the outcast boys and girls of London. As a result of that vow there now sleep every night in or near London, under friendly Christian roofs, nearly five thousand boys and girls, gathered by Bernardo and in course of training by him for lives of purity and usefulness.

LIFE (A Unique Poem.)

Maxims of Jane Lathrop Stanford.

Inscriptions prepared by her and Placed in the Memorial Church of the Leland Stanford Junior University.

[We are indebted to a Friend from Philadelphia travelling in California for the following inscriptions copied for her from waifs of the University, as "composed or compiled entirely by the late Jane L. Stanford."—E. I.]

A noble ambition is among the most helpful influences of student life, and the higher that ambition is the better. No man can we well unless he can speak as the Great Mas did of the joy set before Him.

And this leads to the greatest of all safeguards, and the most encouraging of all stimulating influences to a noble life—that is, power of personal religion. We need something beyond ourselves. "Remember, you are not your own—you are bought with the precious blood of Jesus."

II.

The world is new to every soul when Christ enters into it. We can never perish if we remain in the arms of our Father Almighty.

III.

In the great record above, our names written in characters of love—character which love for our dear Jesus alone can reach and which by his great love for us alone has been graven.

IV.

The highest service may be prepared and done in the humblest surroundings. Silence, in waiting, in obscure, unnoticed places, in years of uneventful unrecorded duty, the Son of God grew and waxed strong.

V.

True life is the principles of Christ. Life there is no other that is true. To concede it still more—the true life is the Christ-living.

God knows what his children want best; they ask, but it proves their faith in Him to pray for what they want.

VI.

Religion is intended as a comfort, a solace, a necessity to the soul's welfare; and wherever form of religion furnishes the greater comfort, the greatest solace, it is the form which should be adopted, be its name what will.

The best form of religion is, trust in God and a firm belief in the immortality of soul, life everlasting.

VII.

An eternal existence in prospect converts the whole of your present state into a vestibule of the grand court of life; a beginning, an introduction to what is to follow; entrance into that immeasurable extent being which is the true life of man. Best thoughts, affections and aspirations great soul are fixed on the infinitude of eternity. Destined as such a soul is for immortality, it finds all that is not eternal too small that is not infinite too small.

VIII.

A life that is founded on the principles of goodness, love, wisdom and power that rests on the Christ, has a lasting foundation can be trusted.

We speak of love, but what do we know about it, unless we see the power of love manifested; unless we are given the power to love, and a willing heart to bestow it upon, within humanity? We say God is love, if we do not feel the power of his love, do not know anything about it. To be loved by others makes the power of love manifest in our hearts grow.

IX.

Each man, like every other individuality, has an object and a purpose to fulfill; and, when he comprehends this, he will think too much of himself to stoop to any material action that would bring him down from the highest position to the throne of his nature. To acknowledge that all is often done without acknowledging God's love for us, and it is his love and tender care and wise leading we should reflect upon rather than we do—much more if we would do duty.

X.

Our lives are messages of either Divine good or justice. Each has a mission to fulfill, as it comes from God, accomplishes it in time. And, in sending them, the good Father sends means by which they may be ended, perhaps averted.

Remedies in sickness, Love in trouble, Comfort in weakness, Renewed hope in disappointment, Tears in sorrow, Smiles to follow tears.

XI.

Divine knowledge is intelligence and its impress upon the mind. Wisdom is the desire of the heart prompted by God's highest and truest Divine nature and comprises all knowledge. Wisdom is the highest spiritual intelligence, while the natural man, through the senses, can know nothing of wisdom.

Each man may have great intelligence and yet know nothing of the Christ life within him.

XII.

Why do we belong to God forever in this mortal life, serving Him faithfully through its trials, bearing the cross after Him; and may be his forever in life eternal, with the Father and the Celestial court.

There is a great advancement toward the fulfillment of desires in the life beyond to have a godly life on earth.

XIII.

When we see Jesus, without reserve, without exception, without limitation, may thy holy will be done in all things, at all times.

XIV.

It is by suffering that God has most nearly reached to man; it is by suffering that He draws most nearly to God.

XV.

There are but few on earth free from cares, and but few carry burdens of sorrow, and if all are asked to make a package of their troubles, and to throw this package on a common pile, and if they were asked to go and choose a package from that pile they were willing to bear, [many, if not all] would select their own package again.

Our heartaches may be great, burdens may be heavy, but look about you, and with whom do you change?

XVI.

The true test of a Christian life lies in deeds and actions, not in words, a true follower of Christ is one and Godliness, not a follower of the impressions of the flesh nor the impress of the intellect alone, but endeavoring to let the heart be touched with the Divine principle of God's truth; and that alone makes Christians. The instinct given to all of God's children to seek happiness is a proof that happiness is a reality and within the reach of all.

XVII.

If we do good deeds to others and try to help them to live happier and better lives by being kind to them, and teaching them of the God germ within themselves, we in that way sow the seed, and God in his own way and time will make it grow. There is such a thing as mistaking Christian privileges for Christian attainments, and of imagining that we are what we ought to be simply because we know it. There is something in all hearts that can be reached, some chord that will give forth sweet music if we only have the skill to touch it.

XVIII.

May the peace which no earthly disturbance can mar, which is of the Father through his inspiration and love, fill your hearts, and enable you to go on in the journey of life with the feeling of trust and confidence that nothing can disturb. It is not [secluded] love for God, but love for the neighbor, good will toward man, universal kindness and gentleness, that make saints on earth. One must give as well as take of goodness, gentleness and unselfish kindness, to meet with God's approval.

XIX.

God is all in all; and, if we cannot appreciate and worship Him in all things, we worship only part of God.

As we grow and improve, we will love more the beautiful everywhere. Praise God for the gift of nature, for giving so much of everything that is beautiful in all the universe, because his life is in it all.

By your life only can you prove your principles to the world, and show to them there is a life worth living.

XX.

Regard not the appearance of things you are to do, but Him who commands them, and who, when He pleases, can accomplish his glory and our perfection through the most trifling things.

When a person thinks a duty is beneath Him, he places himself above God, for He deals with that same duty.

Let us never be sad, save at having offended God.

XXI.

God gives all some work to do—if not great deeds, then small ones, as the cup of cold water to one of his children.

Yes, even less than that—a word of advice, something lent to another, a little vexation patiently borne, the fault or thoughtlessness of another repaired without his knowledge. God will recompense it all a thousandfold.

XXII.

Thoughts and words travel just as God's life travels. They do not travel like an individual, but you breathe your spiritual life into the atmosphere as you do your breath, and some one else breathes it in. Those not present still receive it, for it permeates space, and all live in it and receive from it according to their unfoldment.

XXIII.

We must not desire all to begin by perfection. It matters little how we begin provided we be resolved to go on well and end well.

XXIV.

Earth grants joys that are great; but transplant such joys to heaven, ennoble them through the ennobling love of God, and they grow to a magnitude beyond the comprehension of earth mind.

XXV.

God, in his infinite wisdom gives to the poor blessings (by way of compensation) which the wealthy do not attain—the giving and receiving of heart offerings without price, deeds that win crowns and scepters in heaven.

XXVI.

There is no narrowing so deadly as the narrowing of man's horizon of spiritual things. No worse evil could befall him in his course on earth than to lose sight of heaven. And it is not civilization that can prevent this; it is not civilization that can compensate for it. No widening of science, no possession of abstract truth, can indemnify for an enfeebled hold on the highest and central truths of humanity. "What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

KATHERINE NORTON.—This year (1678) one Katharine Norton, alias McLoughlin, travelled in Ireland in the service of Truth. Her maiden name was McLoughlin. She was born of Irish parents of account in or near Colerain, and was sent to Londonderry for education, where she remained for some time. When she was sixteen years of age there came a ship to Ferry to take in passengers for Barbadoes, which she embarked in and landed in that island, where she was married; and some time after that island being visited by George Fox and some others, she was convinced by their ministry; and afterwards became an able minister, and in or about this year (1678), came on Truth's service into the kingdom of Ireland. She visited Friends' meetings in the north; preached in Lurgan market on a market day in Irish; had several meetings near Colerain, where her relations lived, and had several disputes on account of Truth, which got the victory; from whence she traveled to Armagh, Cavan, the Moate of Grange; and had several meetings there and elsewhere, to the satisfaction and edification of Friends, and some time after she travelled to Dublin and took shipping for England. She was well qualified for the service, being of a sound judgment, large in testimony, of a good utterance, had of her own to distribute, and did not make the Gospel chargeable.

A. F.

If any one wants to know the best qualification he could have for winning souls, it is this, that his own soul be won. If God puts into your hearts a word for some one else, we may be sure that He has prepared that other heart to receive it, just as He has prepared us to deliver it. Winning men to Christ does not require eloquence or learning, or skill of any kind. All it requires is that we know where Christ is and love Him, and are men enough to want to bring men to Him.—Record of Christian Work.

VISION.

BY RAYNE LANIER.

It isn't raining ran to me,
It's raining daffodils;
In every dimpled drop I see Wild flowers on the distant hills.

The clouds of gray engulf the day
And overwhelm the town;
It isn't raining ran to me,
It's raining roses down.

It isn't raining ran to me,
But fields of clover bloom,
Where any buccaneering bee
May find a bed and room.

A health unto the happy!
A fig for him who frets!
It isn't raining ran to me,
It's raining violets.

A Visit to Japan.

Solicitations having been received on behalf of not a few of our readers who desire to be informed of the travels of our friend Joseph Elkinton during his present visit in Japan, we are at liberty to present extracts from such of his letters or notes as come to us.

He was met at Yokohama by his sister and a friend, and daily enjoyed the beautiful garden of her home at Tokyo, except as visits to schools, places of public interest, and religious gatherings increasingly claimed his attention.

His interest became especially enlisted in an annual religious gathering held at Tsuchuira, which was participated in by some under the name of Friends as well as others. "We had," he says, "some precious meetings. Of course I think there are times when more quietness would be profitable in these meetings, but I could feel the sincerity of their hearts and earnest desire to deepen in spiritual experience and understanding, and I am very glad to have shared the blessing we received from above—the difficulty is to retain it." Notes of the utterances of a few speakers, taken down by some who understood the Japanese language, may be added later on.

"I have been pleased by what I have seen in the Friends' School at Tokyo. I took there the books entrusted to my care, and have attended the meeting for worship twice, and have addressed the girls in collection; also visiting the class-rooms during hours of their lessons, and I see there is the foundation for a good school. The thing which impresses me most is the need of a well-trained native teacher, such an one as they are now engaging in Michi Kaurai, who graduated at Bryn Mawr a year ago. This is in line with all the most successful schools in Japan. The school has the best equipment, so far as buildings go, of all I have seen in Japan. I am to meet with the patrons of the school a few days hence, and also, a week later, to explain the views of Friends to those who may assemble.

"A week ago I spoke to a company of foreigners on Peace; and a pastor named Ukai asked me to tell his people about the thirteenth International Peace Congress held in Boston last fall, which I did. There were one hundred or more present. I also spoke in a hall to as many more, who were young men. So I have been kept busy in one way or another."

To recur to the general Annual Meeting at Tsuchuira for Christians. We find notes given of Bunji Kida's first testimony at the opening meeting—"a sweet-spirited man of thirty-five. I could feel the Master was leading him, and he earnestly wanted to learn more of Friends' way of worship, although he had joined the Society. His opportunity to know Friends had been very limited. He was in the State of Oregon a few years since, but did not see any Friends there. He talks English very well, and his wife is a superior woman, also speaking English. He is of a spirit that would promote the spiritual life of any community. He desired 'only to lift up the cross of Christ in testimony. It is my cross to confess that my condition has been too much like the people of Laodicea mentioned in Revelation. I have too often quenched and grieved the Holy Spirit. My heart is filled with praise that God has been pleased to have mercy upon me.

"Why have we come to the Annual Meeting? To hear sermons? To see something interesting? If so we shall be disappointed. God is truly working in our midst, that the meeting be not in form, but in the Spirit. Do we not long to humble ourselves, and see the power of God working? The earnest love of God is being revealed in our hearts by the Spirit. The Holy Spirit loves us with a watchful eye. God resists the proud, but giveth grace to the humble. If we have hearts that are proud, He will not bless us."

In a meeting for Christian Doctrine, which was attended by one hundred persons, C. Kaifu spoke, tracing the leading up into the Christian Dispensation. First, that God met face to face with his people. Second, on account of sin the connection was broken with many. Then came on the period of the Mosaic Law; the age of the Prophets; the period of Christ's appearance in the world in a personal presence, concluding with his death on the Cross. Then Christ's promise to give the Holy Spirit, and his ascension to the Father. Following this has come the period of the Holy Spirit, his work for Redemption on the cross having been finished, and the Holy Spirit now given for all to receive and follow. Please think of this as the age of the work of the Holy Spirit. "Be ye perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect."

As Christ's opening up the way of reconciliation by the Cross was followed by the more manifest work of the Holy Spirit, the same historical order is known in the individual life. First there must be a knowledge of one's sin, going on unto Repentance, and then forgiveness. In the new birth one enters into his spiritual family, becomes a true child of the Father, and can truly cry "Abba, Father," and experience fellowship with Him. Next one wishes to do the things which please Him. In this condition and obedience is he nourished by the Father.

Accordingly, it behoves each one to consider. "In which period am I?" Sometimes one must query many days before the answer comes. If one wishes to be holy before his God he must come into entire dedication of himself and all, into confession of all hidden sin, and be a subject of the coming in of the Holy Spirit to abide. The Father gives to each one the work that pleases Him. First being, then doing. The Christian will be glad to suffer for Christ. He will not strike back. He is patient in all trials. His worship, prayer, and praise is echoed in Isaiah's cry before God "Holy, holy, holy!" His work under the anointing, in his lot in all the world, is a baptizing work "into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." Christ sitting at the right hand of the Father, the Holy Spirit is working in the hearts of men; the Holy Spirit is pleading in the heart,—praying in the heart's centre, showing what is sin, what pleases and what displeases Him. Working in the heart, the Holy Spirit feeds it with the necessities of soul life, heals the disease of the heart. It takes faith for all this work to go on; it is for the soul whose hand takes hold on God. May we be enabled to pray for the Holy Spirit to fill us with love, to awaken us. This dependence upon the work of the Holy Spirit is the greatest blessing of the Christian life. "The anointing of the Spirit has a reference to Old Testament customs,—as the charge in Exodus xxx., not to touch the flesh,—so the Holy Spirit's anointing will come upon the lusts of the flesh. Some people cry, "Oh, fill me with the Holy Spirit!" But the prayer is not answered because one is dwelling in the flesh, or desiring this blessing for worldly reasons. The Spirit will lead, and will answer cries, but will not come in fulness upon the "gentle heart." All work for God must originate with Him. His children are sealed with the Holy Spirit; by the Spirit they are guided; sleeping, waking, they are led by God. The Holy Spirit interprets the Scriptures, and shows the way to Heaven. Paul thought to go into Asia, but was hindered by the Spirit. To know the impressions of the Spirit is a blessing.

C. Kaifer then gave the substance of J. Elkinton's story of being calm in a train-wreck "Have we experienced these impressions?" can recall at least three such signal experiences. If the Holy Spirit interprets the Bible there will be unity,—as with the two wheels of a jirikisha. If one feels impressions of the Spirit for preparation or work, one must not "break" this impression, but obey. The Holy Spirit makes the discrimination in between man's righteousness and the righteousness of God; reveals also the difference between the praise of the world and the praise of God. Purity comes from Him. One proceeds not in mere always pure; one may fall quickly under temptations. Fish in water; all right in water; but keep thou in the love of God. There is no place for ease in the high and holy calling. The purity of the father will not serve for his son. It is freedom from temptation,—rather do temptations increase in the work of purifying.

The Divine purity of holiness is absolute, but it is not so with man; but he may be presented blameless." The Holy Spirit in the heart is like a celestial savor to sweeten and give completeness. Daniel's peace in the lion's den was the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Spirit. So we may be kept by the power of God, as vessels of glory. Born in an age of the Spirit, let us worship the Spirit and worship in Truth. This is the principle of the Friends.

Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

annah F. Wood accompanied her husband, Fry Wood, and on one occasion addressed advice to a collection of Indians which well received: the more so probably as it is seldom our women Friends have thus been in their public gatherings.

is was the last general visit performed by nezer Worth among these Indians whose are he had had almost continuously at t for more than thirty years. In the fol- g summer he passed peacefully away on 16th of the Sixth Month 1877, in the ty-fourth year of his age. His memo- ia and letters written during his residence ennessa, as has been previously mentioned, e published in "THE FRIEND" vol. 52, etc., ve an inter sting insight into many of exercises through which he passed in his ts to promote the welfare of those by m he was surrounded.

the death of Thomas Wistar had taken place e months previously viz: First Month 16th, 3, and the removal of these two Friends, rther with that of Joseph Scattergood, who jointly and earnestly labored with them is field, was deeply felt, and is thus re- ed to in their report to the Yearly Meeting e Committee in 1878. "Upon various sions it has been interesting to olserve that Indians, on learning of the recent decease me of our valued friends and so-laborers, e shown their sense of the loss they have eely sustained; some of them shedding tears e remembrance of the long and faithful ices which they had rendered to their peo- "

Her name was Phebe Boan. They ark "During her last illness which was of e months continuance her expressions indi- ed an humble submission to the will of her ewly Father, a tender solicitude for the al welfare of those by whom she was ounded, and a peaceful trust that through ove and mercy of her Saviour all in the e would be well. pointed by the Government under the Act of 1875, to define the limits of the villages, were extended to include the survey and marking of the boundaries of the Allegheny Reservation, which was a useful and needed work. After its completion the Seneca Counsellors in 1877, requested the Secretary of the Interior to have the boundaries of the Cattaraugus Reservation also surveyed and marked. In performing this work the Surveyor was furnished with a memorandum of the original lines of the Reservation as his guide, these he traced and found that they included a tract one mile wide and six miles long, and two others each of one mile square, which had been sold by the Indians in 1826, but which sale had never been formally ratified by the Senate of the United States, and had thus not been officially recognized. This reopened a question which was a new one to many of the present generation, and the Committee was applied to by the Indians to give their judgment as to whether they should make an effort to recover these lands by legal process. As it was not disputed that payment had been received by the Indians years ago in fulfillment of the agreement with the purchaser the Committee discouraged the attempt; but their advice was disregarded. The result was a suit at law, which some years after was ended by a decision confirming the title of the white occupants. The cost of the resurvey of the Cattaraugus Reservation performed by Charles E. Fink the surveyor above referred to, was paid out of funds belonging to the Seneca Nation. The work was completed in 1878, and showed the area to be according to the original boundaries 27,097 acres. The tracts which had been sold [in 1826] once belonging to this Reservation contained 5,120 acres, leaving its present area of 21,977 acres.

Among the many evils to which the Indians are exposed is that of intemperance, to which they seem peculiarly liable. On this account the production and use of cider among them has been found of great disadvantage. One of the Friends at Tunesassa writing Third Month 11th, 1878 says "it appears that every white man near the Reservation that can get a barrel of cider will sell it to the Indians, and many of them get very drunk on it, and they are so anxious to get it that they will pay any price for it that is asked. I believe many men up and down the Reservation do this kind of robbing the poor Indians besides the taverns . . . we have found it necessary to refrain from letting the Indians have vinegar because we found out they used it for drink."

Daniel Sherman, Agent for the Indians at that time, in his report for 1880 says "the principal source of intemperance among the Indians in this Agency arises from the sale to them of hard cider and liquor disguised in it. This traffic produces a great deal of demoralization among the Indians, and frequent complaints are made in relation to it. The hard cider not only makes them drunk but very quarrelsome, causing frequent breaches of the peace. I think that section 2339 of the Statutes of the United States should be amended so as to include by its terms prohibition of sale to Indians of all intoxicating beverages, including cider and beer that intoxicate."

It has been gratifying to know that Congress passed in 1892 an amendment to the laws prohibiting intoxicating drinks to the Indians so as to include the prohibition of ale, wine, beer or intoxicating liquors of any kind. The introduction of these or of ardent spirits into the Indian country was then made punishable by imprisonment of not more than two years, and by a fine of not more than $300.

Notes in General.

L. L. Loyd writes an interesting letter from Foochow, China, on the enlightening of that great country, in which he says: "The new generation of Chinese is well aware of their country's backwardness and ashamed of it, and Christianity is making steady progress."

A man eighty years old, who, by reason of his lineage and age has been the recognized head of the Confucianists in the part of Korea where the Presbyterian Mission has been holding evangelistic services has now accepted Christianity. His son has long been a Christian and a church leader.

W. J. Dawson confesses freely that he has been heard almost entirely by professedly Christian people while in America. It is believed by many that W. J. Dawson would prefer to preach and labor among "the masses of the transgressors," in some common hall in some one great city.

New York is the largest single mission field in the world to-day. It is estimated that only one-third of its population, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, is under Christian influence. The foreign-descent population in New York is larger than the whole of Chicago's population, and they read thirty-six daily newspapers in foreign tongues. Congregationalism carries on religious services in fourteen languages.

There is in press an important book by an English Friend, Joshua Rowntree, entitled "The Imperial Drug Trade." This book contains an historic sketch of the Indo-Chinese Opium Trade; an examination of the proceedings and report of the Royal Commission on Opium; and a survey of the more recent evidence upon the traffic, and the effects of the opium vice in China in the light more especially of the new developments in the East.

Who shall deny that the gramophone has reached the summit of fame? The British Museum, that wonderful institution which is an encyclopedia of the cosmos, has decided to collect and keep gramophone records of the voices of the most eminent singers and publicists. They will be for the use and will be of nickel and practically indestructible. From these playing records can be stamped at will. The phonograph, otherwise named the gramophone, was invented in 1877 by Thomas Edison.—Christian Advocate.

MORTALITY AMONG SENATORS.—Within fifteen months six distinguished senators have died: Marcus A. Hanna, of Ohio; Matthew S. Quay, of Pennsylvania; George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts; Wm. B. Bate, of Tennessee; Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut; and General Joseph K. Hawley, whose death came two weeks after his retirement from the Senate by reason of physical disabilities. By general consent Senator Platt is regarded as having "rivaled Senator Hoar as an influence in the Senate's daily work." These were all able men; there will be almost universal consent as to the one who leaves the least desirable reputation.—Christian Advocate.

THEY KNEW THEIR SHEEP AND THE SHEEP KNEW THEM.—The Sydney Bulletin says that without losing a single animal, seven shepherds recently drove a flock of 14,000 sheep from Mungana, in Queensland, to Narrabri, in New South Wales, a distance of nine hundred miles.

What life such a statement as this gives to the illustrations used by Christ concerning the true shepherd and the hireling! What care these seven shepherds must have taken of this flock! How closely they must have looked after the lambs! With what vigilance they protected them from the pack, appeared to their fears, prevented straying, brought back those that had wandered, and moderated each day's work!—Christian Advocate.

"CANNED PRAYERS."—Extraordinary interest on the part of Presbyterian ministers attaches to the printed forms for public worship just reported by a General Assembly committee, of which Henry Van Dyke, of Princeton, is chairman. The report is really a prayer book. The object is not, it is said by the committee, to urge the Presbyterian Church to adopt a liturgy, much less to make the use of a liturgy compulsory, but to provide forms for public worship for those who ask them. It is declared that there is no rule to prevent ministers from adopting and using the book if they can get copies and care to do so.

The opposition to the prayer-book committee's report comes from the conservative element, the same as were frightened by the word "cathedral" in Justice Harlan's plan for a great Presbyterian place of worship at the National Capital. These conservatives fear the adoption of a prayer-book, and even its permissive use, might be a step toward Anglicanism or even Romanism. There is declared to be no such tendency in the Presbyterian body. At Winona a Missionary League in service on the anniversary of the Wesleyan, said in private conversation that Western people got on with "canned meat," "canned vegetables," canned almost everything, but he was sure they would bolt at "canned prayers." The purpose behind the committee's report is said to be the desire for uniformity in Presbyterian forms of public worship. Were the proposition put forward to adopt a liturgy it is said it would be overwhelmingly defeated, but in the present permissive form the feeling of leaders is that it can do no harm. But how long would the permissive form of a downward step remain permissive only? The principle of ritualism once being conceded by a church to be truth in worship, there is nowhere over the whole field of its public worship a place to draw the line on the ground of principle.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The recent action in favor of good government by the mayor of Philadelphia and his ardent supporters has dismayed the "machine" politicians. Several prominent officials identified with the "organization" which has for years controlled the administration of public affairs both in this city and in the State have been dismissed from the public service, and others appointed to their place. It is now necessary to institute a rigid inquiry in methods by which fraudulent votes have been cast in late elections by the connivance or direct assistance of policemen. A movement has been begun to secure in future the election of honest officials, and other reforms including the repeal of the act passed by the late Legislature to curtail the power of the mayor.

President Roosevelt has lately had an interview with the Russian Ambassador at Washington, Cassini, in which he offered his services towards ending the war between Russia and Japan. A despatch says the President informed the Ambassador "that he earnestly hoped for an early peace in the Far East, and that in expressing this hope he voiced not only his strong personal sentiments and those of his Government, but he believed these were held by all the Powers. His opinion was that it would be a mistake for Russia to continue the war. In addition to the suffering entailed by the naval conflict, he did not believe that Russia has anything to win in prolonging hostilities."

"What Japan's probable peace terms would be the President was wholly unable to say, but he did not hesitate to express the opinion that, difficult as these conditions might prove in the light of such a victory as that gained in the Korean Straits, they would increase in severity with every day that a state of war continued."

The German Ambassador in Washington is reported to be using every possible effort for protection of the German Emperor in conjunction with the President. The President has designated Charles Jerome Bonaparte, of Baltimore, to be Secretary of the Navy.

It is stated that an adjustment of the toasters' strike in Chicago by mediation seems as remote as it did two months ago. Peace negotiations have been abandoned for the time being, and the firm is involved in the trouble refuse to concede anything further in the controversy, which they now regard as a thing of the past.

For several years past a systematic effort has been made to fit the youth of the Cherokee nation of Indians for the profession of teaching. It is stated that there are now 175 Cherokees teaching schools in the Indian Territory, who have passed through a course of study and examination for this call.

The eleventh annual meeting of the Lake Mohawk Conference lately held, adopted a platform of principles in which it is stated that during the past year numerous special treaties of arbitration have been concluded, and are now in force. The Hague Convention commands increasing confidence among civilized people, its purpose and scope are better understood, its provisions have been resorted to with success in cases of great difficulty, as in the settlement of the North Sea incident, and we now have a confident assurance that the tribunal which it has established will become of increasing importance in maintaining the peace of the world.

"We are highly gratified with the efforts of President Roosevelt in promoting the cause of international peace and justice, and we rejoice in his call for a second conference at The Hague."

"We view the treaty now in force between the Kingdom of Denmark and the Netherlands, to submit all their differences to arbitration, as presenting the ideal toward which we are moving."

"The evolution of the movement for universal peace clearly points to the early establishment of an international parliament, and to the best advisory powers, as a necessary agency in its fulfillment, and to renew our declarations of last year in reference to this. We feel that it is not now expedient for this conference to pass any judgment upon the plans of organization of such parliament beyond the necessity for the representation of all civilized nations therein."

The United States Board of Geographic Names was created by an executive order issued by President Harrison in 1890. The order called attention to the numerous instances in which there was a variation in the orthography of geographical names, causing much inconsistency as to Government publications. The function of the Board is to fix the spelling of geographical names in the United States, and in those instances it applies its rules to towns in foreign countries.

It is said that more than twenty-eight million new Jews now live in New York City than in Jerusalem.

FOREIGN.—The recent battle between the Japanese and Russian war vessels in the Straits of Korea resulted in a general destruction of the latter by the Japanese. It is reported that thirteen Russian battleships were sunk and six were captured. The number of men killed, drowned and captured is estimated to be over 6000. This crushing defeat has produced a feeling of gloom throughout Russia. A despatch says:

"The Emperor was completely prostrated by the news, and he has been unable to get up and to weep."
"A large portion of the officers and sailors of the fleet were residents of St. Petersburg, and evidences of expectant grief are seen on every hand. Wives and families are besieging the Admiralty and are visiting the churches to pray for the escape of their loved ones."

It is believed that in this battle the Russians have lost more than 100,000 men, and for many years to come."
The Japanese losses, as reported from Tokio, are three torpedo boats sunk, three officers killed and about 200 men killed or disabled.

Rojstevsky the admiral commanding the Russian fleet was taken prisoner, and is reported to have been sent to the United States.

It is stated that the Czar and his immediate advisers have determined to prosecute the war, notwithstanding the demands for peace made by a large proportion of his subjects in various countries. A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 5th, says:

Members of the Diplomatic Corps expressed their pleasure that President Roosevelt had taken the lead in trying all assemblies and congresses, to suspend indefinitely societies, leagues and other bodies manifesting pernicious activity, and to take all other steps necessary to preserve order, so as to prevent interference with the established regime and to suppress the revolutionary propaganda.

The Tsar has vested Governor General Troppoff with dictatorial powers to suppress the revolutionary propaganda in Russia.

"General Troppoff is given the right by the ukase to close all assemblies and congresses, to suspend indefinitely societies, leagues and other bodies manifesting pernicious activity, and to take all other steps necessary to preserve order, so as to prevent interference with the established regime and to suppress the revolutionary propaganda."

It is announced that tobacco has been discovered by De la France, a French physiologist, having a sedative action upon the auditory nerves. He therefore cautions moderation in the use of the drug, and avoiding it altogether where deafness has already begun.

A. M. G. Himalaya, a young Portuguese, is the inventor of a solar belt machine, which has the power of converting the sun's heat into a temperature of 6800° Fahr. By this instrument he finds an appreciable heat in iron, Mercury, Venus and Jupiter.

The surface of the machine that gathers the rays 6,117 times the area of the small heating surface on which they fall, this being the centre of a steel crucible lined with magnesia. This alone is able to endure the intensity of the heat, and the magnesia being able to melt iron oxide, silver, quartz, glass and fire-brick, is even to reduce plumbago to a liquid state. Only limchalk and magnesia have proved able to withstand the extraordinary temperature. By a clock-work arrangement the apparatus is made to point towards the sun during its progress in the sky.

A method for increasing the usefulness of lumber it is announced has been perfected in England. The method consists, in replacing the air in wood with a solution of beet sugar and removing the excess of water by a subsequent drying.

It is claimed that timber treated in this way is stronger porous, will not shrink or warp, and is stronger heavier and more durable, and is not liable to dry rot.

It is said that paper floors are growing in favor in Germany. They have no joints to harbor dust, fungi, or vermin, and feel soft under foot. They are also cheaper than hardwood floors. The paper is spread in the form of paste, rolled, and, when dry, painted to imitate wood.

Public Weddings.

Presented in these columns last week is a commendation which the Christian Statesman gave of the marriage rules of Philadelphia at a recent Meeting, and the whole grouping of them which the editor of that journal deemed it a public service to exhibit to the Christian church and to the world, as a wise provision for "The Protection of the Marriage."

Now we find the editor of a Trenton journal protesting, in unity with an Episcopal clergyman of Delaware, against wedding rehearsals at church edifices, on the ground that these rehearsals are the product of a spirit of ostentation, and cater to unseemly display. "In the health of display, often vulgar and ostentatious, a rehearsal seems to be a necessity, and a dress rehearsal must precede some of the most elaborate theatrical performance. In the presence of the sacredness and dignity of the occasion is well-nigh lost. . . . One of the reasons why marriage is no longer a serious matter, and why divorce is so common, is that the wedding ceremony has lost its solemnity and its consequent binding power."

The solemnity of the Friends' marriage ceremony is rather of the sacred covering of the marriage resting over a rightly held Friends' meeting in which a marriage is witnessed, is probably a matter of remark among beholders unaccustomed to our assemblies for worship. Such solemnity is likely to be preserved, inasmuch as the lust of show does not so grow as to supersede it. By turning the occasion of a spectacle, its solemnity must become dissipated under worldliness and curiosity, and a wedding conceived in vanity be robbed of its title to be called a religious marriage.

Sometimes our young people are beguiled into the employment of a human priest on the occasion that if the union is to be blessed it must be a "religious" marriage. But what marriage could be more religious than that which seeks the highest Priest, the One Mediator between God and man, Christ Jesus the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, to be himself the veritable and immediate High Priest of the marriage profession and solemnization? And He who is Head over all things to his church and people, being invoked and waited upon as their spiritual authority, and the minister of their holy covenant before the people summoned as witnesses, such a ministrations should be enough to satisfy any couple that a marriage beginning, preceding and concluded in Him as the true intermediary between them and God, lacks nothing of religiousness for a seal of "What God hath joined together." With Him as minister of the covenant all vital parts imaginable for a priest are performed, and without Him every priest is a thing of naught. Where Christ is not the sufficient one, the substitutes for Christ are a mockery. What mode of marriage under heaven among men is laid open more directly and genuinely to the very religion and Spirit of Christ than that of Friends?

All that detracts from the sense of his ministrations in the simple truth, all show or refinement of rubbish added, whether these be regalia or imposing personages, spectacular bits for admiration, appeals to the lust of the eye and the pride of life, are so distinctly "not of the Father, but of the world," that they who desire a "religious marriage" will hardly wish to divorce it from religion by these things. We are willing the wedding should have any wine that Christ fills its vessels with, but let it be Christ's wine and no human intoxicant, even that spirit which He would drink anew with us now in His kingdom.

But to dispense with marriages in Meeting on the ground that the publicity invites to greater display, by no means crucifies the root of pride in any. With or without its opportunity, the root of pride is there till eradicated by the gospel life. The suppression of a temptation during its opportunity is a straight step towards overcoming its power.

A tenderness should be felt for the wedding couple whom we require to be set before the congregation for the sealing of their covenant.

It is no light sacrifice for them to lend themselves to public observation for an hour in a most critical event of their lives. Their hearts then are peculiarly sensitive to what may occur there, and to whatever might jar on the feelings of invited strangers. Then, if not before, they want the comfort of the covering of a pure devotion which shall not be marred. Very solemn are the possibilities of the great future involved in the mystery of that hour. Under such conditions, to hear the occasion used for attacks on other denominations, or for teaching rather than for worship, becomes a discouragement to the holding of weddings in public meetings, except the deliverance be unmistakably under Divine authority and the anointing of the excellent oil. Yet by no means should we make the susceptibilities of hearers at weddings or at funerals the rule of gospel utterance; but the true Master of assemblies, kept to with the eye single to his spirit, will not hurt the oil or the wine in any, in speaking to their condition. Submitted to Him, the public meeting for worship as a place for a marriage becomes highly valuable for Christ's further ministrations in bearing witness for the truth.

THOMAS LOW.—In the year 1668, died that eminent minister of Christ, Thomas Low, concerning whom the Friends of Ireland have left the following testimony: "He was a man of an excellent gift, sound, clear and powerful in his ministry, elegant in speech, sharp and quick in his understanding, and his testimony was very convincing, to the stopping of the mouths of gainsayers. Much people flocked after him; many Friends up and down this nation received their conviction by him, and many were by him confirmed in the Truth. He was often in meetings engaged by priests and opposers of Truth, in which exercise he was as a sharp threshing instrument in the hand of the Lord to confound them. In conversation he was sweet and pleasant and sympathizing with friends under afflictions, in which state, year, and in all states, he had a word in season to administer. He travelled this land very much, visiting it several times from England, and was several times a prisoner for his testimony to the Truth. He was freely given up to spend and be spent in the service of the gospel, and in his last visit to Ireland his natural strength was much impaired; after which when his service was over, he returned to England and laid down his body in great peace, singing praises to the Lord on his death bed." ## A Visit to Algeria.

Another event has happened, like all the rest, an event of my life. All this while we have been trying to get near the Arabs, to understand them, to forget our own civilization and to comprehend theirs. We have seen them in the desert, in the field, in their homes, in the street, the market, playing dominoes and the lady's game, in the cafés and the dancing girls, smoking keef, smoking hashish, in their mosques, at prayer in the desert, but always (with a few rare exceptions) it has been as though we gazed at some curiosity, some wonder. We could not tell just how they were feeling, how they were thinking. Nothing in our own lives brought us in touch with theirs; so it always seemed. Last night it was different—we were one with them, we understood them.

We had arranged with Safti to go to hear the poets read by an old man, who every night in one of the native cafés draws about him a great crowd. We started immediately after dinner. The reading had begun. The room was a large interior of earth, walls and floor, with practically no furniture but mats. Two kerosene lamps illuminated the place. In a corner was what answered for a stove—an opening in the wall where coals were piled, and in which the delicious café maure is prepared. On the floor, on the earth, divans, along the wall, everywhere, the Arabs sat with their feet crossed under them. Two boys in turbans and balloon trousers noiselessly carried coffee to those who wished it. With difficulty we made our way to a point near the reader. A table with low benches was produced for us; we sat down. At our appearance the reader saluted us with courtesy, then continued.

For a long, long while I could not take my eyes from him, he held me spellbound. He was sitting on a table, his feet under him. Before him was a candle, by whose light he read. He wore spectacles. The book was in his right hand, he resticulated continually with his left. His reading was rapid, smooth, intensely eager. He seemed to devour the pages as they turned. His face lighted up with an almost wild enthusiasm. Frequently he turned to those sitting nearest him, explaining the text. Several times he called out a hearty laugh from his listeners. Always before we have seen the Arabs calm, passive, utterly indifferent. But here was the opposite extreme. His long sinewy arms spoke with his voice, his whole being seemed alive, on fire.

He was reading a history of the Mussulman's conquest of India. Frequently the author broke into verse. These passages he rendered with peculiar ardor. A collection was taken up. Into the plate copper coins were dropped here and there by the listening Arabs. Only a few gave anything—our men put in something worth while. Our coffee was brought. It was so delicious that my mind came back to sense impressions, so I could look at the audience. No European audience would certainly have looked as this did, had it been listening. Some were rolling cigarettes and smoking them; others were smoking keef—others drinking coffee, but over all was silence and the very spirit of attention. One felt one's self in the presence of men—men of intelligence, men of fire, who, if a sufficient impulse came, could rise and do big things.

At last the reading was over. We expressed our desire to shake hands with the reader and personally to thank him. He called to and beckoned the man, who rose on his table, jumped to the floor and came to us. We saw at once, what we had not suspected as he read, that he was old. His garments told the story of his poverty, but his face told the story of his mind. He shook our hands, thanked us for our interest. The men each pressed a five franc piece into his hand, his face took on an almost awed expression, then it lighted up. He shook hands again, bowing very low. We took our leave and came out under the bright stars.

I had quite a confidential talk with Safti yesterday. M—— had gone out with a Philadelphia woman, who is here for a few days. I was writing in my room. He came up to bring something that had been ordered. I asked him in, for I wanted him to write some Arabic sentences in Arabic and in French for me. One was the cry of the muezzin from his minaret. Safti took the pen, saying: "I will do it for Mademoiselle, even though it is forbidden by the Koran." I hastened to make him understand that I would not dream of asking him to do what was forbidden him. He answered simply, "Dieu will pardon me; I am father of a family; I do everything my clients wish." Then the delicate matter being broached, he said, "Mademoiselle will understand, I know Madame and Monsieur are very good; they have given me already, but will they not give me more? I am father of a family. This is a very bad year. No one comes; I can make very little. Last year I saved three hundred francs, this year there is nothing." I assured him that I knew nothing of what they would do, but I thought he would be satisfied. Then I showed him the Arabian Nights, the Koran and Life of Mohammed lying on the table. His face lighted up. I asked him many questions of what they teach in the schools, what they believe, etc. Every Arab is a born story teller. He was delighted to have a listener. He rolled a cigarette, leaned back in his chair and began telling many stories—some that I know, but the charm of his telling I did not know. At last he rose, saying, "Mademoiselle wishes to write; I will leave Mademoiselle."

One day when we were out he said to me—the others were some way behind—"I want to go to Tunis; does mademoiselle think that madame would take me to Tunis? I want to buy a new costume; I have not been away for a long time. I have a friend in Tunis. I will show everything I know, Timgrad and Carthage. Madame will find guides who cannot be trusted. I will go third class; it will not be very expensive." I laughed and said, "No, I do not think she will take you." He said, "But Mademoiselle will ask madame; that will be very nice of mademoiselle." I did not need to, however, for he asked himself the first opportunity he had. "Will not Madame take me with her to Tunis? I will go third class; it will not be very expensive. I will show Timgrad and Carthage—madame will find guides." Madame, however, laughed and said, "You will have to arrange that with the messieurs." Safti shook his head and waved his hand discredulously, saying, "No, I understand very well how it is with Europeans. I, madame wishes it, I shall go with her to Tunis. Monsieur always does what madame wishes.

On the road to Sidi-Okba he made the same proposition to W., saying, "I would like very much to go to Tunis. You are nice people, like you; we understand each other; we are happy together; will not monsieur take n with him to Tunis?"

So we get the different sides of these people. The naïveté of their natures contrasts strongly with their stalwart forms and majestic bearing. There is a dignity and calm about the quite unlike the most reposeful European. It arises from their profound confidence in their power that protects, that watches over them; its whole philosophy is summed up in the few words Safti said as we walked home one evening from old Biskra. Speaking of some trivial matter he said, "If God wills it is well; if He does not will it is well, it is well." To night we came he said, "It is God who sees you here." "Yes, I said, "I believe it." He turned quickly, "Mais, oui Mademoiselle (Why, of course, mademoiselle, God does everything). It is the same calm assurance in a Divine power that keeps them from grudging exertion—that gives them the languid poise and their deep repose of manner. Why should they exert themselves—why should they strive and attain? In this Garden of Allah, the children of the sun, what do they need to do? With almost no effort nature produces what they need, they want for nothing, why should they struggle? But of course the touch of European civilization since the occupancy of the French, is changing them. Slowly, to sure, but surely they too, are being transformed. The desire is coming into them to see the world to travel, to make money. Some are ambitious for his son, wants him to get fine position in a big city where he can make money. He will not be satisfied with the bread earth home of his father—and his sons his sons' sons? One does not know what these indolent people of the Sahara may do day become.

[A time of calm may misrepresent their behavior when aroused]. The other night when turning from Sidi-Okba, I at first innocently thought that all his suggestions that we should ride came because he was tired. He was fit I knew, though he would not own it. Just sunset a Frenchman and servant came along in a carriage with two horses. They stopped and asked us to ride. Safti looked long at me. There were still many miles of desert before the first oasis. Night would come there were Bedouins. "Oh, no," I said, "for anything! Besides, that is what I want—the night on the desert. I'm no the least afraid." So the man drove on looked at Safti. He tried to be cheerful said, "But you're not afraid, Safti, then no danger?" He shrugged his shoulder: "est-ce que je peux dire, . . . ? (What can I do these Bedouins are wild fellows, they are less, they do not care." Then I remember the conversation of the morning and the subject.

A TRUE friend nobles freely, and justly, assists readily, adventures boldly, takes all patiently, defends courageously, continues a friend unchangeably.

THE SILENT MEETING.

lines written by a young woman Friend after a "silent meeting."

"Silent!" then ye heard not My beloved's greeting!
Heard not how we kept our trust,
The parting and the meeting!

Heard ye not my moaning,
As I told my sorrow?
Nor his blessed word of hope,
"Joy upon the morrow."

Heard ye not the whisper
Of my soul confessing?
And his faithful "I forgive;
"Peace to thee and blessing."

Then indeed was silence!
Surely you could hear it
With its low Amen, Amen—
Falling on my spirit.

The Amen grew louder
Like an anthem pealing,
As it answered to the voice,
All his will revealing.

Will—that I should suffer,
Share his crown of sorrow,
Loving service give to-day—
Reign with Him to-morrow."

Heard ye that "to-morrow,"
As the angels o'er us
Sang in hallelujah loud—
The triumphant chorus?

Heard ye that "forever,"
As in holy vision
My Beloved bore my soul
Far to faith's fruition?

Heard ye his low promise?
"Never will I leave thee!
Be thou faithful unto death, Crown of life I give thee!"

Oh, then call not silent
Hour so full of singing!
Even now from wall to wall Hear the echoes ringing.

the Isolated Members of West Branch Monthly Meeting, Iowa.

Dear Friends:—Feeling impressed with a sense of gratitude for the many favors our heavenly Father has shown us from time to time, we are at this time in loving remembrance of you who are not so as to meet with us. We feel it a great privilege to meet together and realize his presence amongst us, near and unworship by us are! We feel we are not dealt with according to our iniquities through his wonderful Love! By the all sufficient Sacrifice, the Gift our Heavenly Father gave, a way of escape was made for us. Upon Calvary's Mount, between earth and Heaven, was suspended the only begotten Son who said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto me." By His death we have access to Life, and by His sacrifice it was made possible for all to enter into the Holy of Holies. We have such a Father, full of compassion and ready to receive the cry put up to Him, from every land on every tongue! The struggling servant of God, who desires to be under the shadow of His wing, realizes that his worst enemy is within his own breast. Right here, dear friends, is one of the beautiful features of the Christian religion we profess: "But the anointing teaches you of all things and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye abide in Him." And the Psalmist said "God is everywhere" and in the Book of Books it is written "The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart." It is only as we as individuals draw near unto Him in humble contrition of soul, and have our minds turned inward, that we can receive strength. He is touched with a feeling of our infirmities, and we believe He is willing, yes, waiting to give more than we are willing to ask!

Dear Brothers and Sisters, we want to encourage you in every good word and work; knowing that the dear Master has the power and will keep all that you commit to his charge, and if you commit all his promises sure. His love is infinite and his promises sure. We are sure there are no such wages paid as those that come from the great Husbandman. We have the joy of them in this life, besides they bring a well grounded hope of those in the life to come. To be able to meet these, to do well the work He plans for us, is certainly the one thing needful." We feel assured that the dear Master has many up and down in the land who are striving to honor Him, and He does own and bless all those who rightly gather to Him. The fields are already white unto harvest! May we be faithful in all things; for individual faithfulness is so needed: by it the Church may come forth "leaning on the arm of her beloved, fair as the moon, clear as the sun and terrible as an army with banners." "Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Christ Jesus."

This life is intensely real! The same power is abroad that raised Lazarus, the friend of Jesus: that kept Daniel from the lions: the three Hebrews in the furnace; that kept before the children of Israel a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night—neither is his ear grown heavy or arm shortened. We realize that all we can do for you is to stir up the pure mind by way of remembrance of these things. Our love for you is unbounded. We crave that you may be alienated from the world; that you may have oil in your vessels, your lights trimmed and burning. Time here is short: this is not our home.

May you have grace to live, grace to wait, grace to act—so that each day may find you nearer our Father's house than the day before.

In loving remembrance and a craving desire, that you with us and we with you, may be able to be presented faultless, and a complete and unbroken band, into that house not made with hands eternal in the Heavens, we are your friends.

THE POPE ON THE BIBLE.—"The more we read the gospel, the stronger our faith becomes. The gospels are writings that are valuable for everybody and under all circumstances. I have lived among the common people and know what they want, and what pleases them. Tell them the simplest Bible stories, and you will have attentive listeners and effect blessed results. But it is not only the common people and the lower classes who will profit by the reading of the Scriptures. No matter how many prayer books and books of devotion there may be for the priests, none is better than the gospels. This is an unsurpassed book of devotion."

For The World's Peace.

The eleventh annual Lake Mohonk conference on international arbitration opened the first of its three days' session at the Lake Mohonk House Fifth Month 31st, nearly 400 delegates being present. Every section of the country sent delegates, and distinguished representatives of bench and bar, pulpit, press, statesmanship, diplomacy, and education were present in large numbers. Chambers of commerce and boards of trade of many states also are represented.

Judge George Gray of Delaware, who presided last year, again was called to the chair. Albert K. Smiley, the host, welcomed the delegates and in a brief address outlined the work of the conferences during the past ten years.

Despite the strife in the Far East, he declared, international arbitration had made strides. He asked the delegates to discuss the question in all its forms despite the differences of opinion, which probably existed among the delegates present.

After Bishop Foss had offered prayer, Judge Gray in his address said:

"We would not be worthy of the great cause in which we are enlisted if we were discouraged by some of the untoward events that have happened in the interval since our last meeting. It is true strong hopes were kindled at our last meeting that before we met again we would have been cheered by the ratification of arbitration treaties between the United States and many of the powers signatory to the Hague convention. Such treaties were concluded by the President with France, Great Britain, Germany, Italy, Portugal, Switzerland, Spain, and Austria Hungary. This hope has been woefully disappointed by their failure of ratification by the Senate; but we can congratulate ourselves that no loss of strength on that account has come to our cause. As in the case of the rejection by the Senate of the treaty of 1897, the result has been a widening circle of interest and discussion, and a reanimation of the friends of international arbitration throughout the world.

"It is a significant sign of the progress that the cause of international arbitration has made in the ten years during which these conferences have been held that, in the discussion which preceded the refusal by the Senate to ratify any of the arbitration treaties sent to it by the President, no voice was heard in opposition to the principle of international arbitration, or at least, none important enough or strong enough to gain a national hearing. I would be lacking in frankness, however, if I did not say that there was plausibility in the reason assigned by the majority of the Senate, for its refusal to ratify these treaties in the form in which they were presented.

"The Senate stood upon the proposition that Article II. of each treaty purported to authorize the President alone to make with the other party to the convention, whenever differences should arise between them in the future, an agreement which would be, in effect, a new treaty, submitting that difference to arbitration, and this without the advice and consent of the Senate; in other words, that the executive and Senate together could not, by one treaty, thus confer upon the executive alone the power to make a future treaty. They therefore, amended the treaty by substituting for the word 'agreement' the word 'treaty', so that Article ii. should read, in each individual case, 'the high contracting parties before appealing to the Permanent Court of Arbitration, shall conclude a special treaty, defining clearly the matter in dispute,' etc. This, of course, was intended to make it clear that whenever a difference should arise thereafter between the high contracting parties, such as they had mutually promised should be referred for settlement to the Hague Tribunal, the agreement formulating and defining the same for adjudication should be in the form of a treaty between the two governments, requiring the advice and consent of the Senate.

"Without challenging the sincerity or intelligence of those who adhere to this view, we may indulge the hope that the friends of arbitration in the Senate will find a way by which the government of the United States, through its treaty-making power, may join the other civilized nations of the world in binding itself to submit differences to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at the Hague without requiring the merely subordinate agreement as to procedure in each case to be ratified by two-thirds of the Senate. To say that this cannot be done would argue imbecility and weakness in our federal government.

"It was not to be expected that this great reform and betterment of the world's conditions could be accomplished in the period of a generation. Old prejudices and habits of thought die out slowly. The world does not progress by leaps and bounds. But in the slow process of the ages we cannot fail to see the steady gain of humanity. The ground we have gained we will not lose. No one now seriously controverts the general proposition that international disputes should be settled by arbitration. The Senate of the United States has not dissented, but has in effect approved the first article of the several arbitration treaties presented to it. That article contains the gravamen of the whole matter.

"I hope to live to see the day in the near future when it will be recognized that the national honor is best subserved by righteousness and justice and a love of peace. I hope we shall all live to see the day when the national honor will be most seriously involved for that nation that refuses to tread in the pathway of peace and arbitration."

Benjamin F. Trueblood gave a review of the year's progress. Since the last conference, he said, two new treaties had been signed, bringing the total up to thirty. About half of these have been ratified and are now in force, practically binding all the nations of western Europe together for peace for a period of five years. A significant fact, in the interest of peace, he declared, was that not a single cause for arbitration has as yet occurred among the signatories of these treaties.

Touching upon the failure of the treaties submitted to the Senate, B. F. Trueblood construed it to mean that the United States, for a century the leader in the movement, has for the moment fallen behind in the march. He announced that the Hague court has not settled any dispute during the year. The tribunal chosen from that court to adjudicate the Japanese house tax case, the reference of which was announced here last week, has practically completed its work, and the award may be expected at an early day. Within the year also Great Britain and France, under the terms of the general agreement between them, have decided to refer to the court the disputed question of the French protectorate over the Sultan of Muscat. The arbitration of disputes outside of the Hague court has still gone on during the year, though no important cases have been handled in this way.

"The most noteworthy international pacific settlement of the year," said the speaker, "was that of the North Sea incident between Great Britain and Russia. Though not technically an arbitration the adjustment of the case was made under the terms of the Hague convention, and is therefore rightly to be considered in connection with arbitration proper.

"But for the existence of the Hague convention and the tribunal which it created, it is difficult to see how the crisis caused by the firing of the Russian fleet on the British fishing vessels could have passed without a bitter and disastrous war.

"On the whole the year has been one of gratifying progress for the cause in whose interests we gather here.

"In our constructive work five things must be definitely aimed at:

"1. The bringing of all the Central and South American states into the Hague Court, that it may be in reality a world tribunal.

"2. The conclusion of a general treaty or arbitration among all the independent nations of the world.

"3. The extension of the jurisdiction of the Hague Court to as many classes of cases as possible, with the view ultimately to leaving no sorts of controversies outside of its jurisdiction.

"4. The creation of a congress of nations to meet at stated periods for the regular discussion of all important international questions, that the Hague Court may be fortified and guided by a completer and better system of international law now prevails.

"5. The instruction of the public mind to the settled belief that in our day there are no differences which may arise between nations which cannot honorably and satisfactorily be adjusted by the judicial method."

Lake Mohonk, N. Y., Sixth Month 2.—At a special meeting of the lawyers and jurists attending the arbitration conference here to-day, steps were taken for the formation of an American International Law Society. The proposed organization was strongly indorsed before the conference by Judge Gray and O. S. Straus as a most important advance movement in behalf of international peace. The following platform of principles, setting forth the achievements and purposes of the international arbitration movement, was adopted:

"The eleventh annual meeting of the Lake Mohonk Conference on international arbitration expresses its gratification over the advance made in the cause of the pacific settlement of disputes between nations during the last year. Numerous special treaties of arbitration have been concluded, and are now in force. The Hague convention commands increasing confidence among civilized peoples, its purpose and scope are better understood, its provisions have been resorted to with success in cases of great difficulty, as in the settlement of the North Sea incident, and we now have a confident assurance that the tribunal which it has established will become of increasing importance in maintaining the peace of the world.

"The interests that contribute to the promotion of the cause are ever broadening. Those of the wage earners are finding emphatic expression, commerce is keenly sensitive to disastrous interruptions by war, whether near or remote, the promoters of religion and philanthropy are alarmed at the hindrance of the work by every disturbance of international peace, and the sense of human brotherhood increasingly felt and appreciated throughout the world. These signs of promise show that the long darkness of barbarism is passing away and that the bright day of universal peace is dawning indeed.

"We are highly gratified with the efforts of President Roosevelt in promoting the cause of international peace and justice, and we rejoice in his call for a second conference of the Hague. We confidently expect that a questions of international law that are vague or undetermined will there find solution. We also hope that the conference will frame a general treaty of arbitration that may more effectively meet the requirements of the situation than any special treaty yet proposed have done, and we will be gratified if the indefinite and elastic exceptions matters of national honor and of 'vital interests' shall be substantially modified.

"We earnestly hope that if such a treaty is proposed the treaty making authorities of our government will speedily effect its enactment for this country. We view the trend now in force between the kingdoms of Denmark and the Netherlands to submit all the differences to arbitration as presenting the ideal toward which we are moving.

"The evolution of the movement for universal peace clearly points to the early establishment of an international parliament with at least advisory powers as a necessary agent in its fulfillment, and we renew our declarations of last year in reference to this. We feel that it is not now expedient for this conference to pass any judgment upon the plan of organization of such parliament beyond the necessity for the representation of all civilized nations therein.

"We heartily commend the work of the Interparliamentary Union and rejoice in the zeal and efficiency of the American group of membership. We rejoice that so much strength has been given to the cause of international arbitration by the fact that no country has ever yet repudiated an arbitral award. We believe that the decrees of the international court will be best enforced by the power of public sentiment, and by the fear of the loss of world respect on the part of any nation against whom an unlawful award may be made. The formation of public opinion is an important means for the promotion of every good cause and we desire to encourage all agencies that will further the interests of international arbitration. Especially do we commend the awakening of the students of our universities and colleges in this important matter, as well as the instruction of all the children in our schools."

Daniel C. Gilman presented the report of a special committee suggesting to the universi-

s and colleges of the United States that concerted efforts be put forth to secure among undergraduates early and careful consideration of the principles of international arbitration, and the following persons are to be invited to act on a committee of correspondence to carry out this plan: Ex-Presidents of Columbia, White of Cornell and Gilman of Johns Hopkins and Presidents Angell of Michigan, Eliot of Harvard, Hadley of Yale, Sherman of Virginia, Wheeler of California and Seelye of Smith.

How to Look for Birds.

1. Go alone, and you'll see more, because you won't be talking, and you may listen to things but birds.

2. Go in the early morning, or in the evening; birds rest at noon.

3. Wear old clothes and overshoes or boots, then you may go everywhere.

4. Don't forget your field glasses, then the birds will be tame.

5. Take a notebook and pencil, so that you may write down your impressions on the spot. Your memory might fail you.

6. Make a list of all the birds you see, and your next tramp will be more exciting.

7. When you see an unknown bird, don't forget to see what shape its bill is. Bills are more than noses. Sketch bills; that's the only way to see.

8. To arouse a bird's curiosity, kiss your hand; the dullest bird will crane his neck.

9. Move slowly; quick movements excite birds.

10. Keep off dry twigs—they are noisy.

11. Go under low branches instead of brush-patch them. A waving branch means wind; a stirred one means life—and every bird knows it.

12. If the mosquitoes will permit it, sit up somewhere and keep "perfectly" still half an hour (to begin with); then you may see a bird before he sees you.

13. Think about what you see.

14. Don't feel discouraged after your walk; you don't see much. The walk was good for you.

15. Don't wear a white waist. Now things are green, brown or gray.—Primary Education.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

"IN HIS CARE."

Forwarded to THE FRIEND by an acquaintance of the writer, who had recovered from a serious illness at Lewes, Delaware.

do not know what God may hold for thee in a store; But I can leave thee in his care for evermore.

Each day may bring in the new year; But I am sure He will be nigh to cheer me not read what He hath writ concerning thee: But that his perfect will is best brings joy to me.

How much of sunlight he may send I cannot tell; But in the darkness or in light 'twill Him tis well. I cannot hear the songs that God will teach to thee; at his own hand will strike each chord in harmony. I must not doubt that grief sometime may be thy share.

at Thou dost know on whom to cast thine every care. So now I gladly give thee charge concerning thee! And he makes answer, That his own safe kept shall be.

A Visit to Japan.

On Seventh-day morning, Fourth Month 8th, 1905, the first business session of the Annual Meeting was held, and there was some forty present. The organization is scarcely legal or definite, as one would think desirable. The Executive Committee have all the power of administration. This seems the nucleus of a possible regular Monthly Meeting. Among the reports given it is mentioned that "in some of the meetings the work of the Holy Spirit is especially felt. At other times believers are not always faithful in attending. It is only as God Himself works in the heart that hearts can be blessed. Man's power is helpless in this. It is only as the love of God is revealed in the heart. For the upbuilding of the church a more important thing than money, is man. And more important than man is God working in him to will and to do, without whom we can do nothing. One Suzuki said: "Some time ago I was much impressed with the fact that it was a mistake to be discouraged when numbers are small, or elated when numbers are large."

Gilbert Bowles made remarks which had been a concern on his heart for some time: "Our work is by faith and not by sight. When we look to God it seems bright and more promising than when we look from the standpoint of man. Were there time he would give a review of the history of the religious Society of Friends; but he would give a short statement, to the effect that in George Fox there was given to the world a life of a man of God, and that is the greatest gift in any age. The secret of that life was contained in his realization of Christ being able to speak to his soul's need, and his listening to Him to be guided by Him.

The next great agency in the founding of our Society was Robert Barclay's effort to express that guidance and inspeaking voice of Christ, in intelligent terms as set forth in his "Apology."

Edward Burrough also did a great work, bringing many (it is said thousands) to heed this same principle. He was only seventeen when he began to preach, and died at twenty-eight years in prison.

Several others went forth as evangelists, and finally contributed much towards organizing a Society based upon the views of Fox and the system of Barclay.

William Penn, in his colonization of Pennsylvania, put this into practice in the political life of America,—which is recognized the world over as the work of a great statesman.

Finally, the poet Whittier embodied these spiritual conceptions, this philosophy and this philanthropy, in a temple of simple beauty.

May not the same order of development follow faithfulness to the leading of the Spirit in Japan? We would not suggest that none but Friends are carrying forward this blessed work in Japan. Only one-fourth of the whole population of this country has heard of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and we believe there is a strong duty resting upon us to bring home this blessing.

The greatest comfort comes to me in believing in Universal Light, which prompts a response in the hearts of the hearers to the Divine truth uttered. As on the lantern-slide, so the light of Christ thrown upon or within the heart reveals the picture of our spiritual condition. Are we so foolish as, having begun in the spirit, to finish our Christian experience by some fleshly effort? This way of perfecting will never bring power to our souls; but daily drawing upon the eternal Source of strength, we will depend upon Christ alone for direction; and this it is which perhaps distinguishes the work of our Society from others who have more ceremonies. Bringing to Christ and leaving all for Him to lead and perfect,—this is our part.

The building up of a Society is a further work of the Spirit,—knitting us together as a compact body, that we may work more effectively and comfort one another as in a democracy where all have a part, and in the right to approach directly unto the Father or to one another, know no difference in class, in age, or in experience. We have realized this truth in this annual gathering.

An opinion of the individual must be in submission to the judgment of his brethren, whose wisdom and larger experience may be of service to him in keeping all in harmony. But this does not suppress the individual conscience, which is the inherent right of every Christian believer.

This life of God in the soul is comparable to the growth of seed in the ground, which organizes its own plant-life as it expands.

Each individual has some gift, and must feel his or her responsibility for its use in the service of the church. It is so easy to let some do our portion of the work instead of all doing their respective part. As Paul wished Timothy to stir up the gift which Timothy possessed, so we must try to stir up the flame of faithfulness and willingness to use every gift we may have. Prophets outspokening under the immediate call and impress of God's holy Spirit are much needed in Japan to-day. A live church has prophets, while a dead one has scribes.

OUR THOUGHTS IN OUR ODD HOURS.—Every hour that we are awake our minds are busy. They work without rest or respite. We could not prevent them from working. The only way to make them stop is to go to sleep, and even then they often persist in spite of us in working more wildly even than when awake.

Yet most of this work is done without any guidance or ruling principle. Part of the day we have to work for our minds, which keeps them employed and under discipline; but this is the lesser part of the day, and even when our duties fill up the whole day they are usually of such a character that we can perform them while our minds are more or less free to go where they will.

Perhaps this dissoluteness of thinking is one reason why so few people are capable of reasoning out a problem which presents itself, or of carrying on a connected and continuous discussion. We jump in our thought and speech from point to point or from subject to subject, and scarcely continue for ten minutes on any one line.

Such carelessness of thought, when our minds wander about where they will, has a real effect on character. Loose thinking leads to loose character. Where the mind is unguided and released from discipline, it is too prone to wander where it ought not to go. Into the heart unoccupied with useful meditation or service the evil spirit is eager to come, bringing other evil spirits with him.

What many of us need is to have our minds filled with useful thoughts in these free hours. When the pressure of duty is released, when we go from one task to another, as we are walking upon the street or sit in railroad trains, as we drive or wait, let us keep our minds employed upon good things.—Forward.

The Warrior versus the Saint.

The man of notoriety for the generation has, perhaps, always been the warrior, but the man for the century has always been the saint. Savonarola, Dante, Luther, have outlived all their crowned contemporaries. The story of Buddha's renunciation, of Confucius' devotion to civic reform, of Socrates with his cup of hemlock, of Jesus on Calvary, make vulgar the pyramids, absurd the pomp of royalty, the boast of commerce and the parade of bedizened queens. War's own bitter contribution to history has made for peace. The record it has written in blood is a protest against its method. Even the cannon-makers now justify their nefarious business on the theory that they are making them so effective that they will not be used. The logic of the warrior, the justification of the military, are driven to the last ditch when they offer their armaments as arguments in behalf of the Christmas song of Peace and Goodwill. The argument, to my mind, is absurd, but I rejoice that the armies and navies of to-day have been driven to this logical absurdity. The next step will be a discovery of the absurdity, and then nations will know, what individuals now know, that he who "speaks softly" need carry no club. It is not true that the individual who goes armed with revolvers and bowie knives is the man whose life is most secure and whose property is best protected; the very opposite is the truth.

I do not believe that smokeless powder, dynamite, electric guns and steel warships are peacemakers, but I do believe that those who would perfect them in the interest of peace, whether they be nations or individuals, are in a hopeful way; they are about to see a great light; their spiritual education is far advanced. It is getting harder and harder to precipitate nations into broils. I believe the time is at hand when captains will sheathe the sword, not from want of courage to face the more deadly weapons, not because the race is growing less heroic, but because the judge will supplant the general, and the International Congress will prove more effective than councils of war.—Jenkin Lloyd Jones.

Let us keep our English pure; do not allow a doubtful expression, a slang phrase, a vulgar word, to creep into your speech. Who will preserve the dignity and purity of our English language if it is not our own American English-speaking citizens? Our country is probably destined to be the leading nation of the earth. Let us see to it, then, that good English, in its unaltered purity, is spoken everywhere; in our homes, in school and shop, in market-place and thoroughfare—everywhere let us be on our guard to discourage and to cry down whatever is impure or careless, or in any wise objectionable in oral expressions.—Emily Watson.

I CANNOT, YET I CAN.

I cannot. Yet I can.
For am not I a man?
What is a man but one
Through whom right can be done, Chosen and willed to be,
And brought forth royally?

I cannot. It may be
One path is closed to me.
Its closing opens more Than I had seen before.
Why should I then lament
My way of first intent?

I cannot. I am blind.
Paths close before, behind:
On either side is night,
How know I which is right?
The winds and rain begin,
But is not God within?

I cannot. Yet I can.
This is the strength of man.
Balked hope is not defeat;
Retiring not retreat.
We find the higher way
And victory comes with day.

—Richard H. Thomas.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In the report to the Yearly Meeting in 1877, mention was made of the appointment of Sarah T. Smith by the Superintendent of Public Schools on the Reservation, as a teacher of the day school, about a mile distant from Tunesassa. She was a member of our religious Society, and made her home with Friends at the Boarding School, and occupied this position for several years.

In 1878 a sub-committee of three Friends visited the school, in the course of which they were invited by the Councillors to meet with them and give their judgment upon certain questions which were then agitating them. Some of these arose from difficulties met with in the practical working of the Act of 1875. In this interview the United States Agent, Daniel Sherman, was present, who had for many years shown his interest in their welfare, and who had long been their trusted adviser. After viewing the order and appointments of the Boarding School where they lodged, he observed, "Friends have been a great stay to these Indians."

These Friends visited also the Corn Planter tract, where they were encouraged by the evidences of thrift, following the separate ownership of their lands; and in an interview at the school-house with the Indians residing there, were pleased with the marks of improvement in other directions. One of their valuable women, speaking our language, observed on the occasion, "We all call ourselves Christians now." Afterwards two of these Friends visited the Cattaraugus Reservation, in the course of which they had a religious opportunity with about one hundred and fifty of the Indians in one of their meeting-houses, where they say, "Way being made for us, we addressed the people much to our relief."

The information acquired during this visit respecting the state of feeling on several important subjects in both Reservations, induced the Committee, a few months later (First Month 6th, 1879), to address a letter to the Indians of the Seneca Nation calling their attention to some of them. In this letter after alluding to the troubles which they have in measure, brought on themselves, by leasing their lands individually to white people, a the importance of acting unitedly in carrying out the Act of 1875, they say, "This law was drawn up by some of your best friends to prevent that part of your Reservation from being sold to satisfy the claims of the white people who had leased land; and to secure your rights. Although some of the provisions this law may seem to interfere with the claim of a few private individuals, we believe it strictly just to the whole nation, because your Reservation belongs to the nation as a whole and the leases should never have been made white men without the consent of the nation but have always been a source of trouble, you know. When this law comes to be carried out after 1880, the leases within the limits of the villages will yield a considerable income; which, belonging to the whole nation then be divided, like your annuities, equal shares, among the men, women, and children.

"Brothers, we feel that it is very important that all your men who hold office should be honest, upright men, who will do all in their power to secure the welfare of the nation. They should do this, not only for their sakes, because to do otherwise would be wrong but also for the sake of your children, those who are to come after you. It would be a wicked thing for any of us to rob wives and children of their just rights; strip them of their homes, by not acting as should do, as officeholders. Our Heavenly Father looks down with love upon men who are upright, honest, and true in all they do for their people, and who try to do all they can for the good of their people, without taking anything for themselves. But our Heavenly Father will punish those who are unfaithful to public trusts, and sell the rights of the women and children of their people, for the sake of a little money to put into their own pockets.

"God sees all we do, and however secret we may act, it is all known to Him. He should always live and act as in His sight.

"We know that many white men cheat public affairs, but it will be of no excuse to follow their bad example. Follow the teachings of the Good Spirit, and not the bad of white men, even though they may be great, for God will judge all according to their deeds, at last."

The debt which they had incurred, amounting to several thousand dollars, was also mentioned—the importance of unity and of money of action in their national affairs, temperance and chastity, and the good effect which would be produced by obedience to the dictates of the Holy Spirit.

This letter was committed to the care of three Friends, and a considerable number of copies of it were made, in order that it might be circulated in different settlements, and sent to many of the individual Indians at their homes.

These Friends, on arriving on the Reservation, found the Indians much divided in feeling in consequence of the action of the President, in leasing a large part of their

the Allegheny, for oil purposes, with such privileges and concessions to the lessee as will not endanger their future occupancy and control of it. The President had consequently been impeached, and another one had been appointed by a part of the Councillors for the expired term.

Science and Industry.

hundred years ago the average chest size of men as recorded in tailor's books thirty-six inches, now it is thirty-eight inches.

Field work of the United States topographers at altitudes of 12,000 to 14,000 feet presents special difficulties. With only two-thirds of sea-level atmosphere to breathe, and that so rarifying as to make one's energy seem insupportable, care has to be taken lest heart and lungs be over-stimulated. As the Needles in the crown of a mountain mass which is in the path of the moisture-laden winds blowing overland from the Gulf of California, and thunder storms, accompanied by vivid lightning, are very frequent. On several occasions it happened that Survey topographers were caught on isolated peaks during such storms, where they were (to state the case mildly) strongly impressed by a sense of inquiry on account of their own snapping hair, the sparks emitted from noses and fingers, as well as from the metal parts of their instruments. The quaking of their knees under these conditions they subsequently attributed to powerful electric shocks.

The Israelites of old need not have worried about the item of straw as a material for brick-making if they had only made acquaintance, accidentally or otherwise, with what is today the newest invention in this line of industry—namely, the so-called "sand brick," composed of sand and lime. First importations of these bricks are now reaching this country from Germany, and they possess such advantages in respect of cheapness and durability that they are sure before long to come to a widespread use.

The recipe for making them is simple enough. They are ninety-four per cent. sand and six per cent. lime, and these ingredients, being roughly mixed together by a puddling process, are thereby combined into a semi-fluid material, which is poured into moulds. After drying and coming out of the moulds the bricks thus formed are exposed for four hours live steam, which completes the process of manufacture.

The bricks are exceedingly hard, and so tough that it is scarcely possible to hammer them to pieces.—Saturday Evening Post.

Items Concerning the Society.

William C. Allen is liberated by Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey, for religious service with members within the State, more particularly in the Southern half and especially within the limits of this Monthly Meeting.

The recent issue of the Westonian, containing a list of the addresses given at the annual meeting of the Friends' Teachers' Association is an unusually valuable number.

Also, not having been present, we leave to the members of the Westonian the report, far more satisfactory in its fulness than we could have given it of the annual re-union of the Old Scholars' Association, as held on the grounds of the West-ton School on the 3rd instant.

Tuckerton Meeting, New Jersey, was opened last First-day to a Friends' Meeting which a visiting minister attended; and it is expected to be opened regularly on First-days while temporary residents from Philadelphia sojourn there.

Among the attenders was Hannah Bellows, daughter of the late John Bellows. She has been engaged for two years under a sense of duty in teaching among the Doukhobors in Assiniboia. She is paying a few visits to Friends about Philadelphia, previously to embarking on a fortnight hence for her home in Gloucester, England. Jessie A. Wood, from England, who has been engaged as nurse of the sick among the Doukhobors ever since the visit of Eliza H. Varney to them, was also in Tuckerton, but left her companion, Hannah Bellows, on Seventh-day, proposing to sail for her home on Fourth-day of this week.

The meeting hitherto known as London Yearly Meeting, met this year at Leeds. No fully accredited visitors from other Yearly Meetings were present, but the following were welcomed: William and Susan T. Thompson from New England, Elias and Eliza Rogers and Mary E. Cornell from Canada, Theophilus Waldmeir and his wife of Syria, John Marrossen from Denmark, Joshua L. Bailey, Joel Cadbury and Anna K. Cadbury from Philadelphia, and Anna B. Thomas of Baltimore.

"The Lord Mayor's reception, the evening before the Yearly Meeting opened, accorded a civic welcome to the Friends, gathered from all parts of the country. The Leeds Free Church Council, on the opening day, presented an address recognizing the past and present work of the Friends. All this is in striking contrast to the accompaniments of the Yearly Meeting in London."

A great meeting held in the Coliseum on First-day afternoon was attended by about 2,300, for whom the subject "Christ and Modern Life," served to convey "a broad Quaker outlook on questions of personal and national conduct."

Notes in General.

The free hospital at White Haven, Pa., for poor consumptives is now ten years old, and has maintained 2458 patients. Its sanatorium has cost near $129,000. "We could do much more if we had the money," says Dr. Flick, president, 732 Pine Street, Philadelphia. "We are unable to take half the people who apply to us. There is no nobler work than to save human life and human misery."

More than one-third of the 140 persons who have been incarcerated for non-payment of the education tax in England have been ministers. That distinguished preacher, F. B. Meyer, just before leaving New York for London, said: "With the expectation that I may soon be imprisoned for non-payment of my education rates, I am learning how to use a scrubbrush and how to brighten tins, and I will remain in jail so long as it is necessary, rather than contribute toward priestly teaching in our elementary schools."

The Arabs of Arabia have not yet had the gospel carried to them in vocal ministry. Arabia, "the desert of the sea," is a land difficult of access. Of late years some efforts have been made on the Persian Gulf to evangelize the Arabs. A minister, Forster, who for some years time has been in America, has for many years lived among the Arabs and preached the gospel to them, and he hopes to penetrate to the capital of Arabia with the gospel. He will soon return to his home in Jerusalem, and his work among the Arabs.

THE ORIGIN OF PLACE NAMES.—People with a passion for finding out how things happened—how they came to be as they are—will want Henry Gannett's bulletin called "The Origin of Certain Place Names in the United States. The material has been compiled from various sources, printed and manuscript, and will be of great interest as embodying much local and general history. During the compilation of this work a large correspondence was carried on with State and local historical societies. State, county, and township officers, and individuals in all parts of the country for the purpose of obtaining the necessary information. The greatest interest was shown and much work done by correspondents, who have thus contributed very largely to the work. Much valuable material was collected in this way which otherwise would have been unavailable.

This bulletin, which is No. 258 on the list, is published by the United States Geological Survey for free distribution.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING.—One of the latest bulletins of the Federal Bureau of Labor confirms most of what has been said of late regarding the increased cost of living in this country. It shows that wholesale prices have been steadily advancing during the last four years in the case of most articles of common use. In the case of farm products the average price in 1904 was twenty-six per cent. higher than the average of the years from 1890 to 1899. In the case of fifty-two selected food products the average increase in the last four years was nearly seven per cent. The price of clothing in the same period advanced thirty-two per cent., metals ten per cent., lumber and building materials twenty-four and six-tenths per cent., and drugs, chemicals, house-furnishing goods and miscellaneous commodities ten per cent. What this means for persons on fixed incomes is apparent enough; what it means for wage-workers depends, of course, on the course of wages during the years covered. Hardly any of the latter class, however, can have noted any proportionate increase in their income.

TO JAPAN FOR THE SUMMER.—Already says the Baltimore Herald, there are indications that the tide of tourists is to be diverted toward Japan. The deluge of books Japanese has brought the land of Nippon into the light of reality and has disclosed charms which are enticing to the satiated palates of the intercontinental fitters. Heretofore visitors to Japan have been largely missionaries, merchants, teachers and consular officers. These persons make up the advance tide of modern travel. They are the pioneers of the present who blaze the paths to new fields of delight, new climates, new conditions and new cults.

There is to-day no more attractive and inviting country for American visitors than the Sunrise Kingdom. There is no name so magic or so popular as that which brings to the mind the little fellows in brown with their fertile resources, miniature manners and big ideals.

The sacred mountain that figures in all Japanese art is destined to figure in the calculations of Americans seeking new and attractive routes to travel. Whatever disposition has existed to restrict the entrance of Japanese into this country will be met by the reverse condition, for Japan looms large in the calculations of steamship companies and other promoters of travel. The summer exodus of Americans to Japanese resorts is bound to assume large proportions and bring the two countries into even more intimate connection.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.—We select from an "Open Letter" of E. P. Marvin, of Lockport, N. Y., copied into The Friends' Messenger of North Carolina, a few of his reasons "why the 'great revival' predicted by D. L. Moody and others does not come."

"The destructive criticism, that impairs and undermines faith.

"Our splendid commercial, intellectual and materialistic civilization bewitches the people with a frenzy of money-making, pleasure-seeking and monumental egotism. The Church is apt to become wed in spirit to the State. Christ is crucified between two thieves, business and pleasure. We are passing through the 'Times of the Gentiles.'

"When the Church reaches out for the wealth and sceptre of the world, her spiritual sovereignty and glory depart.

"Christianity was more powerful and victorious on the altar of sacrifice, than on throne of the Caesars. The Church was greater in the Catacombs than in the Cathedrals. She was purer in the humble houses of the Pilgrims, than in the marble temples of the millionaires.

"One of the strongest points in the early Church was that it had so little money; one of the weakest points in the twentieth century Church is, that it has so much.

The popular religiousness of the world like to see Christianity to music and dancing.

"This frivolity and pleasure loving developing a kind of picnic kindergarten religion, is absolutely incompatible with the religion of the Bible. It is self-indulgence and not self-denial.

"The less piety a church has, the more ostentatious, ice-cream and fun it takes to run it, and the faster it runs from God.

"The craze of organization, added to outside lodges, splitting up, confusing and weakening the church with many lettered societies and te-to-tum clubs. This unblest machinery fills the church with the clatter of machinery and the clamor of methods.

"These many superfluous wheels, unanointed by the Holy Spirit, are a dead weight and they present little or no spiritual output.

"God never organized his church as the nexus for a confederacy of societies for miscellaneous purposes but as a compact body for united effort, with the minimum of machinery and the maximum of power.

When we seek to improve on this, we impugn the wisdom of God. We need to energize men and organize less.

"Last, but not least, the multiplication of forms and amateur liturgies, to make up for departed power in worship, the prominence of artistic musical exercises, in which ungodly singers, inspired by lucre, brandy and vanity, shout lies to heaven to entertain the world; the sensational, secular and worldly preaching, changing the emphasis from eternity to time, and hoisting each successive craze of worldliness.

"This unfaithful leadership, masquerading in forms, exploiting entertainment, turning to secular affairs for popularity, and trying to 'run the world,' is a prime cause of the present defection.

"No 'great revival' is possible till the Church and ministry repent, pray, get right with God, and unload the dead weight of about half our church members."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 8th inst. President Roosevelt sent to the Japanese and Russian Governments, through diplomatic channels, the following message:

"The President feels that the time has come when in the interest of all mankind he must endeavor to see if it is not possible to bring to an end the terrible and lamentable conflict now being waged. With both Russia and Japan the United States has inherited ties of friendship and good-will, and he trusts for the prosperity and welfare of each and it feels that the progress of the world is set back by the war between these two great nations.

"The President accordingly urges the Russian and Japanese Governments, not only for their own sakes, but in the interest of the whole civilized world, to open direct negotiations for peace with the another.

"The President earnestly asks that the negotiations be conducted directly and exclusively between the two belligerents; in other words, that there may be a meeting of Russian and Japanese plenipotentiaries or delegates without any intermediary in order to see if it is not possible for these representatives of the two Powers to agree to terms of peace. The President earnestly asks that the Japanese (Russian) Government do now agree to such meeting, and is asking the Russian (Japanese) Government likewise to agree.

"While the President does not feel that any intermediary should be called in respect to the peace negotiations themselves, he is entirely willing to do what he properly can if the two Powers concerned feel that his services will be of aid in arranging the preliminaries as to the time and place of meeting. But if even these preliminaries cannot be arranged, direct negotiations between the two Powers or in any other way, the President will be glad, as his sole purpose is to bring about a meeting which the whole civilized world will pray may result in peace."

It is announced that both Japan and Russia have formally acceded to the President's request that plenipotentiaries be named to meet at the Hague. The United States Government has refused to permit the Russian ships at Manila, after their recent defeat, to make repairs, on the ground that their injuries were inflicted in battle. Admiral Enquist, in command, was ordered immediately to intern his ships or to leave port. The Russian Government has forwarded orders to the admiral to remain at Manila at the disposition of the American Government.

A system of wireless telegraphy has lately been successfully tried between railroad trains in motion and the general offices of the Chicago and Alton Railroad. In commenting upon it President Felton lately said: "It is a system of wireless telegraphy which has ever been used to communicate with persons on a moving train. By this system the dispatcher will be able to reach any train on any part of his division whenever he pleases. Trains running close together will also be able to communicate with each other, as we shall have telegraph communication on all freight trains and passenger trains. With this system of our trains, we believe that it will be impossible to have a collision on our road, no matter what the weather conditions are, as the operators on every train will know the exact whereabouts of every other train on the road. It is our intention to handle commercial messages for our patrons to and from moving trains."

A new train running between New York and Chicago in eighteen hours has been put into service by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. The distance is nine hundred and twelve miles. This is said to be the fastest long-distance train ever scheduled to run as a regular train.

It is stated that the bulletin just issued by the Federal Bureau of Labor shows that the wholesale prices of articles in common use have been steadily increasing during the last four years. The average increase in the price of farm products in 1904 over the average for the years from 1890 to 1899 is 26 per cent. The average increase in the prices of fifty-two articles of food is nearly 7 per cent. The price of cloth and clothing has increased 32 per cent. The increase in the price of lumber and building material is marked, 24.5 per cent.

The Pennsylvania Society for the Prevention of Tuberculosis in this city is to make a free distribution of a pamphlet relative to the disinfection of private houses.

Its instructions in regard to disinfectants are, briefly, as follows:

First. Everything in the sick-room that is no longer useful should be burned.

Second. Eating utensils, bed pans, tinware, linen and wearing apparel should be boiled. It is necessary that the boiling water reach every part of the clothes.

Third. Bedsteads and other furniture should be removed to the yard, and laid to soak in water, drawers removed from the bottom and thoroughly washed.

The strike in Chicago remains unsettled, and disorders attended with injury to life and property continue.

In reviewing the remarkable change in the government of this city which has taken place within the last four weeks, the Public Ledger remarks: "When our grandchild-children are asked that the war was caused by the action of conspirators arrayed themselves under the names of political clubs in the various wards, compelled every city employee to join one of those clubs, forced him to pay a part of his salary, decided who should and who should not be employed by the city, decided the fate of those already employed, and, as a fact, ruled the destinies of the city, for the benefit of the inspirations, who, in city government, they will never believe the story; and yet it is the truth. And more and more incredible will the account seem if it shall be related that the heads and chiefs and the real active workers in these clubs, or many of them, were actually engaged in the treasurable work of stuffing ballot-boxes, and that the only way of saving the city from the people's will under a free government."

Earnest endeavors have been continued to prevent a return to the former condition of political affairs in this city. The mayor has announced the selection of an advisory board of fourteen men prominent in business interests to assist him in dealing with financial questions involved.

A company has been organized to make paper from corn stalks, which it is said can be done at a cost of $22 to $25 per ton. Prof. W. R. Patterson, of the State University of Iowa, is reported as stating that the quality of the paper is equal to that made from rags or wood pulp. The pith, it is said, can also be made into fine paper. Steps have been taken to erect a mill at Kankakee, Illinois, to utilize the sawdust from the mills of the state. Dr. Frederic Schom, a Washington physician, has found that a long sojourn on the coast of Greenland resulted in the cure of tuberculosis in his own case, and he published his experience in a paper entitled "The curability of the Greenland froids to the treatment of tuberculosis." In order to test his theory about the steamer Hercules was chartered to leave for Halifax, the 15th instant for a cruise in the Arctic regions, where Dr. Schom contends the perpetual summer sunshine, healthful and bracing features surpass any conditions in this country for the cure of this disease. The vessel to take a limited number of cases and to return to Halifax about Ninth Month 17.

FORUM.—The delegates to the Zemstvo Conference have lately addressed the Czar in a lengthy document demanding the cessation of the war and certain immediate reforms. It is said the address will not be published in the Russian newspapers, but the following extracts are given in a despatch from St. Petersburg: "The Czar is to be informed that the Russian people are criminal abusers and the negligence of your counsellors. Our army is powerless, and our fleet has been annihilated; but more menacing than this exterior peril the prospect of a civil war waged by your people against the vices of a dangerous and ignorant bureaucracy."

Martial law is to be proclaimed in the north to enable the Czar to reach each you is barred to your subjects. Before it is too late, for the welfare of Russia, command a convocation of representatives of the nation elected by equal franchise, and let those elected representatives decide with you the vital question of war-peace, thus transforming the war into a national effort. Great is your responsibility before God and before Russia in this terrible hour of national trial."

Alfonso XIII, the young King of Spain, has lately been making a visit in England, where he has been warmly welcomed. It is stated that he is the first king of Spain who has ever landed in England.

A despatch from Christians of the 7th says: "Something to-day declared the union between Norway and Sweden to be dissolved, and King Oscar to be longer King of Norway. Resolutions to this effect were passed without debate, and embodied in an address King Oscar, telling him of the action. The Storch declared that the King had ceased to act as king of Norway, and empowered the National Council to act as king of Norway until further notice, and to exert the power heretofore appertaining to the King. These countries were united in 1814. The population of Norway is stated to be about two and a quarter millions, and of Sweden about five millions. It is stated in official circles that arrangements are being made for a national convocation in Norway, and this, it is believed, result in the declaration of a republic.

An order of the German Chancellor Von Bismarck has been issued that all children of slaves born in Germany East Africa after Twelfth Month 31st, 1905, will be free. This part of Africa is said to be twice as large as Germany and to have a population of six millions.

The address of the Editor during the present summer is Pocono Manor P. O., Monroe County,

We cannot always be responsible for the correctness of that which we are persuaded of, we are responsible for faithfulness to our truth. Let us be true, though things now be untrue may sometime, in greater light, be found true. But it is highly important that both what we believe should be true. They are equally correct each other.

Many are cultivating the principle of faithfulness, though on untrue things. We mourn for their superstitions, but commend their personal truth. If they thus learn faithfulness to apprehended truth, great will be their advantage when they reach the condition where truth is nothing but truth to apprehend.

DISPLACED RETIREMENTS—"I would retire my minister at sixty years of age, if I had my way, rather than go on in the way we are now going," said Bishop Lawrence. Well, if the ministers had retired inward at twenty, they would not need to be retired outward at sixty. Spiritual gifts inwardly nursed and outwardly exercised never become effete, but grow in grace through age and experience. But if the standard of ministry is no higher than intellectual talent and religious ideas, then it must wane with outward faculties which run the lecture circuit. If the church prophet had not been submerged in the church executive, this pernicious age-limit heresy would not have arisen. "The aged" was inwardly retired to the fountain of life, else the care of all the churches would have retired him to the outwardness which chokes the word of grace. John at near a century mark was needed for his undying ministry of love and revelation. For ages holy men in whom the world has had most confidence for spiritual counsels have been at the prime of their qualifications at three score. We have indeed, our Fox, Barclay, Burrough, Farnell, Penn, so very efficient for the truth while under thirty, but we would have valued in them the fruit of a long life still more. These were of the spiritual standard. They, as we, would have accepted the bishop's confession that the man-made ministry, wherever it is in vogue, demonstrates its disqualification even earlier, for handling the word of the Lord.

The Organization.

We have been seeing how citizens lose their republicanism in the despotism of "the Organization." Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, which alone has the right to the name of Republican or Democracy, allows its direction to be gradually appropriated by professional managers under an acknowledged Czar, till all republicanism has evaporated and the Machine framed in its forms takes its place.

We have observed places where all that is apparent of Quakerism is the Organization. For that the members live as a society and do not want to hear the word "principles." The Organization is the principles, and these may be dropped, changed, or borrowed from others at convenience. The Society is this year's Machine, and not an embodiment of principles and doctrines which gave it its right to a distinct existence.

These principles gathered around them an organization to conserve and operate them, and the corporate name cannot honestly be applied to cover inconsistent modes and principles which the Society was organized to testify against or stand separate from. Men carry down the frame-work from past generations, and forget that the frame-work is property held in trust for the principles which framed it; that though there be nothing left of them that is insisted on but the doctrine of Peace, and some half-hearted holding to the spirituality of the "ordinances," yet even these tenets are not essential to our being the Society of Friends any longer than the organization practically holds to them. And so, as every foundation must be shaken as "sandy," which is not truth in the living experience of it, so every bond of organization whose links are not principles of unchanging truth inwardly owned, is but a rope of sand. Unstable as water, such a church may get its floating and flitting "results," but shall not permanently excel.

But "principles" too, may be only an organization in some minds. We have feared some were carrying our goodly system of principles in their opinions as a philosophy, and not in their hearts and works as a life. Their logic is correct, their lives are dry. In the orthodoxy of the head only, or of tradition merely, the letter killeth; in the orthodoxy of the heart, which is "the greatest" soundness, "the spirit maketh alive." The orthodoxy of the heart we ought daily to do, and never to leave the other undone.

And at this moment we light upon the following expression of John Wesley so unexpectedly, and in an apprehension of guidance, that we here give them place:—

I will not quarrel with you about opinions. Only see that your heart is right towards God, that you know and love the Lord Jesus Christ, that you love your neighbor and walk as your Master walked, and I desire no more. I am sick of opinions, I am weary to hear them. Give me solid and substantial religion; give me a humble, gentle lover of God and man, a man full of mercy and good fruits, a man laying out himself in the work of faith, the patience of hope, the labor of love. Let my soul be with these Christians, wheresoever they are and whatsoever opinions they are of. Whosoever thus doth the will of my Father in Heaven, the same is my brother and sister.

System-following, whether of outward frame—works as our sole law, or of intellectual construction and observance, if these be used as substitutes for the spirit, belongs to the same idolatry which forgets Him who will not be served with graven images. Yet without adhering to our organic body of truth, which from its foundation has given us our right of existence as a Society under the name of Friends, we become carried to and fro with every other current of doctrine which may cater to the present year's novelty, leave principles to the winds, and render ourselves unprincipled. Our reputation for influence, if we congratulate ourselves on it, we borrow from the steadfastness of those days when ours was a "principled" Society. The public knew what "Friends" stood for. That is not the case now, save in certain localities. The present year's machine, as the sufficient rule of faith and practice (else be called schematics), transfers the seat of authority from within outward, abolishes Quakerism, and substitutes "apparatus for ideals."

A Visit to Algeria.

In the morning he had showed his revolver. "Why, Safti," I said, "do you go armed?" "Always, mademoiselle, at night when I go home I carry two revolvers. It is not safe." "But, Safti," I said, "you do not use them; you would not shoot at a man?" A dark look came over his face. "Mademoiselle must understand, a man must protect his own life—these men are brigands, thieves, lawless ruffians." "But," I insisted, "you never killed a man?" The dark look deepened to one of great pain. Instantly I repented of my thoughtless question. I had not realized what I was asking. Perhaps, too, that lost eye told the story of a death struggle I did not want to know. "Mademoiselle must understand," he began slowly, almost savagely under his breath. "Yes, yes," I said, quickly, I understand, I understand," and spoke of other things. The bright sun chased all sinister thoughts far away, and the night was far too wonderful to admit of fear. I could not conceive of anything of which I could be afraid.

Poor Safti! That night as I came down about nine o'clock for something I had left in the salon, I saw him sitting in a corner, a mere rag of his real self. I went up to him and told him how sorry I was that he was so tired—"And think, mademoiselle, I have still three kilometers to go before I get home?" "But why don't you go home at once," I said. "I never go home till midnight, mademoiselle." "But why; what do you do?" "I stay about the hotel; if any of my clients wish me I am here; if they do not, I sit with my friends."

Evening. Our last in this garden of the sun. I stood long on the balcony watching the last color fade out of the sky. The desert looked of the most intense blue, as though it were indeed the sea, beyond the palm groves. We leave to-morrow early. There is always a pang in leaving any place, but that over I shall be glad. I shall be glad to get back to a colder, more vigorous climate and to begin real work again.

Constantine.—This evening we are here. We left Biskra at 7.45 this morning. We are now out of the desert. Have left far, far behind us those eternal reaches of calm and repose, that region of endless summer, that Garden of Allah which held us spellbound so long. Already it seems like a dream—the long trains of camels, the palm trees against the golden evening sky, the mountains of rose and amethyst. No lounging figures stretched in the sun. No wild beating of tom-toms, no roaring of discontented camels, unloading for the night's repose. No Safti to take us to walk through the market, to order for us a café maure, to be taken sitting in the sun, watching the strange life of that wonderful oasis of the desert.

Poor Safti! Of course we didn't take him to Tunis, but he was quite satisfied with what he received, even after his great exertions to show us everything. He had his wife to prepare for us the famous Kous-Kous of the Arabs, which was served for us at dinner. It is a preparation of the grain of wheat, steamed well till it is soft. It was served in gala fashion, as they do on occasions of festivity, garnished with hard boiled eggs and bits of chicken, and a sauce which was not in any way definable.

In the afternoon he had taken us to old Biskra to visit the school. We wanted to see his little boy, of whom he had told us so much. A most interesting group of pupils it was that we saw. Mostly Arabs, a few negro types and a sprinkling of French. The master was French, of course. Safti, junior, was a charming little fellow, and promises to be a handsome man, and no doubt a learned one, considering the number of hours he spends in school every day.

Afterwards we went to the Arabic school. It was held in a tiny room connected with a marabout, or tomb of a saint. Here he learns the Koran, not only as a matter of religion, but much as we would take some classic, studying it to form his style. At the same time he learns to read and write Arabic. There were no benches, no desk, nothing but a worn mat on a slightly raised portion of the floor. A hole in the wall served as a shelf on which were two very ancient manuscript copies of the Koran. The same hole served as entrance to the sleeping apartment of the teacher, which was no more than a cell large enough to lie down in. Simplicity could certainly not much farther go. Safti, junior, is now one-third through the Koran. When he has learned it all his father will give the teacher fifty francs, two sheep will be killed, all the children will be invited and there will be a great feast. Then he starts at the beginning and learns it all over again.

We went again in some of the houses; we had previously seen them spinning and weaving, this time we saw them cooking. They build a fire in a small hole in the ground. Three stones are placed about it at intervals. On these an earthen bowl of water is placed, and over it an earthen dish perforated with holes, in which the Kous-Kous is steamed. They eat many different things, but not much meat, the climate is too hot. The animal eaten has to be killed in a certain way required by the Koran, so that no Arab would touch meat prepared by any but his own people.

In the market place, besides all kinds of provisions there are, towards evening, innumerable vendors of cooked food. Arabs come in by hundreds and take their dinner sitting around the market place. Like most people belonging to hot climates, they make their food very hot with red pepper and other things. Their bread does not look unlike ours.

It will interest you to know that during the winter and spring a great deal of barley and wheat is raised in the oasis. The part I spoke of the other day as looking barren as the desert itself, I have since learned is lying fallow this year, but will be planted next. In many places the young grain is looking very luxuriant and green. There are large tracts about the base of the mountains that are white, as though covered with a light layer of snow. This is finely crystallized saltpeter. There are streams saturated with this and other minerals, which render the land where they flow quite barren. There are also hot springs. At one of these places, about six miles from Biskra, a bathing establishment has been erected. A tramway connects it with the town. The men went over very often, sometimes on foot, sometimes on horseback.

M—and I went once. We found the bath very agreeable.

But it is quite hopeless to make Biskra real and living place to you as it has become to us. So I shall not attempt further, I spend what energy and time remain to me might in giving you some idea of the general aspect of North Africa. You see that at Rome destroyed Carthage they extended the conquests far inland and all along the north coast. Roman ruins exist everywhere. The ruined cities of Tingad and Lambessa, between here and Biskra, are marvellously interesting. We had fully expected to visit this afternoon, stopping off at Batna, from where we should have taken an automobile the ruins, twenty miles away. They are, however, high among the mountains. The weather was cold in that altitude. We have so much before us for these last few days that it seems wisest to leave them out. Well, to return to history. The natives of the country at that time were the same race that still inhabit the mountains, and of whom we have seen so many numbers. They are called Kabyles, and are readily distinguishable from the Arabs & Moors. They are darker, less interesting looking, more industrious; their women go veiled, though they are now Mohammedan. The Arabs are the dwellers of the plains, the Moors of the cities. After the decline of Roman power North Africa was conquered or at least overrun—by the Vandals. These latter were routed by the Byzantines under Belisarius. Finally came the followers of the Prophet, about 670 A. D. First they were Arabs who came; then came the Turks. Always during the Turk's rule the north coast of Africa was the centre of piracy and blooded treachery. Charles V. of Spain, Henry III. of France, Louis XIV., and other European rulers undertook, at various times to conquer, or to bring to terms in some way, these people who had no respect for international law of any kind. Then you know of our war with Tripoli at the beginning of the 18th century. Finally, during the reign of Charles X. of France, came the famous affair of the fan. France had a consul at Algiers at that time. On one occasion his ship, I think was, was robbed by the inhabitants. He was personally to the Dey in his private palace to crown the hill over the city. The Dey happened to be in a bad humor; he took his anger and struck the consul in the face with some insulting remark. Relations were not any the less good before this. The affair was decisive. The army was at once put into motion and war declared. But about this time came the Revolution of 1830. Charles X. was driven out, and Louis Philippe came in his place. The war was prosecuted with vigor, however, the son of Louis Philippe—the dukes of Orleans, Amale and Nemours—took the field. Practically by 1837 Algeria had been completely conquered by the French. One of the best places to yield was Constantine, where we are now, and of which I shall speak later. The city of Algiers suffered most. The cashah, fortress of the Dey, was almost completely destroyed. The French took everything from him. His palace became that of the French governor; his mosque a cathedral; his seraglio the palace of the archbishop. We visited these buildings; the beautiful Moorish arc ure has, in most cases, been left, but the ings are French. Here in Constantine the ce of the Bey (the title of the rulers of stantine and Tunis is Bey, not Dey, as it in Algiers, but there seems no other ial difference) seems to be left pretty much t was. The Moorish arches, columns and esques, as well as the coloring of the tiles; exquisite. When taken, he had within the ce three hundred and sixty-five wives.

of the palace is Roman, and dates back undred years B. C. The marble columns beautiful beyond description. There are some sad reminders left of the days when Asian slaves were put to death by hundreds the amusement or to inspire the awe of women. But this part I will not linger on. The wonderful thing about Constantine is a natural position. Ever since landing in ca we have heard of its unsurpassed magnence, but nothing anyone could say could a true idea of what it is like. The city in times past, been considered absolutely egnable. It has withstood eighty sieges.
Emperor Constantine, however, took it gave to it his own name. It was afterwards built by the Turks, and at last by the ch. Tucked on an isolated rock of the Atlas mountains, it towers on one side a thousand in perpendicular height above the wide-ading valley; on the other, completely trating it from the main land, is a narrow m, spanned in two places by a bridge; chasm is of the wildest and most pic-esque character. The city is now growing the other side of the chasm, but the old one remains the one of real interest. There in all these cities, a French and an Arab ter—the latter always with narrow streets e houses having no windows, being built and an open court, exposed to the light and The region around Constantine seems fertile. The ride in the train was most table. All day we were traveling due n, or nearly so. It was half-past four we reached here. For some time before ing we could see this city in the clouds, ng unlike anything we had ever seen, or agination pictured. We came at once to hotel, crossing the chasm on one of the ges above mentioned. Then we took a a from the hotel and rapidly visited the important places, looking down from the heights into the chasm below. There is alk called "Le Chemin des Tourists" h follows along the face of the gorge—times by steps cut in the rock, sometimes an iron frame fastened on its face. We to-morrow morning at 8.20 for Tunis. shall not be able to follow this walk. The book speaks of it as one of the most ing and fascinating things possible to sive of, but strongly recommending per-women not to undertake it.

WARD.—Be the noblest man that your ent faith, poor and weak and imperfect as can make you be. Live up to your pres-growth, your present faith. So, and so do you take the next straight step forward, as you stand strong where you are now; only can you think the curtain will be drawn back, and there will be revealed to you what beyond.—Phillips Brooks.

SOMETIME.

Sometime, when all life's lessons have been learned,
And sun and stars forevermore have set,
The things which our weak judgments here have spurned,
The things o'er which we grieved with lashes
wet,
Will flash before us out of life's dark night,
As stars shine most in deepest tints of blue,
And we shall see how all God's plans are right,
And how what seems reproof was love most true.
And we shall see how, while we frown and sigh,
God's plans go on as best for you and me,
How, when we called, He heeded not our cry,
Because his wisdom to the end could see.
And e'en as prudent parents disallow
Too much of sweet to craving babyhood,
So God, perhaps, is keeping from us now
Life's sweetest things because it seemeth good.
And if, sometimes, commingled with life's wine,
We find the wormwood and rebel and shrink,
Be sure a wiser hand than yours or mine
Pours out this potion for our lips to drink.
And if some friend we love is lying low,
Where human kisses cannot reach his face,
Oh, do not blame the loving Father so,
But wear your sorrow with obedient grace!
And you shall shortly know that lengthened breath
Is not the sweetest gift God sends his friend,
And that sometimes the sable pall of Death Conceals the fairest bloom his love can send.
If we could push ajar the gates of life,
And stand within and all God's workings see
We could interpret all this doubt and strife,
And for each mystery could find a key.
But not to-day. Then be content, poor heart!
God's plans, like lilies, pure and white, unfold.
We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart,
Time will reveal the calyxes of gold.
And if, through patient toil, we reach the land
Where tired feet, with sandals loosed, may rest,
When we shall clearly know and understand,
I think that we will say, "God knew the best!"
—MARY RILEY SMITH.

Two Kinds of Unselfishness.

"Margaret, dear," said one friend to another, "you must let me do something for you in the city. My brother and I are going down to-morrow, and we will be delighted to get anything you want for you and bring it back." So "Margaret dear," gave her friend some commissions in great gratitude for her unselfish thoughtfulness, and the brother did the work and incurred the trouble.
There are many people who have a capacity for this sort of unselfishness. They devise things which involve some one's else labor. They are full of suggestions which other people are to carry out. It looks like unselfishness, but it is the purest and most whimsical kind of selfishness.

"I wonder who knew I wanted this work done," says a mother who finds some sewing finished for her which she expected to have to do herself. She found out after a while that a daughter, without saying anything about it, had given up some little part of her own and stayed at home to do this bit of work for her mother. This was the genuine unselfishness. It was something done by the unselfish one.

What sort of unselfishness characterizes us? Is it the sort that thinks of things which other people have to do, while we appropriate the credit of having conceived them, or is it the sort that goes quietly about doing unselfish things?—Forward.

Car Windows and Christianity.

A young man and woman got on the train at Springfield. They were evidently going away for a short vacation. The young man wore a pin which indicated that he was a member of a Christian society, and he gave the young woman the seat next the window. It was a warm day and very dusty, and cinders and dust enveloped the train in a cloud as it rolled along. Presently the young man proposed to open the window. The young woman replied that the disadvantage due to cinders and dust blowing in would counterbalance the benefit of the fresh air and the breeze. "Oh!" the young man replied, so that the traveler behind him overheard, "it will not trouble us. It always blows back on the seat behind." And the window went up.

The traveler on the seat looked over to make sure that he was not mistaken about the pin, and then leaned back and shut his eyes to keep out the cinders and dust, and meditated a little. These were some of his meditations:

"There are disadvantages in wearing badges. So long as the conduct of the wearer is such as to reflect credit upon the society, all is well; but when it is otherwise, all is not well. Some uncharitable stranger might have said: 'I wonder what sort of society this is whose members don't care for the inconveniences they occasion others, and who make selfishness the law of life.' But this particular conduct of the badge wearer not only does not represent the organization, but is directly contrary to its principles. Now, either people should not wear badges, or they should be faithful representatives of the principles of which the badge is the symbol.

"Little things reveal character. It wouldn't be pleasant to live with those two people all the time. Evidently they feel that, if they get satisfaction out of things, it is immaterial how much discomfort they give to others. Perhaps, if it were something conspicuous, they would try to live up to their Christian profession; but, as this incident shows, in small things they are no better than heathen.

"Perhaps some one is seeing some inconsistency in me, as I see one in these young people. This world's a very public place. They are unconscious of scrutiny. I am unconscious of some one else's scrutiny. Maybe he will tell on me. Maybe there is a beam in the only eye that is marking their mote.

"I will have to remember that all of us live before the world, and seek to see myself as I am seen. These young people are not thinking, or they would shut the window. They are good enough within, doubtless. They are simply thoughtless. Perhaps they have not learned that Christian principles are for practice as well as for profession. If only they saw themselves truly!"—Exchange.

WHAT we love, we will hear; what we love, we will trust; and what we love, we will serve, aye, and suffer for too. "If you love me," says our blessed Redeemer, "keep my commandments." Why? Why then, He will love us; then we shall be his friends; then He will send us the Comforter; then whatever we ask we shall receive; and then, where He is we shall be also, and that forever. Behold the fruits of love; the power, virtue, benefit, and beauty of love!—William Penn.

THE GUEST OF EVERY DAY.

Homely work is mine to-day,
Floors to sweep, and fires to lay,
Plates to wash, and clothes to mend;
Work which never seems to end,

Yet I pray
Jesus, be my Guest to-day.

Not as One to dwell apart
In the spare room of my heart,
But as One to whom my prayer
May confide the smallest care,

Thus I pray
Lord, be Thou my Guest to-day!
Martha, cumbered in her care,
Brought a half-reproachful prayer.
Serving much she thought would best Welcome and refresh her Guest.

Christ, I know
Would not have me serve Him so.

He reproves me if I fret
Over work unfinished yet,
Checks me if I make a task
Of some work He does not ask.

My dear Guest
Wishes me to work and rest.

At the closing of the day,
When once more my heart shall say,
In this busy life of mine:
"All the glory, Lord, is Thine!

Christ, I pray,
Be the Guest of every day!"

A Visit to Japan.

One of the most important duties and privileges of the Society of Friends has always been to illustrate real spiritual worship, which may have many expressions or no vocal expression, but it must be in a conscious union of our human spirits with the Divine Power, which always uplifts and strengthens our soul.

Christ defined the only true worship when he spoke to the woman at Jacob's well: "Neither at Jerusalem," etc.—not the temple-service with its priesthood, but in the spirit of direct communion; neither place nor time, but a condition of heart is most essential; no ceremony but a sense of oneness with our Father in heaven; no error of conception is admitted, but a true spiritual insight is ensured. No class or religious difference is operative when the heart is turned toward God, who is always seeking such to worship Him, and we have felt this quest on his part in our hearts since assembling here.

Such applications of the spiritual views of the gospel constitute our mission in Japan, and we should all think and feel out our part in carrying out this great work in behalf of the cause of Christ on earth. A great responsibility is upon us to lift up Christ in our spiritual interpretations of the gospel.

We may make two mistakes in reference to the interpretation of Friends' principles:—

1. To interpret the principles before the gospel is to preach or proselytize.

2. To knock the glad tidings of salvation merely so as to win souls to Christ but fail to give them the interpretation of the principles for which we stand. In this situation they are liable to drift into a more ritualistic organization, or drop into purposeless emotionalism.

Joseph Elkinton echoed the desire of Dr. Nitobe to see the Society of Friends interpret the deepest truths for which it stands. And let all our works be done with reference to the leadings of the Holy Spirit.

In the evening meeting B. Kida wished to make it known that there was no leader arranged for this meeting and no fixed subject. We are met simply to consider under the leading of the Holy Spirit our right service in promoting the gospel and interpreting the principles of the Society of Friends.

J. Elkinton gave illustrations of character building in Philadelphia, in the lives of men and women seventy years old. Meetings there are often held in silence, during which the rising tide of spiritual life is felt. He described Pastor Koenig's impressions upon attending a Friends' meeting in Philadelphia. He had long believed that God could be publicly worshipped in silence, but had never seen it done before; and declared that one could never know how much this meeting meant to him.

Several testimonies followed in acknowledgment of the clearer conception of our principles and of our mission as a Society which they had been helped to feel in this conference. May the spirit of this truth go back to our neighborhoods with us. But a small number seem able thoroughly to understand the principles. But real life in even a small number may be a great power to convince others if it is wrought out in our life experiences. Development from within,—principle worked out into life,—this key-note we carry home.

We stop here, at about half way through the notes received of religious expressions given in the conference. Other topics were presented, truths in various other forms opened. But these expressions are samples (which we have deemed it but fair to present as information) of the spirituality which seems to be gaining a foothold in a portion of Japan, through representatives of Friends and others.

*Copy of the Testimony of denial from Hudson Monthly Meeting, held 22nd of Sixth Month, 1802, against Hannah Barnard.**

Whereas Hannah Barnard, of the City of Hudson, in the state of New York, having been a favoured member, and an acknowledged minister, amongst us the people called Quakers, endowed with talents and qualifications for service in the Church of Christ; and had she continued to experience an humble abiding, under the influence of the precious principle of light and grace in her own heart, which would have preserved her in that humility, meekness & self denial that beautifies & ever should adorn, a minister of Christ, and in a conduct consistent with the dignity of our profession, she might have been eminently useful; but, unhappily, by giving way to an aspiring, exalted mind, she hath so far become clouded in her understanding, and been led away by the Spirit of delusion as to call in question the authenticity of various parts of the scriptures of truth, both of the old & new Testament, which, in common with other professors of faith in Christ, we have always acknowledged to be of divine authority, and most surely believed in by us; particularly, she does not unite with the society, in acknowledging the truth of that part, which relates to the miraculous conception & miracles of Christ; that she hath not only imbibed these erroneous & dangerous sentiments, but is assiduous in disseminating them among others, hence, it evidently appears, that she is not one with it in principle, or in practice; and having had abundant labour bestowed upon her, by friends in a private way, as well as by divers meetings in great Britain, in order to convince her the dangerous tendency of the sentiments she entertains, & if possible to avert the evil which appeared to await her; but all the endeavours proved unavailing, she still continuing to promote the Ideas she had formed and strenuously defending the ground she had taken, and altho' we deeply lament her sorrowful declension from the unerring Standard of the spirit of Truth, yet, apprehending we had done our duty, in the extension of our care & best endeavours, under the influence of a trust of pure love and unfeigned desires for her welfare & recovery, and there appearing at present, no prospect of advantage to result from further forbearance or labour, we therefore, for the support of our Christian Testimony, and in order that as a religious body we may acquit ourselves with propriety in the sight of that being, who is perfect in all ways, by bearing our testimony against the Spirit of infidelity, which appears evidently have gained too great an ascendancy in the present day, hereby testify, that we can no longer hold religious fellowship with the said Hannah Barnard, but disown her from being any longer a member of our Society, until attending to the convicting operations of the Spirit of truth in her own mind, she may become sensible of her deviations, and evince a change of heart & sentiments, and manifest a disposition of mind to become reconciled to us.

They Were Partners.

A sturdy little figure was trudging bravely with a pail of water. So many times had passed our gate that morning that curiosity prompted us to further acquaintance.

"You are a busy little girl to-day?"

"Yes'm."

The round face under the broad hat turned toward us. It was freckled and sparkling, but cheerful withal.

"Yes'm; it takes a heap of water to do washing."

"And do you bring it all from the brook down there?"

"Oh, we have it in the cistern mostly; oh it's been such a dry time lately."

"And is there nobody else to carry water?"

"Nobody but mother, an' she is washing."

"Well, you are a good little girl to help her."

It was not a well-considered compliment and the little water-carrier did not consider at all, for there was a look of surprise in gray eyes and an almost inaudible tone in voice as she answered: "Why, of course help her. I always help her to do things the time; she hasn't anybody else. Mother's me's partners."

Little girl, are you and mother partners? Do you help her all you can?—Kind Word

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In their meetings with the Indians in different places, to communicate to them the contents of the address, the importance of harmony and unity of action in their tribal affairs as pressed upon them, and as a further help in this direction, they had interviews with both the persons claiming to be the President, and with some others of their leading men. They were received with openness beyond their expectation, and in addition to the acknowledgments verbally made, two responses were presented in writing, mentioning their approval of the advice offered them.

These Friends remark, on their return, "In passing over the Reservation we observed several neat and comfortable houses built by the Indians during the past year, the carpenter work being done by their own people. These, together with the increased number of cattle, and better teams of horses and oxen owned by them, and the fact that they now sell butter to the white people, all indicate a gradual advance in their condition; they much more generally speak English, and their women, no longer refused to use it, now often converse freely in our own tongue. Yet we were much impressed with the need of temperance among them, and of those family virtues which are the fruits of true Christianity."

On the Cattaraugus Reservation they had our meetings in different neighborhoods. In reference to one of these meetings, held in a neighborhood in which lived a large number of those Indians who still retained the ancient Indian customs; they say:

"When the Buffalo Reservation was sold many years ago, 'the Christian Party' and 'the Old Party' agreed that they would each abstain from efforts to proselyte the other, and the one of the latter, who came from the Buffalo Reserve, settled at Newtown, which has continued since to be a stronghold of the old religious superstitions of the Senecas. The address sent by this Committee a few years ago, had never been read at that place, and one member of the Committee desired to hold a religious meeting at their Council-house. Two years ago, he was refused the use of it. It was with heart-sickening regret and surprise at us, on arriving near the Council-house, we saw two men dressed in a fantastic manner, with masks and buffalo robes, moving about from house to house in the neighborhood, while the carcasses of two white dogs were observed and to a stake which stood by the Council-house. Within, we were told, the old stories of their religion were being rehearsed by appointed persons, and thus old and young were strengthened in their rejection of Christianity. This was an affecting evidence of the need of all our further efforts throughout the nation to bring them to the acceptance of the truth of Christianity. But on the present visit we were encouraged by the fact that about eighty of the men and women came to the meeting at the Industrial School-house nearby, and not only listened to the address and remarks, but also kindly responses.

"We also noted, on leaving the meeting, that the dogs above referred to had been removed, as if some feelings of shame had been felt; but in many things the people in this district are advancing, and we trust Christianity is gaining ground among them."

At the request of a large number of Indians received in writing the Committee believed it would be proper to represent to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at Washington, the dangerous consequences which might result to the Seneca Indians, if the lease of their land for oil purposes before alluded to was carried into effect: and a letter to him on the subject dated Third Month 29th, 1879 was accordingly prepared and delivered to him by two members of the Committee, who in their interview with him found that he had already become acquainted with the case by efforts which had been made to have the lease officially recognized, but which he refused to sanction, and learned that it was his intention to notify the person who was said to be operating on the Allegheny Reservation under its authority that no rights thereby granted to him would be respected by the Department.

In this letter presented to the Commissioner, allusion was made to the incapacity of the Indians to protect their interests in the leased lands of the villages and to adjust the numerous questions resulting from conflicting boundary lines, the renewal of the old leases, the granting of new ones, etc. and mentioned that the Committee had long been of the judgment that advantage would result to them from the assistance of an honest and competent white man, who might also be entrusted under suitable safeguards with the collection and disbursement of the income belonging to the nation. These representations also appeared to be favorably considered by the Commissioner, but the change proposed was not made at that time:

In 1879 another edition was printed of the pamphlet entitled "A Brief Sketch of the efforts of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends to promote the civilization and improvement of the Indians, also of the present condition of the tribes in the State of New York." This had first been issued in 1866, and it was believed had been useful in giving correct information to many of our own members respecting these subjects, and had also been a means of strengthening the disposition in others to do justice and deal kindly with the Indian race. A person not connected with the Society of Friends who had taken much interest in circulating this pamphlet at Washington soon after it was first issued, made some suggestions in reference to the distribution of the second edition in a letter of which the following are extracts. We are not able to judge of the correctness of all of his statements.

"In 1866, as soon as I became acquainted with the tract, I procured from Jacob Smedley twelve copies, which I sent, one to Andrew Johnson President, one to U. S. Grant, and the others to the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the U. S. Senate and House of Representatives most likely to read it.

In the winter of 1869-70, a hundred copies were sent to me at Washington by Jacob Smedley, of Friends' Book Store, which were distributed among members of Congress, at the time of the receiving and review of the report on the massacre of the Piegan Indians.

"In this distribution I was aided by D. D.

Cone, Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger. The first distribution I believe placed in the hands of General Grant, a plan which he put into operation when he became President, for the "Civilization and Christianization of the Red man," and the second gave to friends of the plan in Congress, arguments which prevailed against those who would then have overturned all that was being done."

"I believe if you were to give the tract a new distribution its truths would light up and destroy a number of dark schemes which are now afoot which aim to set aside all yet accomplished."

How Two Boys Crossed Niagara Falls in a Basket.

Alex Lee and George Frost were boys when General Roebling undertook to build the great suspension bridge across Niagara Falls. This was fifty years ago. The boys lived on the American side of the river, within sight of the falls, and very near the spot upon which the bridge was to be built. There was great interest in the project, for the plan was regarded as one of the most remarkable that had ever been attempted by engineering skill.

The workmen were divided into two parties, one working on the American, the other upon the Canadian side. There was no means of getting across except by taking rowboats, several miles below the falls. The chief engineer under General Roebling took up his residence very near to the homes of these two boys, and they were so constantly on hand whenever he went to the river that he could not escape an acquaintance with them.

He was a rather silent man, and they were both surprised, therefore, when he turned to them one day and said: "Here, boys! (can you fly a kite?"

"Yes, sir," they responded promptly

"Can you fly one well?" he continued, looking at them keenly.

"Pretty well, sir," Alex responded, more modestly.

"If you can fly one well," replied the engineer, "you will help me to build the suspension bridge."

"Alex's eyes grew big, and so did George's. Help build the suspension bridge!"

The engineer saw the effect of his words, and added, "Come down this afternoon with the best kite you have, and we shall see if you can send it to the Canadian shore. If you can, you will be the lads to carry across the first cable for one of the most remarkable bridges in the world."

Then, for the first time, the boys saw what he meant. They looked at each other a moment, and then set off for home as fast as their bare feet would carry them.

They said nothing to the family, but betook themselves to the woods, where they set to work with a will. Kite-flying had always been one of their greatest sports; and they had made dozens of kites, as season followed season. The frame of one that had been a favorite still hung in the shed. They got it down and covered it with the strongest but lightest paper they could secure. It was nothing but an ordinary home-made kite, but they felt sure of its flying qualities when it was ready to be taken down to the river.

Upon their arrival the engineer examined the kite, while they looked on with mingled hope and fear. At length he said, taking up a ball of twine, "Put this on in place of the string you have. It is light but very strong. The wind is in the right direction and blowing well. You ought to succeed."

They quickly tied on the new cord, and then Alex took the ball, while George went to a short distance with the kite, ready to give it a push. It started well. Then there came a sudden puff of wind, followed by a lull; the kite veered, staggered and came to the ground with a flop. George picked it up quickly. Some of the small boys standing about shouted derisively, but the engineer said, "Never mind, boys, you are not the only people who have failed the first time. Try again."

Once more George held the kite as high as he could. Alex got a good start, and in a moment more the kite was sailing away in a steady course toward the river. Alex ran to the bank, then began to play out his line as evenly as his excitement would permit. It was a glorious sight, and all watched with keen interest as the kite grew smaller and soared steadily.

At last a shout went up from the opposite bank, and every one knew the kite was over the Canadian shore. Unrolling the remainder of the cord upon the ground Alex suddenly let the line slack. The kite wavered, made a wild dive, and dropped.

"Well done, boys," exclaimed General Roeling, as a great cheer arose from both sides of the river. Two prouder boys than George and Alex you can scarcely imagine. "It is clear sailing now," added the engineer, as he fastened a heavier cord to the kite string, and then signalled the men on the opposite shore to draw it over. Each successive line was heavier and stronger than the last, and finally a one-inch cable was pulled across the 1,200 feet of space beneath which roared the mighty river.

The cable was made secure by drawing it over a wooden tower on each bank, embedding the ends in the solid rock and fastening them with a key of melted lead. After the cable was laid, the men were instructed to build an immense iron basket which could be drawn from shore to shore over the cable, by means of ropes and a windlass on each bank. This was intended to carry the tools, and even the men themselves, to and fro.

The boys scarcely found time to eat their meals during these days. The afternoon the basket was being finished George was obliged to pile a cord of wood, and Alex volunteered to help him. It was late when they finished, but the next morning found them again at the bridge.

"Now boys," said the engineer as he showed the completed basket, "since you helped us so well with our cable, I think you should be allowed to make the first trip across the river."

"Would you like to?"

Without stopping to consider, they both exclaimed, "Yes indeed!" thinking only of the glory of the feat.

"All right, jump in," was the response, and the workmen drew the basket close to shore.

If their hearts misgave them nothing could have induced them to show it now. They settled themselves in the basket, which was deep, and large enough to hold both comfortably. Then the signal was given and the men on the farther shore began to turn the windlass. The basket moved slowly forward, and the boys waved their caps to the men.

At first the excitement of the adventure kept their spirits at a high pitch. The basket went forward steadily, but it swayed back and forth below the cable with a motion which was not altogether agreeable. The boys had lived near the falls all their lives and its noise was a familiar sound, but now, for the first time, the terrific roar of the water impressed them with its mighty force and power.

George looked off to the falls. Never before had they seemed of such immense height. The view was a new one. Then he looked down. One hundred and sixty feet below him was the roaring, seething mass of water, and he felt suddenly faint and sick. He glanced at the cable; it seemed like a thread, measured by the space beneath, and it was all that held them over that awful chasm. He could hear the water churn and surge below him, but he dared not look down again. Alex was as white as a ghost. George glanced ahead at the farther shore; it had not gone one-third of the distance, and it was 1,200 feet from shore to shore. The distance was appalling. He grew dizzy again and curled down in the bottom of the basket. It seemed hours that he lay there. At last he looked up; the sky seemed nearer than the water, and so he kept his eyes on the floating clouds. Gradually he began to feel better.

"Alex," he said, "we must brace up. We are nearly to shore and we don't want to show the white feather. Keep your eyes on the sky, but sit up."

Alex did as he suggested, and when they finally neared the shore they were able to respond to the cheers and greetings of the men. But the joy of landing was completely swallowed up by the thought of the return trip. Still, there was no alternative, and pride made them try to hide their feelings from the men.

After a rest of about ten minutes the workmen made ready to start the basket back. The boys stepped in, setting their teeth hard, and shouting a farewell which stuck in their throats.

The basket swung off again, but though the motion was as unpleasant as ever, and the roar of the water was as great, they had learned to look skyward, and the giddiness was not so great. At last they heard voices from the shore, and bracing themselves they looked forward. They were so near that they could see among the throng on the bank the white faces of George's father and mother, looking stern and anxious. But so limp and white did the boys look, as they stepped ashore, that it was thought they had been punished enough.

The crowd of boys shouted and cheered; and for weeks after they never tired of having Alex and George tell of their wonderful trip.—The Holiday Magazine.

Science and Industry.

A STONE house is not so durable as one of brick. A brick house, well constructed, will outlast one built of granite.

EQUAL parts of ammonia and spirits of turpentine will take paint out of clothing, no matter how dry or hard it may be. Saturate the spots two or three times, and then wash out in soap suds.

MILK will immediately and effectually extinguish the flames from gasoline or any form of petroleum, since it forms an emulsion with the oil, whereas water only spreads it.

A LONDON dealer in such wares, last year received from India the skins of six thousand birds of paradise to adorn the hats of the feather wearing British women and to meet the export need. At the same time he got about half a million humming bird skins, and an equal number of those of various other tropical birds. There is an auction room in London where such things are sold, and its recent record for a third of a year was close to a million skins, all told, coming mainly from the East and West Indies and Brazil.

THE DISLIKE FOR HOUSEWORK.—Factories are overwhelmed with applicants for work, sweat shops flourish on cheap and abundant labor, department stores turn away thousands of would-be salesgirls, typewriters are legion, there are more teachers than there are places, and the cry of the unemployed is often heard in the land. Yet households are broken up, cafes glitter, restaurants issue cheap meals, tickets, boarding houses multiply, and the American home is yearly growing less, because the American housekeeper cannot obtain willing and competent service. In factories are girls who would rather cook in shops, women who would make good housekeepers, hundreds of typewriters are reeling off badly spelled words who would make credible waitresses, and many are teaching school who should be doing something else in the world. The Woman's Educational and Industrial Union of Boston made a systematic effort to attract the workers in shops and factories to domestic service, but with signal failure. From five hundred and sixty-four women who were asked to consider housework, only thirty-six applied, and these were not altogether satisfactory. Their dislike for the work is frankly stated to be on account of the long hours, no evenings for themselves, the isolation from other workers, and the social stigma that attaches to the occupation.—Jane S. Klink, in The Atlantic.

AN ASPHALT LAKE.—The largest South American asphalt lake, in Venezuela, consists of a dark brownish deposit of semi-fluid and semi-solid substance surrounded by banks from three to six feet high, says a writer in the "New York Tribune." In the center of this lake is a continual ejection of hot fluid asphalt accompanied by large bubbles of gas.

The dark skinned workmen excavate it in pieces weighing in the neighborhood of twenty five pounds, sections forty feet in area and about four feet deep being worked at one time. As quickly as freed from its surroundings it is placed in large tubes, resting upon small fluted tram cars operated upon a narrow gauge road. The entire surface is constantly moving, thus necessitating a continual relay of the tracks.

The freshly excavated asphalt is conveyed to the shore, where the tubes are lifted by hydraulic power to an aerial tramway, by which it is conveyed to the large wharf situated on e Guanero river, about five miles distant on the lake. Here it is weighed and dumped to vessels which convey it to the foreign lands. Upon its arrival at a factory it is heated until a water is expelled and the earthy material is sent to the bottom of the large vats, and it is poured through a sieve into barrels, where it solidifies. It is then ready for commerce.

America's First Prohibition Speech.

The following appears in the columns of the "New Voice":—"Research work on the Standard Encyclopedia of the Alcohol Problem" has recently brought to light what is probably the first Prohibition address ever made in the United States. Strangely enough, it is delivered one hundred and four years ago by a full-blooded Indian Chief and before a very early Meeting of Quakers.

On December 27th, 1801, Little Turtle, or Che-cun-na-qu, the famous Miami Chief, visited Baltimore and was invited by the "Committee on Indians" of the Baltimore Yearly Meeting to give them his views on what the white people could do to benefit the red man. He replied, through his interpreter, William Ellis, begging the Quakers to use their influence with Congress to induce that body to enact laws forbidding the sale of liquor to Indians. He then visited President Jefferson and made such an impression on him that the President sent a message to Congress suggesting Prohibition laws; he is also said to have written a letter to the Ohio legislator urging that that body forbid liquor selling to Indians. Little Turtle in the next few years visited the legislatures of Ohio and Kentucky, begging that such Prohibitory laws be enacted.

Little Turtle's address before the Baltimore Yearly Meeting so impressed the Maryland Quakers that they sent a memorial to Congress in compliance with the Indians' request. A memorial embodied the text of the chief's speech, which is here given. A copy of the memorial was printed by the government, and an official copy is still preserved in the Congressional library. Little Turtle's speech is as follows:

"Brothers and Friends: My brother chiefs are now present, with myself, are happy and that you have a good opinion of us. I say, that you apprehend that we have eyes on our heads, and can clearly see for ourselves, we things that are injurious to us—this, my minds and brothers is the case—we clearly see these things. My brother chiefs that are present with me, as well as myself, have seen them; we have long lamented these evils that have raged in our country, and I have done your red brethren so much wrong.

"We have applied for redress, and endeavored to have them removed from amongst us, and in our forefathers first met on this island, your red brethren were more numerous; but the introduction amongst us of what you call spirituous liquors, and what we think may be called poison, our numbers have lately diminished. It has destroyed a great of your red brethren.

"My brothers and friends, I am glad to hear observe, that freedom of speech ought to be made use of amongst brothers, and I, brothers, really ought to be the case. I know, therefore, take the liberty to mention that most of the existing evils amongst your red brethren, have been caught from the white people; not only that liquor that destroys us daily, but many diseases that our forefathers were ignorant of before they saw you.

"My brothers and friends, I am glad, with my brother chiefs, that are now present, to find that you are now ready to assist us in everything that will add to our good, we hope that the Great Spirit may aid you in all your good undertakings with respect to us. We plainly perceive, brothers, that you see every evil that destroys your red brethren. It is not an evil, brothers, of our own making; we have not placed it amongst ourselves; it is an evil placed amongst us by the white people, we look up to them to remove it out of our country. If they have that friendship for us, which they tell us they have, they certainly will not let it continue amongst us any longer. Our repeated entreaties to those who brought this evil amongst us, we find, has not the desired effect. We tell them, brothers, fetch us useful things, bring goods that will clothe us, our women and our children, and not this evil liquor that destroys our reason; that destroys our health; that destroys our lives. But all we can say on this subject is of no service, nor gives relief to your red brethren.

"My brothers and friends, I am glad that you have seen into this business as we do. I rejoice to find that you agree in opinion with us, and express an anxiety to be, if possible, of service to us, to remove this great evil out of our country, an evil that has so much room in it, that has destroyed so many of our lives, that causes our young men to say, 'We had better be at war with the white people. This liquor they introduce into our country is more to be feared than the gun and tomahawk; there are more of us dead since the treaty of Greenville than we lost by the six years war before. It is all owing to the introduction of this liquor amongst us.' Brothers, how to remove this evil from our country we do not know. If we had known that it would have been a proper subject to mention to you in our council yesterday, we should surely have done it. This subject, brothers, composes a part of what we intend to make known to the Great Council of our white brethren. On our arrival there, we shall endeavor to explain to our great Father, the President, a great many of the evils that have arisen in our country from the introduction of this liquor by the white traders.

"Brothers and friends, in addition to what I have before observed of this great evil in the country of your red brethren, I will say further, that it has made us poor. It is this liquor that causes our young men to go without clothes, our women and children to go without anything to eat; and sorry am I to mention now to you, brothers, that the evil is increasing every day, as the white settlers come nearer to us and bring those kettles they boil that stuff in they call whiskey, of which our young men are so extremely fond. Brothers, when our young men have been out hunting, and are returning home loaded with skins and furs, on their way if it happens that they come along where some of this whisky is deposited, the little man who sells it tells them to take a white and drink. Some will then say 'No, I do not want it.' They go until they come to another house, where they find more of the same kind of drink. It is there again offered. They refuse and again the third time, but finally the fourth or fifth time, one accepts of it and takes a drink, and getting one he wants another, and then a third and fourth, till his senses have left him. After his reason comes back again to him, he gets up and finds where he is. He asks for his peltry. The answer is, you have drunk them. Where is my gun? It is gone. Where is my blanket? It is gone. Where is my shirt? You have sold it for whiskey. Now, brothers, figure to yourself what a condition this man must be in, he has a family at home, a wife and children that stand in need of the profits of his hunting. What must their wants be, when he is even without a shirt.

"This, brothers, I can assure you, is a fact that often happens amongst us. As I have before observed, we have no means to prevent it. If you, brothers, have it in your power to render us any assistance, we hope the Great Spirit will aid you. We shall lay these evils before our great and good Father; we hope he will remove them from amongst us. If he does not, there will not be many of his red children living long in our country. The Great Spirit, brothers, has made you see as we see. We hope, brothers, and expect, that if you have any influence with the Great Council of the United States you will make use of it in behalf of your red brethren.

"My brothers and friends, the talks that you delivered to us when we were in council yesterday were certainly highly pleasing to myself as well as to my brother chiefs. We rejoice to hear you speak such words to us; but we all plainly saw that there was a great difficulty in the way that ought to be removed before your good intentions toward us could be of any effect. We agree with you, brothers, that this great evil amongst us, spirituous liquors, must first be removed. After this is done, we hope you will find an easy access to us, much easier than you can have at present.

"My brothers and friends, I hope that if we all try to prevent the introduction of spirituous liquors in the country of your red brethren, the Great Spirit will aid us in it, and then we shall meet with no difficulty in doing it. After this is done, we hope that the great services you have designed to do for us, the great things mentioned by you in our council yesterday, may take place and have that success you so much desire.

"I have nothing further to say."

It was Little Turtle who commanded the Indians at the defeat of General Harmer on the Miami river and also at the defeat of General St. Clair in 1791. He was one of the signers of the famous treaty of Greenville in 1795, and was a friend of the whites from that date. When he died, he was buried at Fort Wayne with the honors of war.

He was the first Prohibition orator in the United States.

It is wise in these times of summer sojourn, keep the essentials of our travel-gear packed handy for a sudden call home. As portmanaus of a soul, be ye also ready; for in such hour as ye think not, the messenger cometh.

He who makes man his god, chooses a god no will, from that very cause, cease to respect him. But he whose God is the Lord, has God who will not cease to love him. They no would seek for honor will find it from God one; in whom they cannot even rightly be-ve, if they seek it one from another.

Of the dead we are disposed to say nothing good, as we stand in awe of the great ex-perience they have passed through or the on-drous mystery they have entered. Should not view with equal compassion any fellow ings who are yet to experience that solemn ansition? So may it be excused if we extend oreign maxim: De mortuis nil nisi bonum,—riter de morituris. Yet for the protection others it is important that injurious char-acters of the living should be known, where a knowledge is for warning and not for andal or curiosity.

A Key to Thinking of Christ.

To thinking men the question seems to have an put, "what think ye of Christ?" But it our translation which addresses it to the nking faculties. It was rather of men's ions that Jesus queried, "what does it m to you concerning Christ?" and again, who do men say,—and who do you say, that the Son of Man, am?" The prompt answer Peter was not due to a process of thinking out, for Jesus commends it as of a Divine elation,—a spiritual opening to Peter's and, that Jesus was "The Christ, the Son of e living God!" And He blessed that fundamental condition of receiving truth and being planted on it. "On this Rock will I build my church." and Peter, as the name signifies, was a stone of his spiritual house upon that Rock. For "other foundation can no man lay, than Christ."

"Not what we think of Christ, but what He thinks of himself must be the key to our knowl-edge,"—as by his inspeaking word He opens our hearts to think with Him. "The key to Christ's life is not found in the laboratory [of the brain], but in the Holy of Holies." "In his light we see light." These expressions we note and modify, as our eye catches them in an article in the "Bibliotheca Sacra," (for Fourth Month, by Dwight Mallory Pratt) de-signed to show that "the key to Christ's life is the consciousness of Jesus,"—our conscious-ness of Jesus we looked for the meaning to be, but found the author to mean the conscious-ness of Jesus concerning himself. And he selects five of the claims to the supernatural which Jesus was conscious of and kept clearly assevering, namely: "preexistence, infallibility, sinlessness, supernatural power, and capacity as Son to reveal God." These, indeed, differen-tiate Him from all men. These form an un-deniable basis for thinking of Him as more than the Son of Man, and for men to "honor Him as they honor the Father."

What Christ declares that he thinks of him-self ought indeed to be authority for our con-fidence or knowledge, but we can apply the term "key to our knowledge" to nothing less than his own Spirit of wisdom and revelation given us to open to our understanding the knowledge of Him,—this "key of David, which openeth and no man shutteth, and shut-teth and no man openeth."

And this our author seems also to say, both in extracts above and in this quotation: "In order to be a great spiritual thinker, one must have a great spiritual life," and likewise, that "no man can say that Jesus is Lord, but by the Holy Spirit." The Holy Spirit is the true key to our knowledge of Jesus Christ, who said, "He shall take of mine and show it unto you."

We are not discouraged when the labora-tory of the scientist or of the critic does not confess Christ. His kingdom is not from thence, neither the spiritual knowledge of it, "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" "That which is born of the intellect is intellectual, and excellent when truly enlightened in its place. But that which is born of the Spirit is spirit, and it is life,—and these are what the words that Christ speaks unto us and within us, are. "He that hath the Son hath life, but he that hath not the Son of God hath not life,"—the Christ-life which is the key of knowledge in the spiritual realm.

Let this life of Christ subordinate to itself the intellectual in us, and then some thinking will be done that is truly great; let it domi-nate the emotional and our exhilaration will be from the wine of his kingdom; let it be in do-minion throughout the physical, and our mem-bers will be made instruments of righteousness, with clean hands, a pure heart, and a clearer brain to think Christ and his service by us, as they ought to be thought.

THE RELIGION WORTH HAVING.—Religion, to be worth possessing, must have a life-giving, life-moulding, hope-inspiring power. If it consists only in the observance of forms and ceremonies, counting beads and attending early masses; in other words, if it only im-poses weary burdens upon its votaries, or fails to cure the soul of doubts, fears and evil propensities, then it is utterly worthless. Some-one has well written: "We want religion that softens the step, and turns the voice to melody, and fills the eye with sunshine, and checks the impatient exclamation and harsh rebuke; a religion that is polite, deferential to superiors, considerate to friends; a religion that goes into the family and keeps the husband from being cross when dinner is late and keeps the wife from fretting when the husband tracks the newly washed floor with his boots, and makes the husband mindful of the scraper and the door mat; keeps the mother patient when the baby is cross, and amuses the chil-dren as well as instructs them; cares for the servants, besides paying them promptly; projects the honeymoon into the harvest moon, and makes the happy home like the Eastern fig tree, bearing on its bosom at once the tender blossom and the glory of the ripening fruit. We want a religion that shall interpose between the ruts and gullies and rocks of the highway and the sensitive souls that are travel-ing over them.—Religious Telescope.

Do not use thyself to dispute against thine own judgment, to show wit; lest it prepare thee to be too indifferent about what is right; nor against another man, to vex him, or for mere trial of skill; since to inform, or to be informed, ought to be the end of all confer-ences.

A Visit to Algeria.

All to-morrow we will be traversing the Atlas Mountains. We reach Tunis after 10 P. M. The trip from Algiers was interesting beyond description, but I have gone into so much detail already that I would tire you—only some of the gorges we passed through made me think of the wildest canons of the far west. Then there was always the interest of the strange people and their strange ways. But I think the greatest interest of the trip was the companions of our journey in the same coupe with us. At our hotel in Algiers we were continually meeting, as we went in and out, members of an embassy from Morocco, who were there to treat with the French Government about the trouble in that place. Splendid fellows they all were, and once or twice we saw the great man himself (we could not learn his title) who headed it. He was young, with brilliant flashing eyes and beautiful countenance. We left Algiers a little after 6 A. M. To our surprise the whole embassy went to the station with us; they were evidently going, too. At the station we lost sight of them, but as we got into the coupe where the porter had put our luggage, to our unspeakable joy the great man, with one of his suite, was sitting there. We were together for the entire day. Just before we pulled out a man got in, which rather annoyed us. We did not notice him for a long while. At noon we all lunched at a station high up on the mountains. As we retook our places the Frenchman asked us to change with him, telling us the finest scenery would be on his side. The moment he spoke there was no mistaking the man of culture. We, of course, thanked him. He then, in Arabic, asked the two distinguished travelers to change also, as he knew they did not care to look at the scenery, for both of them read the Koran almost the entire time. They changed at once, showing the greatest alacrity and pleasure in so doing. I asked the Frenchman to thank them, expressing as forcefully as possible our appreciation of their courtesy. Then the beautiful young man smiled upon us—one of the most charming, radiant smiles I ever beheld. It lasted but a moment, however, for he was soon again lost in his Koran. But with the Frenchman it was quite different. He was as ready to talk as I, so we continued hour after hour. J. and he exchanged cards. He was "conservateur des eaux et forets"—that is, an employee of the government to look after the forests and water supply, and a thorough scientist as well. He had lived in Algiers forty years, knew the history, knew the life, knew the Arabs, as only an intelligent man who had lived so long among them could. He seemed as glad to tell as I to ask and listen—I translated what he said, of course, for the others. We climbed, climbed all day, and towards evening were in the region of snow. It was long after dark when we left our companions at El Guerrah—they went on to Constantine, and we stayed at the little hotel all night. We were so sorry that the light in the compartment was too dim to enable us more than to see the outline of our distinguished friends, who were soundly sleeping. The Frenchman got out with us, shook hands cordially, and promised to call on us when he came to London. E.

P. S.—I must just add that the great man of whom I have been speaking is a member of the family of the Cherif of Ouzann (P.), who is for the Mohammedans much as the Pope is for the Roman Catholics. The Cherif is the descendant of Cherif, son of Fatima, the daughter and only child of the prophet. It seems the Cherif of Ouzann lives in Morocco—is under French protection—he has, of course, great influence over the people, who are, as a rule, fanatically religious. The French have now, I believe, England's promise not to interfere—to relieve the Sultan of his interests in Morocco. The Dey or Bey, who at present holds the country as a fief of the Porte, will simply change masters—much as has been already effected in Tunis. All Algeria, you see is a part of France, comprising three departments (like our counties), Oran, Alger and Constantine. Tunis is, however, simply a French protectorate. The Bey nominally has a certain amount of power, but, of course, that means only so long as he does what France wishes him to do. The people, however, are better satisfied, and feel protected in their interests. They tell us that Tunisia is in a very prosperous condition. We see nowhere any signs of discontent, but everywhere in Algeria, and especially in Constantine, French soldiers, French officers and French officials swarm. Constantine is naturally, from its wonderful position, a most important military center.

How She Managed It.

"You are always invited everywhere," said one girl to another, enviously. "How do you manage it?"

"I don't manage at all," replied the other, rather resentfully: "but when I am asked I try to earn my bread and butter!"

This, of course, meant that the speaker tried, by being as agreeable as she knew how to be, to make some return for the hospitality she received. A girl who goes everywhere in a critical spirit cannot expect to be a very welcome guest. If it happens that her own especial friends are not present and she will not exert herself to be nice to the other guests, even if they are not of her set, it is not probable that her hostess will be in any haste to ask her again. There are some girls, on the other hand, who diffuse an air of friendliness and of being pleased with everyone and everything, that is very delightful. They are not insincere, either, but they have the blessed faculty of getting the best out of everybody with whom they are thrown in contact. One of our most brilliant women, one whose name is a household word in almost every American family, once said to the writer, "I have never yet met anyone who, no matter how stupid he or she might appear at first, did not prove, on closer acquaintance, to know at least in one line far more than I do!" It would be well if we could take to heart this lesson in gracious humility and try to learn from those we consider our inferiors, rather than to condescend to them.

NEVER assent merely to please others; for that is, besides flattery, oftentimes untruth, and discovers a mind liable to be servile and base; nor contradict to vex others; for that shows an ill temper, and provokes, but profits nobody.

Fruits of Infidelity.

Our able contemporary, "The Herald of Gospel Liberty", in an article on a noted infidel, who died some five or six years ago, among other things says:

Charitable Christians were in the habit of referring to the claim that he was kind in his family, that he was opposed to slavery, and that he was liberal. But cannot the reader easily see that these very claims are in their full bearing a severe criticism. Who thinks of making such boasts of a fully noble man? The meager eulogies uttered for him along the moral lines reveal his lack of character. And then, when we recall his defence of the "star route" thieves, and his misstatements about the Bible, attributing to it the doctrines of the creeds, he knowing well that the Bible did not teach them, we are making an unnecessary strain in admiring him because of the few shallow or negative virtues he possessed. As to his candor, the following, from the "New York Observer," is in point:

"He once offered a thousand dollars to any one who would prove that Thomas Paine died a profane drunkard. The "New York Observer" accepted the challenge, and published the evidence with names of witnesses and dates, and claimed the money. He then modified his terms, making them impossible, and published a broadside of abuse about the "Observer." It was an example of his methods of fighting, whether as a lawyer or soldier. He will be remembered chiefly as an eloquent orator, who used his gifts to undermine the faith of simple and thoughtless people, and to bring ridicule and shame upon the religion of his fathers."

With regard to the above quotation from the "Observer" we may add the following extract from a letter written to H. L. Hastings by Myrr Benjamin, from Williamsport, Pennsylvania, Fourth Month 25th, 1870:

"I was invited by a distant connection . . . to go and see T. Paine. . . . The scene to me was appalling, and I wished to leave at once. I remember him as he lay, his head near and close to the door we entered, his glaring, rolling eyes; uttering imprecations, apparently in agony of body and mind, his screams could be heard at a great distance. As I shrank back they said (there were many there) he called on Jesus Christ for mercy, and next blasphemed."

This independent witness simply confirms the testimony of other respectable persons, whose veracity is only impeached by infidels who were not present, and who know nothing of the facts. The "Christian Advocate," of New York, said: "In this city alone, in a few months, twelve men and women died by their own hands, upon whose persons or at whose abodes were found extracts from his 'Justification of Suicide.'"

Enjoying the civilization effected by a Christian only partly pure, he abused it, instead of purifying it. His witticisms were tainted with malice; and a malice, or hatred not toward evil, but toward the good. Posing as a teacher, he was found on the wrong side of moral questions. He defended the robbers of the Government, he advocated the use of the mails for doubtful purposes, protected saloon-keepers, made suicide a privilege, and ridiculed the observances of the only day the poor man has for himself, even if he does not worship God. His life was wrong because his heart was wrong.—The Armory.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

AS JESUS TAUGHT.

Dear Father, thou hast sent Thy Son
To teach us what is right,
And may we all be following
His blessed, guiding light.
He taught how we may rightly live,
Life's happiness to find,
By following the Golden Rule
And always being kind.

Then may we follow in his steps
And do as Jesus would Then soon our souls will cease to wish
For aught but what is good.
We greatest happiness will find
In helping other souls,
And teaching all mankind to seek Life's highest, noblest goals.

Generosity and Corruption.

BY G. W. ALGER.

Some years ago there died in New York a politician who had been the notorious leader of one of the slum districts. During the greater part of his career, he had been the subject of the most pointed attacks by individuals and organizations interested in decent government, or he had been the enemy of everything which meant honesty in public affairs and social life. He had made money corruptly by extending in favor, under the usual arrangements, to individuals who wanted franchises for gas, electric light, and street railway operations; by affording his protection and influence to "policy men," to pool-rooms and gambling and disorderly-resort proprietors. His name had been signed hundreds of times on the bail bonds of thieves and fallen women.

He was a politician of a type common enough in the great American cities, and the characteristics of his career had been long familiar to the newspaper-reading public. Yet when he died, the largest church in the district was filled with a vast crowd of mourners. As the papers said, there was not a dry eye in the church. It was genuine sorrow. For the money which his more reputable gas and railway friends from the brown-stone districts had given him had paid many an old woman's rent, had helped many a friend in trouble. The "protection" money had been freely given to be outings and games of the social organizations of the district. His "pull" had always been available for the man who wanted a job. The money of Peter had gone to an army of sailors, and the great robber baron had died comparatively poor. He had been a public enemy—with a big heart; disbonest—and generous.

There are two lines in Tennyson's "Idylls of the King" which seem to embody a kind of acinating puzzle.

... God fulfils himself in many ways, Lest one good custom should corrupt the world."

How can any custom which is good be corrupting? Can there be a dangerous virtue? Considerable rumination has persuaded the writer upon giving an affirmative answer to the question, the episode of the funeral of the District leader being only one of the cases in point which have led to this conclusion.

The foundation of healthy, sane life, and of tight public law and government is justice. It is his right and platitude enough, but it is dangerous to forget it. The departed District Leader got his power in life and his apology and defense in death from the fact that throughout his career he ignored or abused all known notions of justice—and was generous instead.

There is a certain dramatic quality in generosity which appeals to the heart. A mean rascal we all despise and hate; but a rascal with a big heart, who never forgets his friends, finds many apologists. It is of the utmost importance to a country organized, like ours, on a democratic basis, that as a people we should be highly sensitive to injustice. That sensitiveness is the most necessary protection for freedom, the greatest force for good government. Anything which tends to befog our ideals of justice, or to make us underestimate its importance, is a danger to be guarded against.

In the latter days of Rome, the darlings of the rabble were the oppressors of Africa, who transmuted the sweat and blood of conquered provinces into bread and circuses for the Roman mob. Justice, long since dead in the imperial city, had been succeeded by a riot of generosity of the most lavish and barbaric kind. It would be, of course, a jaundiced eye which should make any but a most distant parallel between the Roman rabble and the American people. But much, if not everything, is forgiven the millionaire whose fortune has been wrung from the overtempted consciences of aldermen, if he recognizes what the college presidents call "The Responsibility of Men of Wealth."

As a people we have fairly good taste in our attitude toward the philanthropy which finds its root in fraud and unjust enrichment. If a traction magnate or a tricky financier gives us a hospital or art gallery, we do not cry in an offensive chorus, "Where did he get the money?" We accept with a philosophic gratitude anything given back to us collectively which was stolen from us individually, for the excellent reason that, the ill-gotten booty having been once acquired by the great operator, it is a public good fortune that his expenditure of it should in some degree take the form of public gift, rather than of private wassail and ostentatious extravagance. The great man, we say, was not obliged to spend anything on public charity. His fortune, by whatever devious, crooked ways acquired, is, so far as the legal title is concerned, his, and not ours; and so any portion of it which he may choose to transmute into public service is a just cause for general rejoicing. It all goes to confirm our faith that there are bowels of compassion and spots of virtue in the worst of men, even in our most inveterate millionaires. Having accepted the gift, we refuse to vilify the donor.

One of the effects of the generosity of the unjust, which deserves more consideration than it gets is, this: it closes the mouths of critics whose voices might otherwise be heard in effectual protest against public wrongs or defects which cry for change in economic conditions. Limitation of space confines the writer to one illustration.

There was public agitation some years ago concerning a certain bill, involving a franchise of great value, which was being heavily lobbied through the New York legislature. A movement was at once begun against the measure, and during its progress a gentleman standing justly high in public esteem, a man of unquestionable probity and of great influence, was asked to take part in this protest. He remained in doubt for a few days, and then declined. He was the president of an important charitable institution dependent largely for its support on the generosity of a particular donor who was also the real sponsor for the grab bill. With what he conceived to be the prosperity of his institution at stake, he could not feel it to be his duty personally to antagonize the corrupt scheme of the generous supporter of his institution. Other able men, he argued readily, could be obtained to do the work which, under the peculiar circumstances, he must refuse to do himself. The gain which the opposition to the lobby for the bill might make by his influence did not seem to him at all equal to the quite probable loss which he felt might come to his institution by such offensive action on his part.

Now this man is normally, and when not subjected to peculiar and perplexing circumstances, neither weak nor timid, but quite the contrary. In this particular case he simply had been called on to decide a hard problem. His decision was undoubtedly wrong from an abstract moral standpoint; but in view of the great responsibility which he felt for the welfare of his institution, his error was the less unpardonable. He was a man whose silence could not have been bought by any personal consideration. Yet the generosity of a public enemy to his particular institution of charity had effectually closed his mouth.

Just how far the loss of influence of the city churches is due to similar conditions, it is hard to say. To the writer there seems to be a certain tendency among the great metropolitan churches, to plan their expenditures on the basis of the largest amount which may be expected from the richest parishioner. So that in case any two or three heavy contributors should for some reason terminate abruptly their donations, the work of the church would be practically crippled. With the finances of the church built on such a foundation, it is hardly surprising that the sharp edge of pulpit criticism should be dulled, or should find expression, if at all, in innocuous and ineffectual generalities that keep up the brave show of a spiritual independence which has been long since smothered by charity.

The medical world to-day is full of learned talk about germ diseases, and the great scientists are constantly increasing the fund of human knowledge as to how these germs are to be destroyed, or their perpetuation retarded. If it were only possible for some spiritual scientist to devise some workable scheme to prevent in the moral world the perpetuation of perverted ideals! We read much to-day of the Great White Plague—tuberculosis,—and how it breeds and spreads in the tenements, destroying its thousands. But the Great White Plague in the rich man's university, the germ of moral tuberculosis in the ideal of success, avoids the microscope.

After all, the principal use of the college is as a place where the next generation is to get right ideas of what is worth while in life itself. The academic facts which to the ignorant seem the advantages of education are of minor importance. We hear much during the season of college commencements of the necessities of the modern university in the way of enlarged endowments and increased equipment. Some of this talk is, of course, reasonable enough. It is addressed mainly to the rich as a demand for the recognition by them of a duty of generosity, one which in our days has had a most remarkable response. But apparatus is an impossible substitute for ideals, and the best endowment of a college is the character of its graduates. The two-thousand-dollar bequest, for example, to his Alma Mater, which the will of the late William H. Baldwin contained, was small if considered as a mere matter of money, but his character and the ideals of public service which his life expressed form part of that permanent endowment which alone makes a university great. The memory of a railroad president ready to sacrifice, if need be, his position, rather than lose an opportunity for usefulness on an unpaid committee of citizens handed together for important civic service, is a rarer and more precious contribution to the fibre of university life than any mere material bounty from ravenous fingers unclutched by hypocrisy or the fear of death.

The principal criticism of the generosity to colleges of men whose great fortunes have been obtained by doubtful methods and through suspicious sources is not alone that their money comes coupled with their own personal history, nor that the hope of their favor has an undesirable influence on certain forms of college teaching and on the public utterance of college officials, but that these gifts of brick and mortar and money have a tendency to make the ideal endowment seem less valuable and important. We cannot afford to have the traditions of our colleges become largely the traditions of suspicious rich men who make money and build buildings.

It seems like the mere hyperbole of a jealous and disappointed spirit to affirm that the corrupt practices of the unjustly rich are less harmful than their benevolences; but the statement will bear argument and furnish much reason for a belief in its accuracy. It is because this benevolence tends to create in the popular mind confusion on a matter of morals concerning which we cannot afford to have confusion. We cannot afford to believe that the seizing of special and unjust privileges, or the use of corrupt practices or oppression, by which enormous wealth is increasingly acquired, may be excused or palliated by public gift or private benevolence, or by generosity, however bountiful. We cannot afford to let a delayed or partial restitution acquire a false glamour, and under a false name become a substitute for common honesty.

There is no place where the substitution of generosity for justice is a greater evil than in the courts. The great delay which frequently occurs in the selection of jurors in law cases is due to the endeavor of one or the other of the opposing lawyers—rarely of both—to pick out jurors who will deal justly with the rights of litigants and who will not be merely generous at the expense of justice. The task of selecting such jurors is increasingly difficult, particularly in accident cases against railways. The injustice which results from the corrupt granting of railway franchises, for example, has a larger area than is generally supposed. There is a strong tendency manifested in juries to even up this original injustice by a generosity which is itself unjust. For injustice almost invariably begets a spurious generosity.

The writer listened some years ago in the New York Supreme Court to the trial of an accident case brought by the widow and children of a man who had been killed by the street railway which runs on Broadway, to recover damages from the railroad company for having caused his death. The widow produced only one witness, and his testimony was clearly perjury from start to finish, while four reputable bystanders called by the railroad clearly showed that the accident had been the result of the recklessness of the deceased; yet the jury after some delay brought in a large verdict for the widow and the children. One of the jurors explained his verdict thus: "The railroad company got on to Broadway by putting up a little money to a bunch of aldermen. They got their franchise for next to nothing, and that woman and four children have as good a right to their money as the road has to its franchise. With all the money the road gets out of Broadway, they can afford to do something for that man's family, and I am glad we had a chance to give them the verdict. I could not go home and tell my wife that I had a chance to give some railroad money to a widow and four children, and did not do it. She would put me out of the house."

The railway companies complain bitterly, and often with much reason, of the injustice done by such verdicts, but they forget the original injustice which these juries blindly, blunderingly, and unjustly seek to correct.

In politics, as we all know, the worst class of politicians, the one whose power for evil is the hardest to overcome, is the class in which corruption is coated with the whitewash of generosity,—the legislative burglar with a big heart. The logrolling which is the bane of our politics is nothing more nor less than the exchange of generousities by public servants at public expense, and a large part of bad law-making is the result of the unjustifiable favors which one unconsciously kind-hearted statesman extends to another.

It is, of course, a mean soul which is not warmed by generosity and benevolence and the expression through such acts of the larger humanities. In comparison with true generosity, justice seems meagre and mean, as the cold working of the intellect rather than the warm pulsation of the heart. Justice, mere justice, never satisfies. Aristides the Just was killed by the Greeks, not because he was just, but because he was nothing but just. From fibre like his, heroes are not made. The natural man much prefers Robin Hood. Without generosity the moral world seems dull, gray, cold, and conventional. It lacks sap and vitality, and the imagination is not touched. But, after all, justice is the rock on which alone generosity can safely build, and when it seeks some other foundation, it is the scriptural house built on the sand, and like it cannot endure. —Atlantic Monthly.

NEITHER be vain, lascivious, proud, drunken, revengeful, or angry; nor lie, detract, backbite, overreach, oppress, deceive, or betray; but watch vigorously against all temptations to these things, as knowing that God is present, the overseer of all thy ways and most inward thoughts, and the avenger of his own law upon the disobedient; and thou wilt acceptably serve God.

The Irreligious Woman.

A lady who has recently returned from trip to Europe, and who enjoyed unusual opportunities while there for becoming acquainted with the private life of foreigners of high social standing, recently made these striking observations:

"I visited several houses while I was gone, which, in the midst of culture and refinement there was no religion. In all these the same characteristics were noticeable, but in they were specially marked. The mistress this house was perhaps fifty years old or more gray-haired, dignified, elegant. Her husband was somewhat younger, fond of his club as his own pleasure. They had comparative little in common, and I could feel rather the see—for they preserved the most scrupulous etiquette in their outward relations—that they were not happy and did not have each other's confidence. The young lady daughters, prettily and graceful and possessing some charming accomplishments, seemed yet without zest for life. The sons were growing up like the father, one of them at twenty seemed blase.

"I cannot tell you how painfully was impressed upon me during my stay in this household the awful lack which is produced by the absence of religion. There was no religious observances, no Bible, no church-going. The need of these was so sadly reflected in the lives of these people! Instead of revolving beautiful harmony around one central thought as does a Christian household—a thought constantly elevating, refining, quickening—the seemed absolutely no homogeneity in the whole. It was as though each member of the large family were pursuing a separate path, search of he knew not what. There was feeling as though here were a flock without shepherd. One's heart ached to direct them to a Guide, a Helper, and indeed, I said all that I could in courtesy say to meet what I felt to be their cruel need.

"The tone of the conversation in this family, which was always bright and witty, was equally trying. It was cynical and pessimistic to the last degree, and full of flings and sacred things. But the most striking thing to me in this whole experience was not its effect upon my moral sense, though that was, of course, the most shocking. My whole aesthetic nature revolted at it. No doubt similar families abound on our own side of the Atlantic, but my lot here has always fallen among Christian people.

"Now I saw, as I had never seen before, how ugly and unsymmetrical is a household without the love of God in it. If the moth had only been a Christian, how entirely altered would the whole scene have become! I realized as never before what a gain of meanness would be secured could sin be tanged 'the carriage of a holy saint,' to say nothing of the loftier objects which would be attained if the heart were attuned to Christ's teachings. Touchingly impressive and beautiful I had always known the Christian life to be, had never quite understood what a real 'ornament' was the 'meek and quiet spirit' of a true Christian." —The Congregationalist.

HE that has more knowledge than judgment is made for another man's use more than his own.

TEMPERANCE.

The matter under this heading is furnished THE FRIEND on behalf of the "Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia," by Captain F. Whitson, 401 Chestnut St., Phila.

Say not, the struggle nought availeth
The labor and the wounds are vain,
The enemy faints not, nor faileth,
And as things have been they remain.

If hopes were in dunes, fears may be liars;
It may be, in yon smoke concealed,
Your comrades chase 'em now the fliers,
And but for you, possess the field.

For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent, flooding in, the main.

And not by eastern windows only,
When daylight comes, comes in the light,
In front, the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
But westward, look, the land is bright.

—Arthur Hugh Clough.

A man who, with open eyes and a clear understanding, permits wrong to be done with protest and resistance up to the measure of his power, has responsibility for the sum of that wrong. Nobody has a right to peaceable when there is sin around, and it is surrounding him. If there is wrong he cannot say to himself, "There are partners and I shall only have one-fourth its responsibility." You have the whole! God does not make dividends in those. —Henry Ward Beecher.

Last year $3,350,000 bushels of grain went to the manufacture of drink. If converted to bread that amount would have supplied a family in the United States with 365 meals—one for each day in the year. Not an issue of an issue, is it?

In 1903 we spent $17.85 per capita for alcohol, and collected $2.87 internal revenue, this omits criminals' and paupers' costs, which are properly chargeable to the trade.

Commissioner A. H. Jones, of the Ohio State Food Commission, has been quietly investigating the soft drink question. He asserts summer drinks are being doctored with sugar in order to create thirst for them.

The company, was forced to take its entire stock from the market after the state chemist examined samples of its products on sale in various points throughout the city.

The attention was first attracted to the beverages by the fact that persons using them were affected in the same manner as cocaine. —American Issue.

trouble with the saloon lies in what it sells. license palaces, low license doggeries, districts, blind tigers—these are but methods of distributing the same commodity, and that is alcoholic poison whose nature is not changed by the sign over the door or the amount paid to the Government for the privilege of its line now has a State Commission which has the power of a sheriff in any county for the purpose of enforcing the prohibitory law of that State. Sheriff Pennell, who has allowed saloons in Portland, as the wise and right way of doing his duty to the county, says he no longer has discretionary power, and his saloon-keeping friends have shipped their stocks of liquors back to Boston. Faithlessness rather than inability is the trouble with too many officials.

"When a town votes out the saloons some croaker is sure to say: "You will kill the town." No doubt some of the antics took that position when Statesville was voting on prohibition. It went "dry." During the past three months over $150,000 have been invested in manufacturing enterprises. Within the same period a certain North Carolina town, well situated for manufacturing, lost the location of a large industrial enterprise because the capitalists did not wish their labor demoralized by the numerous saloons.

Whiskey never yet brought one dollar to a town without causing the loss of ten." —Charlotte (N. C.) News and Observer.

MISSOURI'S GOVERNOR ON LICENSE.—The following is a portion of the special message recently sent by Governor Folk, of Missouri, to the legislature of that state:

"I have heretofore spoken to you of the pernicious effects of the state licensing the liquor traffic in any form. The so-called high license law should be amended so as to eliminate the licensing of the liquor traffic by the state. If the liquor business is an evil thing it should not be permitted at all. Certainly the law should not sanction such a business, and by licensing it make the state a partner in the iniquity. Stripped of all useless verbiage, this act levies tribute on all debauchery and crime; in this respect it is indefensible from any moral standpoint. If it be insisted that men will drink and sell liquor anyway, and the state may as well profit by their appetite and lust for gain, it could with equal force be argued that men will kill, and therefore the state should license murder in certain forms and in certain places so as to profit by this weakness of mankind.

"If it be said that the licensing of the liquor traffic be justifiable when the proceeds of the license go to help maintain our worthy institutions, the answer should be: the state of Missouri is wealthy enough to support adequately its institutions without making them owe their existence to the licensing of a business that degrades the youth and pollutes the morals of men. If it be right to maintain our institutions in part by the licensing of the wrong, the same principle would justify the support of our institutions wholly and even the State Government from the fruits of legalized crime. The government of Monte Carlo draws its subsistence from the licensing of the gambling table, but such an idea is abhorrent to every Missourian. It would be wrong to support the state government by putting a price on evil. It is wrong to license the liquor traffic at all. This is not the demand of a frenzied morality, but of a sound and healthy public sentiment that will not tolerate the sharing in the profits of vicious practices."

TEMPERANCE AFFAIRS IN NORTH CAROLINA.—The Watts law passed by the preceding legislature wiped out the distilleries and saloons from the country districts, restricting them to incorporated towns, and giving such fair play to local option in the towns that the saloons have been driven from three-fourths of the counties of the state. This excellent law was supplemented at this session by the Ward bill, which prohibits the manufacture of liquor in towns of less than a thousand people, its sale in towns having less than two policemen, and makes the possession of a United States license in prohibited territory prima facie evidence of guilt. The local dispensary at Raleigh was such an object-lesson in the resulting sobriety of the capital city that special acts were passed for dispensary elections at Winston and Asheville. An "anti-jug law" making the place of delivery the place of sale, and thus making the shipment of liquor from any point in North Carolina to another in prohibited territory unlawful, was passed; it applies to nearly all the prohibition counties of the state.—American Issue.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING (larger body) adopted the following minute at its last session, if the "American Issue" is rightly informed.

"We take this opportunity to enter an emphatic protest against every effort to make the Liquor Traffic a laudable and legalized industry. And especially condemn the recent efforts of the Governor of Ohio to rob the Brannock bill of its force, and to strengthen the position of its opponents."

Philadelphia is doing some needed house cleaning. Yet her City Council is no more machine dominated than was the recent session of the General Assembly. In response to an overwhelming demand from the people, a majority of both Houses of the Legislature were ready to vote for the local option bill. But through the instrumentality of a Chairman, who admitted his absolute subservience, the very same politicians against whom the public clamor is now raised in Philadelphia, issued a flat refusal to permit any action on the subject.

But for this refusal numerous communities in the Commonwealth would soon be without saloons. Next year the people must choose a Legislature that cannot be organized to strangle local option. To this task the Anti-Saloon League has set itself, and wants the co-operation of every friend of good government in the State. Let us have done with political piracy, not only in Philadelphia but in Harrisburg as well.—Keystone Citizen.

OUR great men, doubtless, were designed, by the wise framer of the world, for our religious, moral, and politic planets; for lights and directions to the lower ranks of the numerous company of their own kind, both in precepts and examples; and they are well paid for their pains too, who have the honor and service of their fellow-creatures, and the marrow and fat of the earth for their share.

If we look upon the earth, we see it among the trees of the woods, from the cedar to the bramble; among the fishes, from the leviathan to the sprat; in the air, among the birds, from the eagle to the sparrow; among the beasts, from the lion to the cat; and among mankind, from the king to the scavenger.

"FOR THE FRIEND."

Anecdotes of Former Friends.

BY J. R. ELFRETH.

The following anecdotes of Friends who lived during the latter part of the 18th, and the early part of the 19th Centuries, were related to me by my father and grandfather, and were well known to both of them. Nicholas Wain was a minister in the Society of Friends, was born about 1750. Though his parents were Friends, they were not strict ones, and he was brought up in fashionable society. They educated him for the law, and after completing his studies in Philadelphia, he was sent to Oxford. On his return from England he practiced law in Philadelphia and appears to have been a great favorite among the German portion of the community. He was lively and pleasing in his manner, and of quick wit; the latter he found it hard to restrain even after he became more serious, and a minister of the gospel. It is related of him that shortly after his return home, he was engaged in a case in which the man in whose office he studied law, was the opposing counsel. Nicholas won the case, and after the Court adjourned, the lawyers were talking the matter over, when his preceptor said, he did not know he was rearing up an eaglet to pick out his eyes. Nicholas replied, not to pick them out, but to open them.

About the age of thirty-five, he appears to have been visited by the Holy Spirit, whose restraining and constraining influence worked a change in him both externally and internally, so that he became a different man. He began to attend meetings regularly, and soon became a consistent Friend. In one of the First-day morning meetings he appeared in supplication, I think before he changed his dress. While thus engaged James Pemberton an elder requested him to cease. Nicholas replied "Touch not the Lord's anointed, and do His prophets no harm." He then went on with his prayer. J. P. afterward acknowledged, that he had been too hasty in speaking to him. Sometime after this he came forth in the ministry, and his friends acknowledged his gift.

Arthur Howell, a minister who was in the habit of leaving his communications to near the close of the Meeting, or as I have heard my father say, till it was time for meeting to break, did so one day, and as Nicholas came down the gallery he stood in front of Arthur, and delivered the following dissertation:

"Arthur Howell, what's the reason
Thou art always out of season?
When it's time to go away,
Thou must either preach or pray."

There are many other witty and humorous sayings of his, which might fill pages, but as I propose to write of several Friends, I will finish concerning Nicholas with one told me by my grandfather, where the young woman rather got the better of him. One day at meeting a young woman came in dressed in satin, a garment in those days very uncommon among Friends. It caught the eye of Nicholas, and thinking, no doubt, to reprove her for extravagance, he came to her in the yard at the close of Meeting, and touching her on the arm, said "Satan within, and satin without." She turned, and seeing who it was, replied, "Yes, and Old Nick at my elbow." It was witty, but neither was very respectful.

Since penning the above I remember another that seems so remarkable that I think it should go down. Nicholas lived in a house on the west side of Second street a few doors above Spruce, his wife who was quite tasteful had put some new curtains to the front parlor windows, which two plain women Friends who were passing observed, when one of them remarked, "I wonder that a man occupying the position that Nicholas Wain does, would allow such curtains at his windows." She had hardly expressed herself, when Nicholas turned out of Spruce street, and as he passed them he said, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone at her."

Arthur Howell referred to above was a remarkable man, he seemed to have a knowledge of things that were going to happen, and was called the Seer. My father told me that at the grave of Ann Miffin, a Minister who died about 1810 or '12, Arthur Howell spoke, and said, "Friends, I see the Angel of death hovering over this company, with a drawn sword in his hand, and hear him saying, 'Shall I smite them, my Father, shall I smite them?'" In a few months seven ministers who stood around that grave, deceased.

About 1798 a Frenchman named John DeMarsalac came to this country. He began to attend Friends' Meetings, became plain in his dress, and made application for membership and was received. The day of the Monthly Meeting when he was received, which was held at the old Meeting-house southwest corner of Second and Market streets, Arthur met his nephew Israel Howell, and told him he had been to Monthly Meeting, and that they had received John DeMarsalac, "and now mark what I tell thee, he will turn out to be a rasal."

John spoke frequently in meeting and was held in good esteem by many, until 1806 when he returned to France, and it is said that after the ship passed the Breakwater he threw off his plain coat and taking up a fiddle began to play, singing "I'm done with the Quakers. I'm done with the Quakers." It was supposed by many that he was an emissary of Napoleon, and that he used the plain dress, and affiliated with Friends, to ward off suspicion while he was attaining the information he was sent for.

The death of so many ministers so near together proved a stripping time in the Society, and the late aged friend Abigail Hutchinson, a minister of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting told me that when a young girl she attended the funeral of William Savery an eminent minister in our Society, in the old Pine Street Meeting-house. After a large expression of the great loss the Society had sustained in the removal of so many standard-bearers, a young woman on the floor dressed in a chintz dress arose and repeated the following lines.

"What though a Paul has run his course,
Or an Appolos dies;
Is Israel left without resource,
And are there no supplies!
Yes; while the dear Redeemer lives,
We have an endless store;
And shall be fed with what He gives,
Who lives for evermore."

That young woman was Elizabeth Barton, who lived near Haddonfield, New Jersey. She married William Evans a minister, and afterward became a noted minister, indeed I think the greatest female minister I ever knew.

FOR "THE FRIEND"

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The work of instructing the children a Boarding School had at this time been continued for many years, and there were interesting evidences at times that the labor Friends in this direction were producing benefit. In this connection the following deduction of one of the scholars at Tunc who afterwards became a teacher among people may be introduced. It is interesting not only as a production of an Indian girl for the information it contains of the culture which had taken place in a comparatively few years, in the customs and ways of the community on the Allegheny Reservation which she was a member. This young woman was a diligent and careful scholar, and on occasion committed to memory the tenth part of Matthew containing 42 verses, in two hours. The writer of the essay was Jackson, it is dated Tunesassa, First 12th, 1879.

"Few of the Indians in former days how to read or write. They did not have else to do but hunting. There were no roads near them. There were few white living on the Reservation. The deer and were found near their dwellings, so that they did not go far to obtain venison. As for they did not have their corn ground by mills but the women pounded them with a tar and pestle and made squaw bread. It did not season them with salt or salerati simply mixed it up with boiling water. I made their clothing of the annuity goods consisted of blankets, broadcloth and goods. They also made their clothing of skins of bears and deer. The women dresses of these skins without the hair first they would be nice and soft, but they would get wet they would become and produce a loud noise when walking. I also made moccasins of the skins. They take the quills of porcupine or hedgehog color them with blue, yellow or red. The women would sew and fasten them moccasins. This they thought was very full. The old folks would dip the children the river when it was full with small pebbles, so that they could endure cold water better. I guess they did not keep them long, for it would be too cold. They made medicine which they call "little v" in their language. This they used for all applications. During summer they gather many varieties of roots with which the medicine to use through the winter. I consider the rattlesnake as having great medicinal qualities. They think the flesh of a snake roasted the best medicine for the fever. They also value the oil very much which they think was very good for headache, sore-throat, etc. They believed in witch there are many stories told about the would almost make anyone believe by them. But they don't talk much about things now days. Though there is a on this Reservation whom some of the think is a witch. They believe also that spirits of persons remain ten days after die. But the former days of our father passed away in which they lived by fishing, and have now entered into another different course of life. Then they began construct log houses, and by and by as time ad on, three Indians built three comfortable houses at Old Town, and soon after the men entirely abandoned their old habits. The boys of the Allegheny Reservation came school here when Joseph Elkinton was a teacher, my father was one of them. Many of Indians are now good farmers.—Thomas Jones of Cattaraugus Reservation who raises annually a thousand bushels of wheat, John Mt. Pleasant of Tuscarora Reservation who raised year fifteen hundred bushels of oats and ten hundred bushels of wheat, five hundred bushels of apples, three hundred barrels of wheat and beside other fruits in abundance, as a beautiful farm of two hundred acres. owns two reapers, one mowing machine and two threshing machines. His wife who is a Quaker woman keeps the house neat and in order. They milk ten cows. John White of Seneca Reservation is also a good farmer, there are many others. There are many thousands of dollars expended for the education of the Indians. I think the worst faults among the Indians are laziness and intemperance. Cider seems to do more harm among men. It seems also to do more harm than whiskey. We have had a temperance society that would prefer to drink to those who would keep the Indians in the way they have made. For there are many Indian men who have met a drunkard's death.

In the year 1879 considerable improvements were made in the school building, at a cost of $600, which was defrayed by contributions of interested Friends. A large amount of land was sold during this year, amounting in value to over $1000, which was applied to the uses of the institution and ten acres of land lately cleared was prepared for cultivation.

The Act of 1875 provided that in 1880 all leases which had been made should expire, should be renewable upon terms which had then been agreed upon by the Council of Seneca Nation of Indians and the white people; and also that the income of the leased land should then and thereafter become the property of the nation, instead of individuals. The intelligent and careful transaction of the business thus devolving upon them required much care, and system, and a degree of business training with which the members of the Council thus acting for the first time were not expected to be familiar. The number of leases at this time were believed to amount to 1200.

Members of the Committee visiting the institution in the Third Month 1880, met with the Councilors in one of their sessions, and the wards addressed them in writing, calling attention to some things which they believed would be useful to them in the performance of their new duties. A part of their remarks was as follows:

In order that every transaction should be fully understood, not only at the present time, but in future years, when other persons than ourselves may be Councilors, we would implore upon you the necessity of having all your work made out in writing, stating the amount of the lots, the rent to be paid, and other circumstances which should be remembered; and also that these leases should be recorded in a book, so that you and your successors may have a copy of them. Every sum of money which is received should also be carefully entered in your account books, with a memorandum of the lot of ground from which it comes, the name of the person paying it, the date when it was due, and the day when it was paid. The sums of money paid out should also be entered on the books; so that any person having the right to examine your accounts should be able to understand them without difficulty.

"We would also impress upon you the necessity of having a fire proof in which to preserve your valuable papers, maps, and account and record books. This would also be a proper place for preserving a record of marriages, births, and deaths."

The Continuance of "The Select Miscellany."

For a number of years past, "The Select Miscellany" has appeared monthly in various homes among Friends and others.

Printed by a Friend who felt it was a part of his ministry to circulate literature of a profitable and edifying character, this little sheet reaches many homes as a free-will offering and token of love on the part of the Publisher. Realizing that there were those who would co-operate in its circulation, and who would desire to pay a small subscription for the paper, a business arrangement was entered into with the undersigned, whereby The Select Miscellany would be sent to any address one year for twenty-five cents. To those who felt interested in helping in its circulation, six copies were sent to any one address one year for one dollar. These figures were a trifle above the actual cost of printing, but the work involved in the publication of even so small a sheet as the one under consideration, was considerable. With the death of Joseph S. Elkinton, the paper ceases; and unless there is sufficient evidence on the part of the present recipients as well as Friends and others who are interested in reading and circulating the paper, the cash balance (for unfilled subscriptions) on my books to the credit of each subscriber will be refunded, and the account closed.

While there are a number of persons who do not wish the paper dropped, it must be apparent that as a business proposition, it cannot be maintained unless there is more than a sentimental interest expressed. If reasonable assurance could be had, that there are eight hundred persons sufficiently appreciative to subscribe for one or more copies, the continuance of a paper on similar lines might be considered, but as the list of subscribers has materially decreased in the last year, the conviction will be apt to force itself home unless there is a decided sentiment to the contrary, that the little monthly visitor has fulfilled its mission, and may now be laid down.

Do not accuse others to excuse thyself; for that is neither generous nor just. But let sincerity and ingenuousness be thy refuge, rather than craft and falsehood; for cunning borders very near upon knavery.

Items Concerning the Society.

Jesse Derbyshire, Catharine D. Smith and Lydia B. Sargeant of England have since their arrival attended meetings in the vicinity of Philadelphia, and were announced to attend the Merchantville Meeting, N. J., last First-day.

The late sitting of the Meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia was said to be held under a season of much solemnity in view of the decease of Joseph S. Elkinton, whose long and exercised attendance in that body makes his vacant place very seriously felt.

A private letter mentions Joel and Anna K. Cadbury as having left England, where the climate did not suit them, and gone to Switzerland, which they found very beneficial. Their son William expects to leave them in England about the end of the month, and visit hospitals in Vienna till Ninth Month, and Joel and Anna Cadbury to sail for home Seventh Month 20th.

Joel Bean, of San Jose, California, was in attendance at Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, held at Mount Laurel, N. J., on Sixth Month 15th. Since Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was held, he has been found at several meetings in New England (the editor welcomed his unexpected presence at his mother's funeral in West Falmouth, Mass.), and has since appeared again in and about Philadelphia, including Atlantic City Meeting. He has returned to New England to attend the Yearly Meeting at Portland, Maine, which commenced on the 23d and probably ended last Fourth-day.

Alluding to the reported singing of hymns in the London Yearly Meeting for Ministry and Oversight, W. R. Stackhouse in the Intelligencer quotes from the minute of that Yearly Meeting of 1813, the following:

"It hath been, and is our living sense and constant testimony, according to our experience of the diverse operations of the spirit and power of God in his Church, that there hath been, and is, serious sighing, sensible groaning, and reverent singing, breathing forth an heavenly sound of joy, with grace, with the spirit, and with understanding, in blessed unity with the brethren, while they are in the public labor and service of the gospel, whether by preaching, praying or praising God, in the same power and spirit, and all to edification and comfort in the church of Christ; which, therefore, is not to be discouraged of any. But where any do, or shall abuse the power of God, or are immoderate, or do either in imitation, which rather burthens than edifies, such ought to be privately admonished, unless rebellious; for that life, spirit and power is risen in the church, which both distinguish, and hath power accordingly to judge."

We have heard much singing of hymns, on the motion of the first starter, in such meetings; but of such an order that we believe an observance of the conditions and limitations laid down in this quoted advice would have made it impossible.

Notes in General.

The Christian Advocate contains a sentence from the inaugural address of John Adams, containing 720 words. That single sentence would fill a column of THE FRIEND, and one-fifth of another.

No greater speech, says the Intelligencer, has recently been delivered in any national parliament than that of D'Estourelles de Constant in the French Senate, on Fourth Month 11th, on the question of reduction of armaments. It may be had by securing copies of the Advocate of Peace for Sixth Month and Seventh Month, 1905, a special translation having been made for that paper (31 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.)

The attention of those writers and public speakers who claim that the negro is degenerating intellectually, is called to the statement just made that negroes in the United States have written more than three hundred books, and have produced three magazines and four hundred newspapers. There are at least five hundred negro physicians in this country, while there are three banks under negro control, and several hundred negroes in New York city alone, who each possess property valued at $50,000 or over.

Think of the mother of a six-week-old baby going down into the cramped, wet bottom of a prospect shaft and doing a full day's work as a common miner. This is one of the incidents in the life of Henry Falk's wife, Querida, Col., a woman who has taken rank among the miners of that part of the State as an unusually successful prospector. She has not only staked out her own claim, but has done a great part of the actual work of digging two thirty-foot shafts on it and to-day finds herself the owner of a valuable mining property. All this she has accomplished without neglecting the care of a large family.

The Bishop of Norwich has been discussing the question of the bishop's big palaces, with all their accompanying pomp and expenditure, which have come down to us from feudal times. The Bishop recognizes that the old feudal notion of bishops as members of the aristocratic class is quite out of touch with the life and thought of to-day. He spoke of the great expense for repairs his own palace inflicts on him, and said that he could contribute three or four times that to the new Suffolk bishopric if a means to give to the new Sufolk bishop a year he proposes to give to the new Suffolk bishopric if a moderate house were provided for him. As it is, he has never been able to live with his episcopal income. The Church, like sheepshanks, must recognize the changed times and adapt itself to them. In face of the urgent need of funds for church work and the great impoverishment of the clergy, to keep up the past status of the bishops was an anachronism.

The commencement season is upon us again, and the programmes of such events, more or less pretensions, are to be found in almost every home. We confess to never passing through this season or attending these functions, as we have done for more years than we care to count, without our emotions being stirred to their depths by mingled feelings of hope and fear. He who can watch the gay fleet of youth cross the bar and put out upon the tempestuous and treacherous sea of life without profound emotion, must have a heart of stone. What a buoyancy of hope, here and there sobered by regret, marks the step and air of these young people, to whom the realities of life are in the future. What wonders they are going to work, for youth is always the period of high enthusiasm. What disillusionment awaits them many of our readers who "commenced" in the long ago know only too well.—Episcopal Recorder.

WHY WE PLANT TREES.—The pupils were discussing tree planting in a West Philadelphia school the other day.

"Why do we plant trees?" asked the teacher. The scholars' replies came thick and fast, and here are some of them:

Because they are beautiful.

Because they give us shade.

They break the force of winds.

They help to make us healthy by equalizing the temperature and moisture in the woods.

Because they provide us with India rubber, gum, rosin, spices, dyestuffs, medicines, seeds and nuts.

They furnish us with timber for building houses, ships, railway cars, etc.

Because without them we could not have spoils, matches, shoe-pegs, toothpicks and lots of other useful things.

Because trees are the most valuable crop the ground can produce.

The value of our trees is twenty-five per cent. more each year than our production of all our wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley and buckwheat put together.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The administration of the law respecting the exclusion of Chinese has lately been considered by the Cabinet at Washington, and the President has expressed himself as determined to insist upon the fair treatment of Chinese immigrants. It was stated that the President took the view that the fair treatment of Chinese is necessary, not only in the interest of American manufacturers and business men, but in compliance with the ordinary principles of justice.

Hundreds of Chinese guilds have already entered into an agreement that whoever buys so much as a dollar's worth of goods from the United States shall pay a heavy tariff. This movement is rapidly spreading. The whole Administration, except Secretary Metcalf, of California, who thought the law was not harshly administered, takes the view that something must be done at once to prevent the United States from losing the whole of its great and rapidly increasing business with China.

A despatch from Washington says: "Orders have been issued to the diplomatic and consular representatives of the United States in China by the President himself that they must look closely to the performance of their duties under the exclusion law, and see to it that members of the exempt classes coming to this country are provided for at any port of the United States, and will be accepted at any port of the United States, and will be guaranteed the bearer against any harsh or discourteous treatment. Such treatment, indeed, will be the cause of the instant dismissal of the offending official, whoever he may be. In addition to the President's orders, Secretary Metcalf has issued instructions to the immigration officers, which, it is believed, will remedy the difficulty which has been complained of by the Chinese Government and individuals. It is anticipated that the prompt action taken by this Government to meet the objections made by the Chinese will eliminate the possibility of serious trade difficulties between China and the manufacturers of this country."

On the 19th ult., a train running at the rate of fifty or sixty miles an hour was wrecked near Mentor, Ohio, and partially set on fire, resulting in the loss of 19 lives.

The United States Commissioner of Education has stated in his annual report that there are now in this country nine libraries that have over 300,000 volumes each, and eight fifty-nine that have over 100,000 each. Divided according to the average number of volumes, it is found that there is one library for every 11,000 people.

It is stated that New York city pays a private corporation $192,000 a year to remove the refuse, while in two hundred towns in Great Britain this product is disposed of in such a manner as to yield a handsome revenue. It is stated that the average consumer, not refuse, generating sufficient power to do all their public lighting.

A decision has been handed down by the Massachusetts Supreme Court in reference to the rights of a laboring man. That tribunal holds that labor unions and their members cannot legally procure the discharge of a workman because he is not a member of the union, in an attempt to gain the advantage of the labor union contract with the employer. The Court held that it is against the policy of the law to sustain action in support of a monopoly. This decision "decrees the open shop as a matter of potential law, whatever may be the language of the employer."

Dr. Wilson, of the Agricultural Department, it is said, will purchase 100 goats from abroad, the animals to be experimented with for milk purposes.

Luther Burbank of Santa Rosa, Cal., has for thirty years past experimented in improving and developing plant life. The Carnegie Institution has recently granted him a ten year subsidy of $10,000 in order to enable him to continue his experiments. Among his products are the Burbank potato, the Burbank plum, which is said to combine the best qualities of the American and Japanese varieties, and is grown in many countries; a prune four times as large as the French prunes of commerce; a white blackberry; a thornless raspberry bearing multiply colored berries; a plum about the size of a cherry, but in bunches across, and a thornless cactus, believed to be very valuable for furnishing food for cattle on the deserts.

FOREIGN.—On the 19th ult., Emperor Nicholas received a deputation from the Zemstvos. A despatch says he was much impressed. In his reply he said: "I have been grieved in my whole soul with all my people at the families the war has brought upon Russia, and I am confident may still be feared, as well as at our disturbances.

"To dissipate your doubts I say that it is my soul and unalterable will that the admission of elected representatives to the works of State shall be regular and complied.

I watch daily and devote myself to this work. May I announce that to all your friends in country town.

"I am firmly convinced that Russia will emerge strengthened from the trials she is now enduring, and that will be established soon, as formerly, a union between the Emperor and all Russia—no communication between the Emperor and the Russian soil. This union and union must serve as a basis for the original principle of Russia."

These declarations have been received with joy Russian press.

There has been a general strike in Lodz and in Russian Poland, and a proclamation has been issued by a workmen's party calling out workmen as test against the actions of the Government. It is between them and the military has taken place.

A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 23d a letter from the Caucasus says the Mlookans have prepared to follow the example of the Douma, and suggest to emigrate to America to escape official persecution.

Another despatch says: Harrowing details are received of massacres in Transcaucasia. There is cruminate slaughter, in which Armenians, Tartars and Kurds are engaged. There are said to be no combatants. These have been reported to be the cause of those butcheries except that they result of a long period of misrule.

A great battle appears to be impending between Russians and Japanese in Manchuria. Neither appears to be earnest in attempting to secure an armistice. This has been suggested by Japan to be first of Eighth Month.

The Swedish Riksdag has lately met to consider dissolution by Norway of the union of the two kingdoms. Oscar urged a peaceful solution of the question, and the Government introduced a bill of negotiation in connection with the forthcoming of an ocean desert, destitute of vestige of plant or animal life, and covering mill square miles of the bed of the Pacific, is announced Prof. Alex. Agassiz, after a six months' cruise Albatross. The ocean desert may be roughly defined as lying beneath the waters of the southern Pacific, and beginning about 600 miles west of that point.

It covers an area approximating 2,000,000 square or a little larger than Russia, extending somewhat of the equator and south of the twentieth parallel, including Easter Island. On this vast plain vestige of plant or animal life is to be found. The discovery of this plain is of the greatest importance, which generally seems to be almost incredible.

It is stated that freedom of religious worship was established in Japan until 1872, but that now the Christian congregations in every large city and in every town, and they all have complete freedom of religion in accordance with their own convictions; there are a number of Christian newspapers andazines; Christian schools are given all the privileges to Government schools of the same grade.

Beef-farming is stated to have become a profitable occupation in many parts of the Argentine Republic. The first hay "crop" was brought to market in 1822. At the present time there are 600,000 head in Australia, and the hay varies from 1,000,000 to 15,000,000 pounds a year.

Japan has a large business in cultivating sea vegetables and raises and gathers two million worth of them annually. In this country the growth of sea moss is probably the most important item this kind.

Alfredo Trombetti, of Bologna, has an international reputation as the world's greatest linguist. He more than one hundred different languages and is still adding to his knowledge of strange ones. Every nine or fourteen years of age he is studying the various languages of the world.

A Doctrine no Release from its Life.

The rejection of water-baptism cannot be tried in as an equivalent for an experience the true; neither can abstinence from the remonial bread and wine be taken as a sign at one knows the communion of the Spirit. There are thousands sunk in carnality who have never touched the outward ordinances, and thousands who have. Neither circumcision alleth anything, nor uncircumcision; neither toward performance, nor nonperformance of carnal symbols,—but a new creature: the very of that Spirit which by our embracing and conforming to his living energy transforms us to a new creation. He is the Baptizer with a river of the water of life. He is the dispenser of living communion with this quickening Spirit. One can partake of carnal emblems these, and continue an utter stranger to God's power; one can leave the emblems as a blank, and still be himself equally a blank to God's life. No denial of the carnal can be a substitute for the spiritual; but when the spiritual life has so endowed us with the reality of the baptism and the communion of the Spirit to supersede any emblems of them, then does not standing clear of those emblems mean anything; it means that substance has taken its place of shadow, that the experience has discharged the symbol.

Those stand on the heathen side of Christian baptism who flatter themselves that they are clear of the outward sacrament, or who condescend to themselves that they have taken it, when they yet know nothing of being so baptized into Christ himself as to have put on Christ,—when the form is all that they know of baptism or of communion, and equally so when the avoidance of the form is all that they know of it.

It is especially painful to find any of our members resting on their uncircumcision,—resting on the word "not," standing in the very heart of it as a cipher. "Oh yes, I am a sound Friend; I have not submitted to the outward ordinances, I have not attended other places of worship, I have not used the compliments, I have not made vocal profession of conversion, I have not done any religious talk in my neighborhood, I have not been heard uttering vocal prayer, I have not gone into creaturely activity or been seen in religious labor," and so on.

But let us take warning that if what we have not done is our whole claim to salvation, we are as the goats separated from the sheep, on that very word "not." Those nots that are only another word for shirking the cross, reluctance to enter into grace, unspiritual sloth mistaken for soundness, or a cover for indifference, may not endanger a certain kind of respectability, but they will hold us back from that true life in which the word "not" would have its true and anointed use. Where all those negations are based on spiritual experience, where they are a product of true waiting on the Lord for right authority, where they voice the restraints of the cross and not of the creature; where they stand as ready to fly when the Spirit of Life says "go," as to stay when he withholds his command,—then they mean a subjection to the Master and his word, which is the only Quakerism that is truly sound. It runs in the way of his commandments with as much alacrity as one returns unto his rest, where in returning and in rest he shall be saved.

Our very profession before Christendom that as "there is one Lord, one faith, one baptism," so there is one "water," which He showed in Revelation, — the "pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb," even that "holy Spirit which proceedeth from the Father and the Son,"—that profession is tantamount to an announcement that we, consenting to remain as members under it, are in the experience of the baptism of the Holy Spirit.

Need we wonder at the signs of a blighting where so many unbaptized members throughout our heritage abide, whose chief presumption of baptism is the testimony that they have not been baptized with water? We discard the rudimentary way because there has been shown to us the more excellent way. But because we are excused from the one in favor of its superior, shall we miss of this too? Shall we be less baptized with the Holy Ghost than they who, because they thought they were doing God service in a certain form, faithfully did it according to the light they had? If we neglect the baptism of the Holy Spirit because our doctrine about it is supposed to take its place, we shall have to account for our dire misrepresentation of that which we were raised up to stand for, by something more than the blighting of our power which we bewail,—even by a blasting, and that without remedy.

Wait for Him till you Hear, then Wait on Him.

BY LORD RADSTOCK.

The elementary lesson is to have communion. It is of the same importance to hear the Lord's guidance in speaking to one as to a thousand. Don't go without being sent. Many fail here, they think they must do something, must go and speak to some one and they have desperate failure. Why? The Lord hath not sent them. It would do this convention good to be shut up separately a week alone with God! for the salt may lose its savour. The first question is, are we definitely, entirely the Lord's? I do not mean are we Christians, but are we of one mind with Christ? If we come to meet the Lord we shall meet Him; do not let us come to meet man, or to hear man. He is very jealous. He wants us to be at his orders, and He has to teach us when to sit still. He will stop us when we are in a presumed path of duty which is not the path He chooses for us. When a soul has received Christ it is a baptized soul. I do not mean baptized by water. I mean engrafted into Christ, spiritual baptism is identification into Christ, baptized into Christ's name. "Ye shall receive the Holy Ghost." The office of the Holy Ghost is not only to comfort and fill you with peace, but to testify of Christ and make you forget self and see Jesus. When Stephen was filled with the Holy Ghost he saw Jesus. You say you don't like waiting. When Moses waited forty days his face shone! At first he said he could deliver his people, but he failed miserably. God sent him away to the backside of the desert for forty years and then he said, "I cannot speak!" But when God was with him he led Israel out. You get into a railway carriage, you are perplexed; ought you to speak to everyone? Not unless God bids you. Your words will be useless unless God sends the message. You say you don't hear God's voice—Wait to hear it. If I were speaking outside and there was a great noise in the street you could not hear, but come close and you will hear.

Wait till you do hear.

Anecdotes of Former Friends.

Richard Jordan was a minister and member of Haddonfield Meeting. While travelling on a religious visit with a friend, as they rode through a piece of woods, they passed a Methodist Camp Meeting. The Friend said after leaving them, "what a noisy set of people these Methodists are. I wonder if they do any good?" Richard rode on in silence for sometime, when he said, "We read in the Bible, that in the building of the Temple, the sound of neither axe nor saw was heard. But it must have been a very noisy place in the mountains of Lebanon where that wood and stone were cut."

My grand-mother, Jane Peirce, was an elder of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, as was her husband Caleb Peirce, the latter for over 50 years, dying at the advanced age of 90. They were held in great esteem by their friends.

In the Spring of 1816 J. P. showed much uneasiness in regard to the future, putting her household effects in order, as though for a long journey or death. It was a surprise to her husband, as they had a family of children, some of them quite small, and she could give no reason for her feelings.

At a Monthly Meeting held in the Sixth Month, Sarah Wilson, a minister, laid a concern before their friends to visit Baltimore, Virginia, and North Carolina Yearly Meetings. Jane Peirce believed it to be her duty to accompany her, and they were liberated for the service.

This was the first intimation that such a service was required of her, nor did she know of the concern of S. W. until she opened it in the meeting.

While on this visit they were much surprised at the appearance of Friends in Virginia and North Carolina, especially in the dress of the women, they wearing calico with large figures. At one of the meetings which they attended a woman thus arrayed, with a large sundown tied with yellow ribbon under her chin, came in and took her seat in the gallery. The man Friend who accompanied them looked over the Meeting (as he afterward told them) and the query arose in his mind, "Can these dry bones live?" As it came and went he was much surprised to see the woman with the sundown, untie the ribbon take it off and after laying it down, she began with, "Can these dry bones live? Yes, they can live, and the same spirit of the living God, that breathed into the dry bones in the valley of Salt, and made them a living army, can make us living witnesses for Christ and His glorious Gospel," and she enlarged on it in a remarkable manner.

While on this visit Jane Peirce formed the acquaintance of Mildred Ratcliff, a minister in Virginia, which ripened into a friendship, that lasted during their lives, and when in Philadelphia she always made her home at my grandfather's. Mildred was one of those old fashioned Friends who enjoyed a smoke, a very common thing in those days for men and women in the south to indulge in. While I can recall but three women Friends who smoked, i. e. my grand-mother; Elizabeth Pittfield, a minister of North Meeting, and Sarah Folwell, yet it was a very common practice among men Friends, and I can well remember at my father's who entertained many Friends during Yearly Meeting, that pipes and tobacco were as regularly furnished as pies and custards, and after their meals the old Friends would go upstairs to their smoking-room and indulge in the noxious weed for an hour. It would seem very strange to us to see good people do it now. On one occasion when Mildred Ratcliff was at my grandfather's after dinner grand-mother invited her to smoke. She said "no, Jane, I have given it up." "What?" said grand-mother, "given up smoking?" "Yes, Jane, I have given up smoking. I had a remarkable dream some time ago. I dreamed that the judgment day had come, and a vast multitude stood before a man who sat by a large gate with a great book in his hand, and as each one's name was called the book was examined and judgment passed upon them. When my turn came I went up, and to the inquiry for my name, I answered, 'Mildred Ratcliff.' After looking through the book, he looked up, and said 'I find no such name in this book.' I trembled violently and said 'oh! do look again.' He did so, and after going nearly to the end of the book, he said, 'I have found it, Mildred Ratcliff, but so begrimed with tobacco smoke that I can scarcely make it out.' In my joy I awoke, but so frightened that I resolved never to smoke again." Her decision did not effect my grand-mother, who continued the habit till the day of her death, which occurred very suddenly on Fifth Month 4th, 1846. It was First-day. She was at meeting in the morning, and after eating her dinner lit her pipe and took her seat on a low chair by the large open chimney, as was her custom after each meal. After finishing her smoke she went to lie down, grand-father had preceded her, and said it was not long when he heard a groan, he turned and spoke to her, but receiving no reply called his daughter, who immediately sent for the Doctor; but when he came, though only a half square off, life was extinct.

I have given this account of the death of my grand-mother, to note a remarkable sermon delivered by Sybil Jones, a minister of New England Yearly Meeting, on a religious visit to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. At the Select Quarterly Meeting, held at Arch Street Meeting-house the day preceding grand-mother's death, she arose with, "Set thine house in order for thou shalt die and not live." She dwelt on the uncertainty of life, saying, "the hand of death is in our midst, and so near is the Friend to me, that I could lay my hand upon her." Grand-mother was sitting in the gallery within two or three of her. The meeting was brought into great solemnity, and the subsequent event made it long to be remembered.

The recording of my grand-mother's death, brings to mind the sudden death of her sister, Abigail Pyle, which I have heard my dear mother relate, she having been named for her.

An indiscrete second marriage of the father of Jane and Abigail Pyle, when they were quite young, caused their removal from their father's house. Jane going to live with a married sister, and Abigail with another. They lived a long distance apart, and met only at their Quarterly Meeting. On one of these occasions, Abigail related to her sister Jane a remarkable dream she lately had. She said, "I dreamed that I was called to stand before the judge of all the earth, who after looking into a book, looked up and with a most benign smile said, 'I find nothing against thee!'"

They returned to their houses, and a few days after, as Jane was coming in from the garden, where she was gathering something for dinner, she was arrested by a feeling of great solemnity, attended with language so clear to this, "Art thou prepared to endure affliction?" The solemn feeling accompanied was so great, that she involuntarily dropped what she had gathered, and going into the house, looked at the clock. It was eleven. Some hours after a messenger arrived to inform them, that Abigail while in the act of drawing water from the well, had been struck by the handle of the windlass on her temple, and stantly killed at precisely eleven o'clock.

Thomas Scattergood was an eminent minister, belonging to North Meeting, in the east part of the last Century. One First-day morning he purposed going to Haverford Meeting. As he was crossing Market Street bridge felt a stop in his mind, and an intimation that it was required of him to return to his meeting. He put it by, crossed the bridge, turned into the Lancaster Turnpike, and proceeding out it, when the impression to turn to his own meeting came with increased force. He again attempted to put it off, with the excuse that his meeting began at 10 o'clock and Haverford at 11, and to go back would make him too late. But the intimation to turn was too strong for him, and turning his horse around, he made for his own Meeting. Arriving there, he fastened his horse to a post and with saddles under his arm went into the Meeting-house, and took his seat in the gallery. After sitting a short time he arose with the words "What a fool I am, to sit at Quaker Meeting! This is the language some one now present, and to him I bring message; The fool hath said in his heart there is no God." He then opened up in a remarkable manner the sin of infidelity, ending with a loving invitation to "Come, and see that the Lord is good."

It appears that a man of some prominence who lived within a few squares of the "Keys Alley Meeting-house," as it was called (being in what is now called New Street between Front and Second Streets, below Vine Street, and afterwards removed to the last Meeting-house, corner of Sixth and Ninth Streets) and well known for his infidel views related to his wife at the breakfast table the morning a singular dream he had had the night before. He said he thought he was walking along Second Street, and seeing a concourse of people moving along he followed them; he turned into Keys Alley, and then to the Quaker Meeting House. He went in and after sitting sometime in silence, the side door opened to a little old man with saddles under his arm, he came in, and going up into the raised seat took his seat, putting the bags under the seat. He soon arose, and preached the most remarkable sermon he ever listened to. His wife rather ridiculed it, saying it was on a dream, and not worth noticing; but seeing it had made a great impression upon her husband she advised him to go, saying it will do you no harm. It was his practice to take a walk First-day morning; he went as usual and his feet were led to Second Street. Seeing some Friends going to their Meeting-house he followed, went in and took his seat, and after sitting sometime in silence, and no old man appearing with saddle-bags, he said to himself "w" fool I am, to sit in a Quaker Meeting," The words had hardly passed through his mind, when Thos. Scattergood entered as narrated above. At the close of the Meeting he came to Thomas Scattergood and told him about his team, and how he came to be there. T. S. invited him to call at his house, which he did, and a friendship sprung up between them, resulting in the man becoming a humble Christian.

The above incident reminds us of the lines of the Poet.

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform,"

SLEEPING SAINTS.—A traveling evangelist has the following to say regarding a very common and very careless oversight: "I have a peculiar way of reading papers when they fall into my hands. I first examined that little piece of paper pasted on the Central with letters and figures on it. I find that it read thus: 'J. J. L.—, 23d Oct. 1872.' I looked at it, and turned it about, and finally I put my finger near to it. The deacon was silent, and the others did not seem to be in the situation. I said, mildly, 'Deacon, I do not tell me that there were no sleeping saints in this part of the earth?' 'Oh, yes, I did; and these other brethren confirm it.' I then asked, 'Deacon, you are one yourself.' He then asked why I said so, and I pointed to his mark on the paper. He was confused, and I was glad of it. Said I, 'Do you ever pay your just debts?' He said that he did not owe fifty dollars. I then asked whether the paper had ever been of any due to him and his family. He assured me that they put a high value upon it. I then calmly said, 'It takes money to publish a paper, and you have been getting it for more than ten years, at some one's expense, for it took money to send it to you.' The others present then themselves in the same situation, and assured the elder that they were awakened to their duty, and would forward the money promptly."

WE are all sensible what a stately seat it is; heavens adorned with so many glorious lunaries; and the earth with groves, plains, valleys, hills, fountains, ponds, lakes, and rivers; and variety of fruits and creatures for food, pleasure and profit; in short, how noble a house He keeps, and the plenty, and variety, and excellency of his table; his orders, seasons, and suitability of every time and thing. But we must be as sensible, or at least ought to be, what careless and idle servants we are, and how short and disproportionate our behavior is to his bounty and goodness; how long we tarry, how often He reproves and forgives us; who, notwithstanding our breach of promise, and repeated neglects, has not yet been provoked to break up house, and send us to drift for ourselves. Should not this great goodness raise a due sense in us of our unthankfulness, and a resolution to alter our course, and mend our manners; that we may be for the future more worthy communicants at our Master's good and great table? Especially since it is not more certain that we deserve displeasure, than that we shall feel it, if we continue to be unprofitable servants.

The Delay of God.

He is not slack as men count slackness, but is long suffering.

Judge not the Lord by feeble sense
But trust Him for his grace.

In the multitude of ignorant prayers this one tops them all: "Lord, how long?" The heathen chief said, "If these things are true, why are you so late in coming?" How can we prove our right to ask, "How long?"

Two things belong to God. He is holy and He is hidden. Secret things belong to Him, but things revealed belong to us and to our children. Go back to the 15th of Genesis. Learn to take off your shoes. Thus early did He reveal his promise and conceal his reasons. Look at the scene: the childless man, the vision of God, the banishment of fear, the power of the judge, the promise of a good old age, the stretch of four hundred years, the reason for the long delay, "for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full." Who shall measure the speed of God? Who shall dare to call Him slow who said, "They shall afflict them four hundred years."

What do you mean by delay? If three millions of people had to be transferred to-day from Egypt to Palestine what would men do? They would advertise for contracts to move the whole, and impose heavy fines for non-fulfillment as to time, speed, etc. But the Lord did the whole business, and how did He do it? Forty years long was I grieved with this generation and said, It is a people that do err in their hearts, for they have not known my ways; unto whom I swear they shall not enter into my rest."

Man could make the transfer in forty days, for the land was near. The Lord took forty years. Man measures time by the clock, God measures by character. How prodigal of time?

It is amazing how these accusations of delay rise up in the hearts of the good, and stand in front of the Most High. Martha and Mary said, "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died," and yet in sovereign holiness the Master said, "I am glad for your sakes that I was not there."

H. T. MILLER.

BEAMSVILLE, ONT.

IT'S TOO OFTEN THE CASE.—That you spend too much time criticizing and too little time helping.

That you content yourself with giving advice instead of lending a helping hand.

That you grumble at the wrongs that abound on all sides and fail to make an effort at righting them.

That you yearn for reforms without giving any assistance to those who are striving earnestly to bring them about.

That you waste a lot of time denouncing politics as "dirty business" and neglect to take a hand in purifying it.—The Commoner.

IN such controversies, it is but too common for some to say, "It is to blame," to excuse their own unconcernedness, which is a base neutrality. Others will cry, "They are both alike;" thereby involving the injured with the guilty, to mince the matter for the faulty, or cover their own injustice to the wronged party.

Malpractice in Revival.

All men have what, for want of a better term, may be called the religious instinct. For that reason, under favorable circumstances, more persons can be touched by persons of strong religious conviction. Herein lies the hope of saving men. Religion is not something foreign to their nature. Men at their best are truly religious. A man is true to himself when he follows his religious instinct, educates, develops and trains it.

But just because religion is one of the deepest instincts of the human heart, just because man's highest interests are wrapped up in what we call his religion, for that reason it is all the more important that we should never trifle with him here. If anywhere we should deal with a man fairly, honestly, sincerely, without deception, we should do so when we set before him the claims of Jesus Christ as his Saviour and Lord.

It is, for instance, a little thing simply to touch a man's religious emotion, to get him momentarily to think he wants to be saved, to get him to rise in a meeting, to hold up a hand, to sign a card, to ask for a prayer. But if we get him to do nothing more, if we do nothing more for him than that, we have done him little good, and may have done him harm. Men are not saved simply because for a moment they think they want to be saved. To stir up any emotion, and fail to give it permanent value by causing it to materialize in an act, to stimulate any instinct without giving it real practice and satisfaction, is malpractice, which results in dulling the instinct and weakening the function. For that reason many people, having been so frequently revived, without being led into a constant religious life and practice, are gospel hardened, and are practical infidels.

Religion is a very real, a very practical, and at the same time a very serious matter. We here deal with facts, no less facts because they are spiritual facts. Religion is in no way law. Men cannot be religious in an easy, haphazard, magical way. One does not become religious by chance. One does not catch religion as one does a disease, by contagion. Man no more becomes religious without faithfulness than a man becomes educated or cultured without any effort on his part. In that sense "Jesus has not paid it all." A man cannot get "a ticket into heaven." No man can be saved except through Christ. That is true. What Jesus has done for us is of inestimable value. But let us never deceive men by telling them that He has bought our salvation and can hand it over to us as if it were a kind of commodity. Without knowledge of the mind and spirit of Jesus, without obedience and loyalty to Him, without repentance and a life of faithful service, no man can be saved.

And we who are Christians owe it to ourselves, to our fellow-men, to Christ and the truth, to state to those we would convert the simple, plain, unconditional demands laid on those who would achieve the gift of everlasting life held out to those who live according to the life and spirit of Jesus. Let no one be so foolish as to try to make the way into the kingdom of God easy. The way is simple, but it is straight and narrow. It is difficult, just because it leads to real joy and life eternal.

A BLESSING OF PAUSE.

"Therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you. . . . Blessed are all they that wait for Him."

I have no time to wait, I said,
My life is full of tasks,
I grudge a moment from my work
To give the help one asks;
My burdened heart and weary brain
Have scarcely time for prayer,
I am a servant all day long
And wanted every where.
Not half is done I ought to do,
And the time is very late—Lord, give Thy blessing while I work,
And bid me not to wait.

Through weary days I struggled on,
But the light was faint for me,
How could I do the finest work
With eyes too tired to see?
I lost my place, mislaid my tools,
And I lost heart the most:
Was it worth while to strive, and toil,
And fail—at such a cost?
At last I cast my burdens down—
Lord, do Thy will, I said—
Then a great peace came over me,
And I was not afraid.

My Lord had waited patiently Through the long time. And He Was kind, and very merciful,
And gracious unto me,
I did not even try to work,
I sought not any quest;
He laid his hand on heart and head,
And I was glad to rest;
For all the rush and haste were gone,
And I was stilled at length,
Then, rising, took my work again,
And a new gift of strength.

—Marianne Farningham.

Loyal Obedience.

One cold night a gatekeeper at a railroad station was making every passenger show his ticket before passing through to the train, which provoked considerable grumbling and protesting. Major Whittle, who was on the platform, said to him, "You are a very unpopular man to-night." "I only care to be popular with one man," was the reply, "and that is the superintendent." He might have pleased the passengers, disobeyed orders, and lost his position. He was too wise for that; his business was to please one man—the man who hired him, gave him his orders, and rewarded him for faithfulness, and who, if the occasion for such a course ever arose, could discharge him for any act of disobedience, or for neglecting the interests of which he was an employee.

And so it happens that the servant of Christ is often bound to make himself unpopular. There are those who would be glad to have him relax the strictness of his rules, and grant to himself some indulgence, which his Master forbids. But if he tries to be popular with the world, he will lose popularity with the Lord. He will make friends, but he will lose the one Friend who is above all others. He will win plaudits, but he will not hear the gracious words, "Well done!"—The Christian Herald.

It is not enough that a thing be right, if it be not fit to be done. If not prudent, though just, it is not advisable. He that loses by getting, had better lose than get.

The Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

They also alluded to the importance of strict honesty and faithfulness as public officials in acting for the whole nation. Their Address concluded with the following paragraphs:

"There is another subject which we feel it best to mention at this time. Great use appears to be made of intoxicating drinks in Salamanca. Are you exerting all your influence to discourage it? Do you not have it in your power to restrict the number of places where it is offered for sale, by refusing to lease lots to persons who sell it? We believe your influence on this subject is great, and we desire that this great evil may be diminished in every way that is proper. We hope you will bear this subject in mind. Allow us also to say that the individual example of persons in your position is very great among the Indians, and that a giving way to the use of these drinks by the representatives of the people has a strong tendency to cause them to be evil spoken of, and weakens that character which it is very desirable to maintain before the community. Many eyes are upon you, both of the white people and Indians, and we desire that by looking unto the Great Spirit, and seeking counsel from Him, you may be directed aright in your movements, and may be able to act with true wisdom under the difficult circumstances in which you are placed."

In 1880, Aaron P. and Eunice Dewees who had very acceptably discharged the duties of Superintendent and matron for seven years felt themselves released from further service. In reviewing his connection with this concern, A. P. Dewees remarked that no seven years of his life had been spent more to his own satisfaction. George W. and Abigail B. Mott of Coal Creek, Iowa, were appointed in their place. These Friends had previously spent a short time in care of the Institution, having left it in 1873.

In the Twelfth Month of this year a communication was received from one of the Friends at the School, stating that an Indian woman of middle age who had formerly been a scholar there, and afterwards a teacher among her people had expressed her desire to become a member of our Religious Society: having as she said no satisfaction in many of the rites and ceremonies used in worship by those with whom she was associated, and that she had sometimes spoken against them to her fellow members, from whom she now felt satisfied to withdraw; and believed it would be a great strength to her if she could become a member of the Society of Friends.

After giving this subject careful attention the Committee believed it right to represent the case to the Yearly Meeting in their Report made in 1882, which the same year adopted a rule of discipline by which individuals circumstance as she was could become members of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. This person, Cynthia Gordon, was afterwards received a member of that meeting. She was for some years a valued helper at Tunesassa, after her death in 1898 an account of her life and character was published in THE FRIEND, vol. lxxi., page 297.

In the Report made in 1881 the Committee remark: "The Friends at the Institution are united in the opinion that at present much the labor bestowed upon the girls is lost for unsuitable marriages, and the lapsing of many of them into their old ways. The present buildings are arranged mainly with a view of: commodating girls, but three to five boys being admitted." Although it did not appear though steps could be taken at that time accomplish this object, it was not lost sight and the way opened a few years later to carry it into effect. It was however concluded endeavor to obtain a Friend who could assist in the care of the boys out of school to reside with his family in the tenant house near the school building, believing that such assistance he could render would materially aid strengthening the hands of the care-takers in preparing the way for training a greater number of boys in school, and in the proper method of farming.

In the Report of 1881, it was also stated: "The Indians are evidently becoming more acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, and in a manner in which the recitations have been made by the children at the Institution is encouraging, they appearing in good measure to understand. Since the visit among them a number of copies of the Bible and Testament and some other religious books, have been sent to individuals, and there is an open field of useful books to supply with reading those who are able to read English works. They observe that the number of those who attend places of worship appears to be increasing."

In the Eighth Month 1878 an important meeting of the Six Nations took place to consider a proposed transfer of the business of the Indian Bureau at Washington from the Department of the Interior to the War Department. The views of these Indians on this subject had been invited by the Government. Although this is a matter in which the Society of Friends had no part, yet as a matter of history and as showing the views upon a subject so closely affecting their interests it may be well to notice it in this connection. The proposed transfer was not made.

The account is taken from an article published in "The Chataqua Farmer," it stated: "The venerable Counsellor Isaac Half-ton of the Allegheny Reservation was chosen Chairman of the council, John Kennedy acted as interpreter, and displayed a good deal of genius in the execution of his task. He Silverheels, native missionary, also acted as interpreter, and opened council with prayer."

"In Council all were grave. They seemed to feel that a solemn crisis was upon them. It seemed to think the proposed change portentous evil to them. The black aspect of the War Department cast a deep and melancholy shadow upon their souls, and they spoke like men arming vital issues. Their speeches were no specimens of oratory.

"The speakers were calm, argumentative, pathetic and irresistible. Only one sentiment was in them, and that was disapprobation of the measure. The strong orators were Shann, Dr. Poodyry, of the Tonawandas, and Late of the Onondagas. A number of young men spoke well. In fact we were astonished at the ease and facility with which they all commanded language and the dignity with which they could argue in public."

The conclusions of this Council were ssed in a protest of the "President and Messengers of the Seneca Nation of Indians, numbering 2338 Senecas; chiefs of the Tonawanda band of Seneca, numbering 679 Senecas; chiefs of the 491 Onondagas; chiefs of the 411 Saroras; and chiefs of the 182 Cayugas in New York Indian Agency."

"The closing paragraphs of this forcible document are as follows: "We very much fear that the proposed change would prove disastrous to the red man, that as a step in the work it would at best be a hazardous and danous experiment. We are unable to see that good to our race would be likely to result from it. We regard it with intense aversion as fraught with evil, injustice and cruelty."

"We therefore most respectfully and earnestly pray that the Honorable members of Congress, representatives of the great and powerful nation, now occupying nearly all the lands between the two oceans, but recently ceded and in possession of the red men, will carefully consider the subject in all its bearings before taking final action upon it, to the end that no injustice be done."

"In this frank expression of our opinions and desires, we have not been advised or incited by any officer or person in the Indian Service."

"The visits at the homes of the Indians on reservation, the Friends residing at Tunesassa, have often the opportunity of ascertaining the difficulties surrounding the respective families, and at times administering to their relief, or assisting them in other directions; and there is reason to believe that these visits have at times been very helpful. The labors of Ebenezer Worth in this direction were especially valuable and the advice and sympathy manifested by him still render his memory grateful to some of the middle aged and older residents of the Allegheny Reservation. A memorandum has been preserved of a visit paid by two members of the Committee in 1880, which may be of interest, as follows:

"Called at George Loff's who is lying very ill and not likely to recover; but he appears to be in a very comfortable frame of mind; stating that he felt prepared to leave the world. On the first being taken sick, it was a great trial to think of leaving his wife who had been very kind and faithful to him, but he believed His Heavenly Father would give her strength to nurse him the remainder of his time here, and to be with her when he was gone. He desired that the young people might begin earlier to thank our Heavenly Father, for they do not think on soon enough."

"He wanted to say to us that he was in the habit of worshipping our Heavenly Father every day and every night; and since he had been unable to work, and had taken to his bed, had many opportunities of worshipping his Heavenly Father, or to that import. It was a precious opportunity. He came from Canada, and is about 27 years of age."

"In 1881 the construction of a railroad from Salamanca along the Allegheny River towards City in Penna. was actively carried on. A new road runs through the Reservation in Salamanca for a distance of perhaps 12 miles. In the Ninth Month of this year the Superintendent at the School writes: "Work progressing on the new railroad about one hundred rods from our house, and we already see the demoralizing effects it is producing upon the Indians, many of whom are employed in clearing up the ground ready for grading, and the proceeds of their labor is freely spent at the liquor shops and boarding houses which have been increased in consequence of the new railroad."

For many years previous to this time the subject of allotting the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservations had claimed the attention of the Indians residing upon them and had frequently been alluded to in conversation with members of the Committee, and also publicly. In 1880 and 1881 the matter was brought forcibly to their consideration by the introduction into Congress of bills providing for the allotment of the lands of the Indians throughout the United States (excepting the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory) and for the purchase of the surplus lands which might remain after the allotment had been made: These bills also provided that the allotment should not be carried into effect as respects the lands of any tribe, until the consent of two thirds of the male members of it should have been obtained. Early after the opening of Congress (on the 22nd of Twelfth Month) 1881, resolutions and a remonstrance were adopted by the Seneca Council against the passage of such an Act, and a delegation was appointed to present it at Washington.

This remonstrance mentioned under seven distinct heads their reasons for thus objecting to this measure, so far as it would affect them, the chief of which was the fear that if they ceased to hold their lands in common, the Ogden Land Company would dispossess them. Their objections were referred for consideration to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who recommended under date of Second Month 14th, 1882 "That in view of the tenure by which they hold their lands, and the anxiety on their part lest they should lose the same that the bill should be amended so as to exclude the lands of the Seneca or New York Indians in the state of New York from the provisions of the Act." This recommendation was adopted: and the bill was altered accordingly, and was subsequently enacted. The Committee in their report in 1882 referring to this action remark: "It now appears likely that the beneficial results which might be expected from the separate holding of their lands, will not be secured to them without carefully prepared additional legislation."

It may be here remarked that in this year Benjamin Casler who was then acting as their Agent, in his report to the Indian Commissioner referred to these apprehensions and suggested that if certain questions which he named were submitted to the Attorney General of the United States, and an authoritative opinion thereon was given, the minds of the Indians would be very much relieved, and the way might be made clear for definite and united action to be taken in regard to the allotment of their lands to be held in severalty, and the conferring upon them the responsibilities and privileges of citizenship.

He also gave his own judgment in regard to the effect which an allotment of their lands at that time would have as follows: "Many of the more advanced (Indians) would undoubtedly preserve their lands should they be allotted to them in severalty, and would do well. But a large proportion of the Indians are regardless of the future, and live only for the present moment. These would sell their lands at the earliest possible moment, would soon squander the proceeds, and would then become a burden upon the charities of their more thrifty neighbors, or upon the poor authorities of the State. In my opinion action upon this subject should not be had without great care."

The recommendation to obtain an authoritative opinion from the Attorney-General of the United States upon the questions of title involved in such an allotment was also brought to the notice of the Commissioner by a communication addressed to him by two members of the Committee, but without producing any result so far as is known. The subject was much discussed among the Indians at this time, but there was not sufficient unanimity on their part to warrant any action. One of their valued friends Laura M. Wright, the widow of Asher Wright, who had lived among the Indians on the Cattaraugus Reservation for probably thirty years and had acquired their language, was of the judgment "that if the land was divided the Indians would be in great danger of losing it, unless it was very carefully guarded. She considered that though the claim of the Ogden Land Company had been a very annoying one, yet it had served for a protection to them, and that without it they might not have had any of their land now."

What a Christian is.

We cannot be too careful in emphasizing this, that Christian life is neither human imitation of Christ, nor correct intellectual positions concerning Christ, neither is it a cult or a system of thought. Neither is the nature of the Christian life that of holding the truth about Christ; it is quite possible for a person to believe most sincerely in his Deity, and in the fact of His atoning work, and, moreover, in the necessity for regeneration, and yet never be a Christian; and yet never be submitted to his lordship, never to have personal share in the work of his atonement, never to be born again. Nothing short of the coming into the life of the individual of Christ Himself constitutes a Christian. If Jesus Christ is external to your life, are you a Christian? But if internal, dwelling within, Lord of the life, then you are a Christian.

The Spirit of God communicates to the individual soul the very Christ-life itself. In that moment when the soul submits to the claim of Christ, Christ is formed within by the Holy Spirit; directly there is submission to Him as the absolute Lord of life, and trust reposed in Him for the putting away of sin, and for the communication of life, then by a process utterly beyond the explanation of men, the Spirit communicates Christ's life, and Christ begins to live and reign and work in the soul of the submitted and trusting one. There can be no simulation of this life of Christ. It must be Christ in us. Holiness is not it. It is He.—J. Campbell Morgan.

LET us to-day, therefore, hear his voice, and not harden our hearts, who speaks to us many ways: in the scriptures, in our hearts, by his servants and providences; and the sum of all is holiness and charity.

Science and Industry.

Georgia has held the lead in the production of peaches for the Eastern market since 1902, and for years to come is likely to be the leading peach State in the Union. She has more than 7,660,000 trees.

The size of the Atlantic waves have been carefully measured for the Washington Hydrographic Bureau. In height the waves usually average thirty feet, but in rough weather they attain from forty to forty-eight feet.

The Susquehanna River basin is the largest and most important drainage area commercially in the North Atlantic States, although it is not the most important as regards water power. The headwaters of this river system are on the elevated plateau which separates the waters that flow southward and eastward into the Atlantic streams from those flowing northward and westward into the Mississippi, St. Lawrence, and Great Lakes.

In view of the fact that the power resources of the Susquehanna River basin, one of the largest draining into the Atlantic Ocean, are so little developed, the description of water powers makes one of the most interesting features of the United States Geological Survey's free publication on the whole basin of that river.

A medical authority has recently uttered a warning against the habit of sitting with one knee crossed over the other, says Harper's Weekly. "This apparently harmless habit, it seems, is likely to cause sciatica, lameness, chronic numbness, ascending paralysis, cramps, varicose veins, and other evils. The reason is simple: The back of the knee, it is explained, as well as the front of the elbow and wrist, the groin and arm-pit, contains nerves and blood-vessels which are less adequately protected than in other parts of the body. The space behind the knee contains two large nerves, a large artery, and numerous veins and lymphatic glands. It is the pressure on these nerves and vessels which is apt to give rise to the various troubles against which we are warned."

AN ERRATIC VOLCANO.—On Sixth Month 16th, 1810, according to the London Standard, the Sabrina, a British sloop of war, observed smoke arising from the sea near St. Michael's, off the Azores, and made for it, believing that a naval engagement was in progress. Her crew found, however, that great tongues of flame were issuing along with the smoke and that they had cleared for action to fight a volcano.

Forty-eight hours later an island made its appearance, having risen from a depth of forty fathoms in that period, and in another day it was fifty-one feet above the surface, with a length of about three-quarters of a mile. By Seventh Month 4th the Sabrina's people were able to land on this new shore, which was then three hundred feet high, with a circumference of fully a mile, with a stream six yards wide running from the centre to the sea.

They took formal possession of it for the king of England, hoisting the union jack on its most conspicuous point, but by degrees the island sank until about the middle of Tenth Month it vanished below the surface, with the union jack still on it, like a battleship sinking with colors flying after a fatal engagement.

Dr. Virchow, the eminent man of science, had been sharply criticizing Prince Bismarck, who was then chancellor.

At the end of a particularly severe attack Bismarck felt himself personally affronted and sent seconds to Virchow with a challenge to fight a duel.

The man of science was found in his laboratory, hard at work at experiments which had for their object the discovery of a means of destroying trichinae, which were making great ravages in Germany.

"Ah," said the doctor, "a challenge from Prince Bismarck, eh! Well, well! As I am the challenged party, I suppose I have the choice of weapons. Here they are!"

He held up two large sausages, which seemed to be exactly alike.

"One of these sausages," he said, "is filled with trichinae; it is deadly. The other is perfectly wholesome. Externally they can't be told apart. Let his excellency do me the honor to choose whichever of these he wishes and eat it, and I will eat the other."

Though the proposition was as reasonable as any dueling proposition could be, Prince Bismarck's representative refused it. No duel was fought, and no one accused Virchow of cowardice.

HISTORY OF SHEEP.—Of all domesticated animals the sheep has from time immemorial been most closely associated with mankind, writes R. Henry Rew in Outing. An erudite author sixty years ago, having laboriously collated an assortment of allusions to sheep made by sacred and profane writers, concluded that "the history of these animals is so interwoven with the history of man that they never existed in a wild state at all. Biblical history from the time of Abel is full of allusions to the flocks which formed the chief possessions to the Jewish people and their neighbors. The spoils of war and the tribute of vassal kings largely consisted of sheep. Thus we read that Mesha, king of Moab, was a sheep master and rendered unto the king of Israel a hundred thousand lambs and a hundred thousand rams with the wool. Moses after his victory over the Midianites obtained as loot no less than 675,000 sheep, and long before the Christian era sheep were cultivated in Western Europe.

Spain and Italy possessed them from an unknown period, although long after Rome was founded the inhabitants had not learned to shear the fleece, and until the time of Pliny the practice of plucking it from the skin was not wholly abandoned, so long had the humble shepherds of Syria preceded in their knowledge of necessary arts the future conquerors of their country.

SCIENCE MAKING APPLES WITHOUT CORES.—The American apple is favorably known all the world over and plays no mean part in making up the total of the year's exports. Now a Western horticultural genius has succeeded in producing a coreless apple, and arrangements have already been made to propagate it on a large scale in the great commercial apple orchards of the West. There are now 2,000 of the trees available for propagation, but it is estimated that in 1906 the growers will be able to put 2,500,000 young trees on the market. It is claimed that the tree is hardly a suitable for any climate where the old-stemmed apple will grow.

The tree is described as blossomless, the only thing resembling a blossom being a small cluster of tiny green leaves which grow around the newly-formed apple and shelter it. Being devoid of blossoms, it is claimed that the tree offers no effective hiding-place in which codlin moth may lay eggs. Moreover, it is nothing to fear from frosts.

The color of the new apple is red, dotted with yellow on the skin. As with the seedless orange so with the seedless apple, a slightly hardened substance makes its appearance at the nares. But this can be removed by culture.

Apple culture is more important even than orange culture. In the United States there are 200,000,000 apple trees in bearing, of which 250,000,000 bushels of fruit are annually harvested. In ten years these trees will give yield of 400,000,000 bushels. At the present time the apple consumption of the United States is eighty pounds per head of the population year. By bushel measure the American apple crop is four times greater than the entire world yield of Great Britain and Ireland.

LARGEST IRRIGATION WORK IN AMERICA

The greatest irrigation project in America excelled only by one in India and one in Egypt is at Calgary, in the eastern shadow of the Canadian Rockies, writes Mark Sullivan in Boston Transcript. Intended to see an army of men with shovels, and saw not one shovel. Instead, three colossal steam giants, with monstrous arms which dipped down, took a bite out of the earth, rose slowly and dropped the dirt to one side. Dipping and biting, the three machines advance just above 100 feet a day, leaving in their wake a ditch which is size of a small river, sixty feet wide and twelve to twenty feet deep. This ditch begins at the river and crawls in a curving course of miles into the country.

The biggest irrigation ditch on the continent is simplicity itself. There is nothing connected about an irrigation project. It's just old-fashioned mill-race on a big scale. Tap the river at a high level, run your ditch along that level, with just the slightest dip that will make water flow at all. Then if the big ditch you run smaller lateral ditches and from these still smaller ones, till a few acres has its little rivulet. The ditch at Calgary will supply an area of about 150,000 acres, and water nearly 2,000,000 acres more territory than is included in some Eastern States. When the work is done—but, irrigation will do for a semi-arid country an old story. And yet, just the elements that may bear re-telling.

Farming with irrigation is as different from the ordinary farming as hot-house gardening from raising wheat. Farming with irrigation comes very close to being an operation of chemistry. You have your sunlight, you have your soil, in fixed quantities and of known chemical constituents. You add your water in quantities as needed. And if you wish you can put fertilizing elements, salts of potash in your water, and then farming is a matter of chemistry indeed.

Every Occasion a Great Occasion.

I know a man whose accomplishments have won the marvel of all who know him, who in boyhood made this resolution: "Let every occasion be a great occasion, for you can not tell when fate may be taking your measure for larger place."

He was a poor boy, without friends, in a large city, but this motto always stared in on his face: "Make every occasion a great occasion." If he was doing an errand, these words kept running in his mind: "I must get of this errand all there is in it. I must extract every possibility from it, for something higher. Somebody may be watching me. I may say to myself: 'I will keep my eye that boy. I like the way he does things.' It is prompt, manly, polite, courteous, obliging, accurate. There is the making of a man that boy."

If he was at school, he kept thinking: "I do not skip the hard problems, for they may set up in my manhood, and testify against my usefulness as a boy, and may defeat me. I must see an opportunity in every lesson to cultivate a habit of conquering, a habit of roughness, faithfulness and accuracy. My teacher may be watching me, and when I start my career, the teacher or scholars may tell others about my record at school."

When he attended a meeting at a debating society, this motto kept running in his head: "Make this occasion a great occasion." He had known Lincoln and Vice-President Wilson led the debating society a stepping-stone to something higher. He said to himself: "It is a great thing to learn to think on my feet, to be able to express myself before an audience; and no matter if I am bashful, and people do laugh at me. What if I should break down—I get experience which will help me in career."

When he traveled, whatever he undertook, and wherever he was, this motto was ever prodding on to do his best. If he was at a reception, dinner, in a parlor, or a guest in a home, he must make that occasion a marked occasion being as bright as possible, by keeping his eyes open and his ears open, and learning everything he could and expressing himself at every opportunity with ease and elegance. He must use the best language possible, otherwise he would form slipshod habits, which might ruin him at some fatal moment when he was going to make a good impression.

When he traveled, this motto inspired him to think in every bit of knowledge possible, to be an object of interest pass, and to permit experience to go without extracting from everything it had for him.

When he was a child, his early education was sadly neglected, he became a strong interesting character, broad, widely-read, and of rich experiences and well-rounded complete manhood.—Success.

When you should make more haste to right our neighbor, than we do to wrong him; and instead of being vindictive, we should leave him the edge of his own satisfaction.

When you have done an injury to another, or even if it than defend it. One way thou bestest forgiveness; the other, thou doubtst wrong and reckoning.

A Needed Lesson.

He boy was sitting on the steps of a house. He had a broom in one hand and a large piece of bread and butter in the other. While he was eating he saw a poor little dog not far from him. He called out to him, "Come here, poor fellow!" Seeing the boy eating he came near. The boy held out to him a piece of bread and butter. As the dog stretched out his head to take it, the boy drew back his hand and hit him a hard rap on the nose.

A man who was looking from a window on the other side of the street saw what the boy had done. Opening the street door, he called out to him to come over, at the same time holding a sixpence between his finger and thumb. "Would you like this?" said the man. "Yes, if you please, sir," said the boy, smiling. Just at that moment he got so severe a rap on the knuckles from a cane which the man had behind him that he roared with pain. "What did you do that for?" said he, rubbing his hand. "I didn't ask you for the sixpence." "What did you hurt that dog for just now?" asked the man. "He didn't ask you for the bread and butter. As you served him, I have served you. Now, remember hereafter, dogs can feel as well as boys."—Boston Budget.

STRENGTH OF BIRDS.—Birds can eat and digest from ten to thirty times as much food in proportion to their size as men can. If a man could eat as much in proportion to his size as a sparrow is able to consume, he would need a whole sheep for dinner, a couple of dozen chickens for breakfast, and six turkeys for his evening meal. A tree sparrow has been known to eat 700 grass seeds in a day. Relative to the bird's size, these seeds were as big as an ordinary lunch basket would be to a full grown man.

A bird's strength is equally amazing. A white-tailed eagle weighing twelve pounds, with a wing-spread of six feet, has been known to pounce on a pig weighing forty-two pounds, raise it to a height of a hundred feet and fly off with it. The bird had covered a distance of half a mile before the pig's owner succeeded in shooting the thief.

Birds can do work far harder than human beings. A pair of house martins, when nesting, will feed their young ones in twenty seconds—that is, each bird, male and female, makes ninety journeys to and fro in an hour, or about 1,000 a day. It must be remembered that on each journey the bird has the added work of catching the worm.

Even so tiny a bird as the wren has been counted to make 110 trips to and from its nest within 13 1/2 minutes; and the prey it carried home consisted of larger, heavier, and harder to find insects than were caught by the sparrows. Among them were twenty good-sized caterpillars, ten grasshoppers, seven spiders, eleven worms and more than one fat chrysalis.

Be reserved, but not sour; grave, but not formal; bold, but not rash; humble, but not servile; patient, not insensible; constant, not obstinate; cheerful, not light; rather sweet, than familiar; familiar, than intimate; and intimate with very few, and upon very good grounds.

Items Concerning the Society.

"By the death of Joseph S. Elkinton," says the British Friend, "Philadelphia has lost one of its best known Friends, and one of its truest hearts. His interpretation of Quakerism may have seemed to some of us to be narrow, but his whole life was full of good deeds, among which his long and faithful efforts on behalf of the Dookhobors will not be forgotten. The funeral was held at Arch Street Meeting-house on the 20th ult."

At a recent meeting of the College Park Association of Friends at San Jose, California, an interesting letter was read from Tong Sing Kow, the "Chinese Quaker," who was brought up as a boy by Wilhelmina Jones, and who is now a Mandarin in China. He writes warmly of the teaching among Friends which "shaped and modelled the thoughts and aspirations" of his life, protests against the cruelties inflicted by Russians upon the Chinese, and expresses regret that the necessity of providing for temporal wants has so far prevented him from undertaking mission work among his own people.

The third number of "The First Publishers of Truth" has reached us, edited by Norman Penney for the Friends' Historical Society of London. This number includes the original and quaint recitals of the first entrance of Truth as professed by Friends in the counties of Norwich, Northamptonshire, Wellingborough, Northumberland, Oxfordshire, Somersetshire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, Westmoreland; and how the first Friends in different places fared in jails and persecutions; and many interesting glimpses of the doings and personal characteristics of the early messengers of Truth, now first published. Price 75 cents per number. Obtainable through the American Friend Office, No. 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

Notes in General.

It has been estimated that there are in America $26,000,000 of people unaffiliated with any church.

The Non-Christian World has one ordained missionary to 183,675 people. The United States has one ordained minister to 546 people.

It is announced that Pope Pius X. will soon issue an encyclical letter addressed to all the bishops of the world, in which the conditions of the tillers of the soil will be discussed.

The recent English "mission" in Tibet found many beautiful books in the monasteries, with covers of rare woods beautifully carved and gilded. The books were printed in gold and the pages were held in place with golden rings.

"THE CHURCH THAT IS IN THY HOUSE."—C. Silvester Horne, M. A., says: "I am all for the human church, the true church of humanity, the family church, the home church. The creed of that is that a man has a body as well as a soul to be cared for."

A common order of public worship has been established by the Methodist Church, to be followed in all the churches. This new order is made a part of the discipline, and will appear in the new hymnal. John Wesley followed the order of the Book of Common Prayer.

Francis H. Willard, a native Alaskan missionary, has recently died in Sitka. She was regarded as the foremost woman of her race. She was rescued when ten years of age from heathenism by the first missionary sent to Alaska and was sent East to be educated. She took up the work of interpreter, teacher and missionary, and exerted an influence that was a help and blessing to all who knew her.

It is reported that there have been more than one thousand applicants for the pulpit of Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, since it was left by its pastor, David Gregg, the author of the noted discourse on "The Quakers as Makers of America." The letters are still coming, not only from this country but from Canada, Mexico, Hawaii, England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales. The salary attached to this pulpit is $10,000.

The power of the Gospel upon many of the natives of our island dependencies, who are now hearing it for the first time, is being shown by their eager attendance at public worship. John Willis Bae, who has travelled over Porto Rico, declares that more people are to be found in the few Protestant churches of the island every Sabbath than in all the Catholic Churches. There was but one Protestant church in the island when our army left it five years ago.

The son of a Mohammedan Afghan robber chief has left his father's castle, crossed the frontier, and made public profession of faith in Jesus Christ at the mission in the bigoted Mohammedan city of Peshawar. He has done this at the imminent risk of being shot by his angry father, and he is himself still little more than a half-tamed savage, liable to lose control of himself when anything stirs his wrath. Yet there he is to-day trying hard to be humble, gentle, and Christlike.

The petitions to Rome for the beatification of Pope Pius IX are multiplying. The matter is pushed by the Abbe Maigren, the one who was so active against Americanism. He is bringing three or four thousand signatures every week, and is now well into his second hundred thousand, mostly from France. "So far as we can see," says the Independent, "the chief glory of Pius IX is that he secured infallibility and proclaimed the Syllabus of Errors. We are not surprised that the United States spends no enthusiasm as yet."

The announced appointment of fifty new instructors for Princeton University, under the designation of "preceptors," whose business it shall be to come into close personal touch with the students individually and in small groups, for the purpose of instruction, deserves to be watched with much interest. The expense of this added instruction must be nearly or quite $100,000, which is the interest on two millions of endowment. This ought greatly to help scholarship and introduces some of the excellences of the Oxford coach system.

The striking feature of the summer religious movement thus far is the uniform tendency to get out of doors. Tents are being pressed into service. Congregations in half a dozen cities, just reporting, are abandoning church buildings altogether, and are substituting canvas for them. The Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia has just inaugurated another season out-of-doors, although it has one of the finest edifices in the whole city. In New York, Bishop Potter has planned to take a great number of people each First-day from the lower East Side to the Cathedral, close on Morningside Heights. Here is to be held, not in the cathedral crypt, nor yet in the airy synod hall, but out of doors, under the trees, a First-day afternoon religious service. The preacher is to have place on the steps, and the people are to have seats on the grass. At several summer conferences resorts old forms of auditorium are this year to give way to tents. It appears likely to be an out-of-door season for religious gatherings of many kinds.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—John Hay, Secretary of State, died unexpectedly at his home near Newbury, N. H., the 1st inst. The interment takes place at Cleveland, Ohio.

A proclamation issued by the President in regard to it on the 3rd inst.

Secretary Taft, in a recent address at Yale College, commented severely upon the administration of the criminal laws in this country. He stated: "I grieve for my country to say that the administration of the criminal law is one of the greatest failures (the only one with few exceptions) is a disgrace to our civilization. We are now reaching an age when we cannot plead youth, sparse civilization, newness of country as a cause for laxity in the enforcement of law." This laxity he attributed mainly to our system of trial by jury, in which the feelings of jurors are allowed to be influenced to such a degree that they are not able to judge with the impartiality of the law; in fact he said: "Every man of affairs who has studied the subject at all knows that if men who commit crimes were promptly arrested and convicted there would be no mob for the purpose of lynching. Nothing but a radical improvement in the administration of criminal law will prevent the growth in the number of lynchings in the United States that bring the blush of shame to every lover of his country."

Paul Norton has relinquished his office as Secretary of the Navy, and has been succeeded by Charles J. Bonaparte, of Baltimore.

Assistant Attorney General Milton D. Purdy has been placed in charge of the prosecution of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe and other railroads for giving rebates. Fourteen railroad companies have been mentioned as those against whom actions will be instituted, including the Pennsylvania, Michigan Central, and several others having connections with Chicago.

John D. Rockefeller has promised to give ten million dollars to the General Education Board for the purpose of promoting a higher system of education in the United States.

Governor Hoch, of Kansas, before the State Undertakers Association, lately declared against the display of black after a death has taken place, which, he said, is the emblem of darkness and despair. He thought that the wearing of a large black veil is not the proper sign of sorrow for one who thinks that death does not end all and there is an immortality beyond the grave. White should be used because it is the emblem of sunshine, hope and joy, and is the emblem of darkness and despair.

A despatch from Watkinville, Ga., of the 29th ultimo says: "A mob entered the jail at Watkinville at 2 o'clock this morning and seized nine prisoners, eight of whom were shot to death. The ninth escaped only by being thought dead by the mob. There were about fifty to seventy-five men in the mob, and nearly every man and one or two negroes whence they came or to what point they returned. One of those killed was a white man, and seven were negroes."

A decision has lately been confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States that a tax upon franchises is legal. It is said that in New York City an annual income of $100,000 is paid in such a tax. It is expected that this tax on corporations in consequence of this decision. The Court says: "A franchise, though intangible, is none the less property and oftentimes property of great value. Indeed, growing out of the conditions of modern business, a large proportion of valuable property is to be found in intangible things like franchises, patents, copyrights, and the like, and it is to be held that it is not subject to taxation at its accepted value is to eliminate from the reach of the taxing power a large portion of the wealth of the country."

Numerous attempts have been made to introduce woven paper fabrics into use for garments, etc. In Saxony various sorts of paper are spun by a patented process. Cotton and paper have also been spun together so that the paper envelops the cotton. Paper and woolen fabrics have also been spun together for making heavier warmer cloth. Sufficient cloth for a suit for a laboring man, it is stated, can be made at a cost of about $2.50. The new material is called xyloin.

The Japanese and Japan have each named two peace plenipotentiaries with full powers and others, it is stated, are under consideration. Heavy rains in Manchuria, rendering roads difficult if not impassable, have compelled a cessation of hostilities. Negotiations for an armistice, it is now reported, are in progress. A number of papers are spoken of in a despatch Kniaz Potemkin in the Black Sea on the 23rd ult., in which the captain and some of the officers were murdered. It is stated that all the ships of the Black Sea fleet has been dismantled at Sebastopol. The Government evidently fearing a general revolt of the troops, and preferring to abandon the armament rather than leave so powerful an army in the hands of the rebels. Rioting and violence in Odessa followed. Martial law was declared and the revolt quelled. Similar outbreaks at Cronstadt near Petersburg, and at Libau on the Baltic Sea were pressed after several hours of fighting.

Martial law has been proclaimed in the government of Sebastopol and Nicolaief, adjoining the governor Kherzon, in which is Odessa and Erivan, a government of Transcaucasia, where grave disorders have occurred.

The recent withdrawal of Norway from its union with Sweden was under consideration on the 27th ult. by Riksdag at Stockholm, and was finally referred to a mittee consisting of members of both the Senate and House. In commenting upon it Premier Kamstedt declared that he had two alternatives—either that of giving the Swedish people the right to voluntarily accept dissolution. Now openly advocates force, but some persons advocate procedure which would ultimately lead to war. The object of war would be to compel Norway to retract action, but anger must not blind us to our own interests, and our interests are against forcing Norway any kind of a union. A conquered Norway, while an advantage, would forever be a source of danger. As to this the horrors of war and their feeble result all arguments against the employment of force. If force, then it is best to assist in the dissolution of union without harsher conditions than the future of the peninsula.

The position of the Chinese in the 27th ult. says: "The position of Chinese exclusion from the United States coast chiefly to occupy the attention of the Chinese. The extent and depth of the feeling manifested astonishes signers, and is regarded as an evidence of the growth of a national sentiment of public spirit which five years ago would have been inconceivable. The chief cause of the exclusion of coolies from Hawaii and the Philippines it is urged that there is no conceivable objection to the landing of coolies in Hawaii, where they do not come with American labor, while Chinese immigration has been established in the Philippines. These points that they will have considerable effect on the American Government. The Chinese deplore the risking of American good will but claim to have legitimate grievances. In the meantime, the boycott of goods from the United States continues, and the anti-American campaign is increasing. The American minister has applied to the United States Foreign Affairs to check the movement, and Y. Y. of Chih province, has issued a proclamation of subject, but its efficacy is considered doubtful.

The mining town of Guanajuato, situated in a gorge in the mountainous part of Mexico is reported to have been greatly damaged by a recent flood, and several hundred persons have perished.

DIED, at her home in Winona, Ohio, Fourth Mo. 19, 1905, HANNAH WINBERY, in her eighty-first year, a life-long Friend, she was united with a kind and loving divine testimony to the last illness of two months' duration was borne with true Christian resignation. Her relatives and friends have the consoling evidence of a peaceful close.

At his residence in Colerain, Ohio, Sixth Mo. 7th, 1905, ISRAEL STERER, in the eighty-fifth year of age; a member and elder of Short Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends. Throughout his life he was a devoted adherent to the doctrines and principles of the Society, and, being endowed with sound judgment and retentive memory, his value in the councils of the community in which he resided, was early recognized. He, with remarkable patience thought through the entire life, and was not deterred by the difficulties of age, maintained his integrity to the end. And as his bodily powers weakened, his faith and strength of mind and mercy of his Saviour increased, thus that he was well grounded in the faith once delivered to the saints, and reviving in the hearts of those who have witnessed the dying words of his language: "I like to die; the death of the righteous, and let my last will be like his."
